

TO THE

Right Honorable and his singular good Lord, Sir William Cecill, Baron of Burghleygh, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, Lord high Treasurer of England, Maister of the Courts of Wards and Lineries, and one of the Queenes Maiesties priuie Councell.

Considering with my selfe, right Honorable and my singular good Lord, how redie (no doubt) manie will be to accuse me of vaine presumption, for enterprising to deale in this so weightie a worke, and so far aboue my reach to accomplish: I haue thought good to aduertise your Honour, by what occasion I was first induced to undertake the same, although the cause that moued me thereto hath (in part) yer this beene signified vnto your good Lordship.

Whereas therefore, that worthie Citizzen Reginald Wolfe late Printer to the Queenes Maiestie, a man well knowne and beholden to your Honour, meant in his life time to publish an vniuersall Cosmographie of the whole world, and therewith also certaine particular histories of euery knowne nation, amongst other whom he purposed to vse for performance of his intent in that behalfe, he procured me to take in hand the collection of those histories, and hauing proceeded so far in the same, as little wanted to the accomplishment of that long promised worke, it pleased God to call him to his mercie, after fise and xwentie yeares trauell spent therein; so that by his vntimelie deceasse, no hope remained to see that performed, which we had so long trauelled about. Neuerthelesse, those whom he put in trust to dispose his things after his departure hence, wishing to the benefit of others, that some fruit might follow of that whereabout he had imployed so long time, willed me to continue mine endeuour for their furtherance in the same. Which although I was redie to doo, so far as mine abilitie would reach, and the rather to answere that trust which the deceassed reposed in me, to see it brought to some perfection: yet when the volume grew so great, as they that were to defraie the charges for the impression, were not willing to go through with the whole, they resolved first to publish the histories of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their descriptions; which descriptions, because they were not in such readinesse, as those of forren countries, they were inforced to use the helpe of other better able to doo it than my selfe.

Moreouer, the Charty, wherein Maister Wolfe spent a great part of his time, were not found so complet as we wished: and againe, vnderstanding of the great charges and notable enterprise of that worthie Gentleman maister Thomas Sackford, in procuring the Charty of the seuerall provinces of this realme to be set forth, we are in hope that in time he will delineate this whole land so perfectlie, as shall be comparable or beyond anie delineation heretofore made of anie other region; and therefore leaue that to his well deserued praise. If any well willer will imitate him in so praiseworthy a worke for the two other regions, we will be glad to further his endeuour with all the helpes we may.

The histories I haue gathered according to my skill, and conferred the greatest part with Maister Wolfe in his life time, to his liking, who procured me so manie helpes to the furtherance thereof, that I was loth to omit anie thing that might increase the readers knowledge, which causeth the booke to grow so great. But receiuing them by parts, and at seuerall times (as I might get them) it may be, that hauing had more regard to the matter than the apt penning, I haue not so orderlie disposed them, as otherwise I ought, choosng rather to want order, than to defraud the reader of that which for his further vnderstanding might seeme to satisfie his expectation.

I therefore most humbly beseech your Honour to accept these Chronicles of England vnder your protection, and according to your wisdom and accustomed benignitie to beare with my faults; the rather, because you were euer so especiall good Lord to Maister Wolfe, to whom I was singularly beholden; and in whose name I humbly present this rude worke vnto you; beseeching God, that as he hath made you an instrument to aduance his truth, so it may please him to increase his good gifts in you, to his glorie, the furtherance of the Queenes Maiesties seruice, and the comfort of all his faithfull and louing subiects.

Your Honours most humble to be commanded,

RAPHAEL HOLINSHED.

THE PREFACE

to the reader.

It is dangerous (gentle reader) to range in so large a field as I haue here vndertaken, while so manie fundrie men in diuers things may be able to controll me, and manie excellent wits of our countrie (as well or better occupied I hope) are able herein to surpasse me; but seeing the best able doo seeme to neglect it, let me (though least able) craue pardon to put them in mind not to forget their natue countries praise (which is their dutie) the encouragement of their woorthie countrymen, by elders aduancements; and the daunting of the vicious, by foure penall examples, to which end (as I take it) chronicles and histories ought cheefelie to be written. My labour may shew mine vttermost good will, of the more learned I require their further enlargement, and of fault-finders dispensation till they be more fullie informed. It is too common that the least able are readiest to find fault in matters of least weight, and therefore I esteeme the lesse of their carping, but humblie beseech the skilfull to supplie my want, and to haue care of their dutie; and either to amend that wherein I haue failed, or be content with this mine endeuyour. For it may please them to consider, that no one can be eie-witnesse to all that is written within our time; much lesse to those things which happened in former times, and therefore must be content with reports of others. Therein I haue beene so carefull, that I haue spared no paines or helpe of freends to search out either written or printed ancient authors, or to inquire of moderne eie-witnesses for the true setting downe of that which I haue here deliuered: but I find such want in writers for the necessarie knowledge of things doone in times past, and lacke of meanes to obtaine sufficient instructions by reporters of the time present; and herewith the worthie exploits of our countrymen so manie, that it greeueth me I could not leaue the same to posteritie (as I wished) to their well deserued praise. But I haue here imparted what I could learne, and craue that it may be taken in good part. My speech is plaine, without any rhetoricall shew of eloquence, hauing rather a regard to simple truth, than to decking words. I wish I had beene furnished with so perfect instructions, and so many good gifts, that I might haue pleased all kinds of men, but that same being so rare a thing in any one of the best, I beseech thee (gentle reader) not to looke for it in me the meanest.

But now for thy further instruction, to vnderstand the course of these my labours. First concerning the historie of England, as I haue collected the same out of manie and fundrie authors, in whome what contrarietie, negligence, and rashnesse sometime is found in their reports; I leaue to the discretion of those that haue perused their works: for my part, I haue in things doubtfull rather chosen to shew the diuersitie of their writings, than by ouer-ruling them, and vsing a peremptorie censure, to frame them to agree to my liking: leauing it neuertheless to each mans iudgement, to controll them as he seeth cause. If some-where I shew my fantasie what I thinke, and that the same dislike them; I craue pardon, speciallie if by probable reasons or plainer matter to be produced, they can shew mine error; vpon knowledge whereof I shall be readie to reforme it accordingly. Where I doo begin the historie from the first inhabitation of this Ile, I looke not to content ech mans opinion concerning the originall of them that first peopled it, and no maruell: for in matters so vncerteine, if I cannot sufficientlie content my selfe (as in deed I cannot) I know not how I should satisfie others. That which seemeth to me most likelie, I haue noted, beseeching the learned (as I trust they will) in such points of doubtfull antiquities to beare with my skill: sith for ought I know, the matter is not yet decided among the learned, but still they are in controuersie about it, and as yet Sub iudice lis est. Well, howsoeuer it came first to be inhabited, likelie it is, that at the first the whole Ile was vnder one prince and gouernour, though afterwards (and long peraduenture before the Romans set any foot within it) the monarchie thereof was broken, euen when the multitude of the inhabitants grew to be great, and ambition entred amongst them: which hath brought so manie good policies and states to ruihe and decay.

The Romans hauing once got possession of the continent that faceth this Ile, could not rest (as it appeareth) till they had brought the same also vnder their subiection; and the sooner doubtlesse, by reason of the factions amongst the princes of the land, which the Romans (through their accustomed skill) could turne verie well to their most advantage. They possessed it almost fife hundreth yeares, and longer might haue doone, if either their insufferable tyrannie had not taken awaie from them the loue of the people, as well here as else-where; either that their ciuill discord about the chopping and changing of their emperours had not so weakened the forces of their empire, that they were not able to defend the same against the irruption of barbarous nations. But as we may coniecture by that which is found in histories, about that time, in which the Romane empire began to decline, this land stood in verie weake state: being spoiled of the most part of all hir able men, which were led awaie into forren regions, to supplie the Romane armies; and likewise (perhaps) of all necessarie armour, weapon, and treasure: which being perceiued of the Saxons, after they were receiued into the Ile, to aid the Britons against the Scots and Picts then inuading the same, ministred to them occasion to attempt the second conquest, which at length they brought to passe, to the overthrow not onelie of the British dominion, but also to the subuersion of the Christian religion here in this land: which chanced (as appeareth by Gildas) for the wicked sins and vnthankfulnesse of the inhabitants towards God, the cheefe occasions and causes of the transmutations of kingdoms, Nam propter peccata, regna transmutantur a gente in gentem.

The Saxons obtaining possession of the land, gouerned the same, being diuided into fundrie kingdoms, and hauing once subdued the Britons, or at the least-wise remooued them out of the most part of the Ile into od corners and mountaines, fell at diuision among themselues, and oftentimes with warre pursued ech other, so as no perfect order of gouernement could be framed, nor the kings grow to any great puissance, either to mooue warres abroad, or sufficientlie to defend themselues against forren forces at home: as manifestlie was perceiued, when the Danes and other the Northeasterne people, being then of great puissance by sea, began miserablie to afflicte this land: at the first inuading as it were but onelie the coasts and countries lieng neere to the sea, but afterwards with maine armies they entred into the midle parts of the land. And although the English people at length came vnder one king, and by that meanes were the better able to resist the enimies; yet at length those Danes subdued the whole, and had had possession thereof for a time, although not long, but that the crowne returned againe to those of the Saxon line: till thortlie after, by the insolent dealings of the gouernours, a diuision was made betwixt the king and his people, through iust punishment decreed by the prouidence of the Almighty, determining for their sinnes and contempt of his lawes, to deliuer them into the hands of a stranger; and therevpon when spite and enuie had brought the title in doubt, to whom the right in succession appertained, the Conquerour entred, and they remained a prey to him and his: who plucked all the heads and cheefe in authoritie so cleerlie vp by the roots, as few or none of them in the end was left to stand vp against him. And herewith altering the whole state, he planted such lawes and ordinances as stood most for his auaille and securitie, which being after qualified with more milde and gentle lawes, tooke such effect, that the state hath euer sithens continued whole and vnbroken by wise and politike gouernement, although disquieted sometime by ciuill dissention, to the ruine commonlie of the first mouers, as by the sequele of the historie you may see.

For the historie of Scotland, I haue for the more part followed Hector Boece, Iohannes Maior, and Iowan Ferreri Piemontese, so far as they haue continued it, interlaced sometimes with other authours, as Houeden, Fourdon, and such like; although not often, because I meant rather to deliuer what I found in their owne histories extant, than to correct them by others, leauing that enterprize to their owne countymen: so that whatsoeuer ye read in the same, consider that a Scotishman writ it, and an Englishman hath but onelie translated it into our language, referring the reader to the English historie, in all matters betwixt vs and them, to be confronted therewith as he seeth cause. For the continuation thereof I vsed the like order, in such copies and notes as Maister Wolfe in his life time procured me; sauing that in these last yeares I haue inserted some such notes as concerned matters of warre betwixt vs and the Scots, because I got them not till that part of the English historie was past the presse.

For Ireland, I haue shewed in mine epistle dedicatorie in what sort, and by what helps I haue proceeded therein; onelie this I forgot to signifie, that I had not Giraldus Cambrensis, and Flatburie, vntill that part of the booke was vnder the presse, and so being constrained to make post hast, I could not exemplifie what I would out of them all, neither yet dispose it so orderlie as had beene conuenient, nor pen it with so apt words as might satisfie either my selfe, or those to whose view it is now like to come. And by reason of the like haste made in the impression, where I was determined to haue transposed the most part of that which in the English historie I had noted, concerning the conquest of Ireland by Hen. the second, out of Houeden & others, I had not time thereto; and so haue left it there remaining where I first noted it, before I determined to make any particular collection of the Irish histories, because the same commeth there well inough in place, as to those that shall vouchsafe to turne the booke it may appeare.

For the computation of the yeares of the world, I had by Maister Wolfe's aduise followed Functius; but after his deceasse, M. W. H. made me partaker of a Chronologie, which he had gathered and compiled with most exquisit diligence, following Gerardus Mercator, and other late Chronologers, and his owne obseruations, according to the which I haue reformed the same. As for the yeares of our Lord, and the kings, I haue set them downe according to such authours as seeme to be of best credit in that behalfe, as I doubt not but to the learned and skilfull in histories it shall appeare. Moreover, this the reader hath to consider, that I doo begin the yeare at the natiuitie of our Lord, which is the surest order (in my fanisie) that can be followed.

For the names of persons, townes, and places, as I haue beene diligent to reforme the errors of other (which are to be ascribed more to the vnperfect copies than to the authours) so may it be that I haue some-where committed the like faults, either by negligence or want of skill to restore them to their full integritie as I wished. But what I haue performed, as well in that behalfe as others, the skilfull reader shall easily perceiue, and and withall consider (I trust) what trauell I haue bestowed to his behoofe in this huge volume; crauing onelie, that in recompense thereof he will iudge the best, and to make a freendlie construction of my meaning, where ought may seeme to haue escaped my pen or the printers presse, otherwise than we could haue wished for his better satisfaction. Manie things being taken out as they lie in authors, may be thought to giue offense in time present, which referred to the time past when the author writ, are not onelie tollerable, but also allowable. Therefore (good reader) I beseech thee to weigh the causes and circumstances of such faults and imperfections, and consider that the like may creepe into a far lesse volume than this, and shew me so much fauour as hath beene shewed to others in like causes. And sithens I haue doone my good will, accept the same, as I with a free and thankfull mind doo offer it thee; so shall I thinke my labour well bestowed. For the other histories, which are alreadie collected, if it please God to giue abilitie, shall in time come to light, with some such breefe descriptions of the foreign regions whereof they treat, as may the better suffice to the readers contentation, and vnderstanding of the matters contained in the same histories, reduced into abridgements out of their great volumes. And thus I cease further to trouble thy patience, wishing to thee (gentle reader) so much profit, as by reading may be had, and as great comfort as Gods holie spirit may endue thee with.

FINIS.

The politike Conquest of William the first.

Anno. 1.

This William Duke of Normandie, base son of Robert the first Duke of Normandie, and nephew unto Edward king of England, surnamed the Confessor, having vanquished the English power, and slaine Harold in the field (as you may read at large towards the end of the historie of England) began his reigne ouer England the xv. daie of October being sundae, in the yeare after the creation of the world 5033. (as W. Harison gathereth) and after the birth of our Saviour 1066, which was in the tenth yeare of the emperor Vetric the fourth, in the first of pope Alexander the second, in the first of Philip king of France, and about the tenth of Malcolm the third, surnamed Canmor, king of Scotland.

Sim.Dun.

Immediatlie after he had thus got the victorie in a pight field (as before ye haue heard) he first returned to Hastings, and after set forward towards London, wasted the countries of Suffex, Kent, Hampshire, Southerie, Middlesex, and Herefordshire, burning the townes, and slaing the people, till he came to Beorcham. In the meane time, immediatlie after the discomfiture in Suffex, the two earles of Northumberland and Mercia, Edwin and Maccar, who had withdrawne themselves from the battell together with their people, came to London, and with all speed sent their sister quene Alditha unto the citie of Chelster, and herewith sought to persuade the Londoners to advance one of them to the kingdome: as Wil.Mal. writeth. But Simon of Durham saith, that Aldred archbishop of Yorke, and the said earles with others would haue made Edgar Etheling king. Wherewith, whilest manie of the Nobilitie and others prepared to make themselves redie to give a new battell to the Normans (how or what soeuer was the cause) the said earles drew homewards with their powers, to the great discomfirt of their friends. Wil. Malm. seemeth to put blame in the bishops, for that the lords went not forward with their purpose in advancing Edgar Etheling to the crowne. For the bishops (saith he) refused to ioint with the lords in that behalf, and so through eniue and spite which one part bare to another, when they could not agree vpon an Englishman, they received a stranger, inasmuch that vpon king William his coming vnto Beorcham, Aldred archbishop of Yorke, Wolsane bishop of Worcester, and Walter bishop of Hereford, Edgar Etheling, and the foresaid earles Edwin and Maccar came and submitted themselves vnto him, whom he gentlie received, and incontinentlie made an agreement with them, taking their oth and hostages (as some write) and yet neuertheless he permitted his people to spoile and burne the countrie.

But now, when the feast of Christs nativitie (commonlie called Christmas) was at hand, he approached to the citie of London, and coming thither, caused his haughtie first to enter into the streets, where finding some resistance, he easily subdued the citizens that thus took vpon them to withstand him, though not without some bloodshed (as Gemeticen. writeth) but as by others it should appeere, he was received into the citie without anie resistance at all; and so being in possession thereof, he spake manie friendlie words to the citizens, and promised that he would vse them in most liberall & courteous maner. Not long after, when things were brought in order (as was thought requisite) he was crowned king vpon Christmas daie following, by Aldred archbishop of Yorke. For he would not receive the crowne at the hands of Stigand archbishop of Canturburie, because he was hated, and furthermore iudged to be a verie lewd person and a naughtie liuer.

Gemeticen.

William Conquerour crowned 1067. according to their account which begin the yeare on the daie of Christs nativitie.

At his coronation he caused the bishops and barons of the realme to take their oth, that they should be his true and loiall subjects (according to the maner in that case accustomed.) And being required thereto by the archbishop of Yorke, he took his personall oth before the altar of S. Peter at Westminster, to defend the holie church, and rulers of the same, to gouerne the people in iustice as became a king to doe, to ordeine righteous lawes & keepe the same, so that all maner of baying, rapine, and wrongfull iudgements should for euer after be abolished.

After this, he took order how to keepe the realme in god and quiet government, fortifying the necessarie places, and furnishing them with garisons. He also appointed officers and counsellors, such as he thought to be wise and discret men, and appointed ships to be in the hauens by the coast for the defense of the land, as he thought most expedient. After his coronation, or rather before (as by some authours it should seeme) euen presentlie vpon obtaining of the citie of London, he took his journey towards the castell of Douer, to subdue that and the rest of Kent also: which when the archbishop Stigand and Egellin the abbat of S. Augustines (being as it were the chiefest lords and gouernours of all Kent) did perceiue, and considered that the whole realme was in an euill state; & that whereas in this realme of England, before the coming in of the foresaid duke William, there were no bondmen: now all, as well the Nobilitie as the Commonaltie were without respect made subiect to the intollerable bondage of the Normans, taking an occasion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to prouide for the safeguard of themselves felices and their countrie. They caused all the people of the countie of Kent to assemble at Canturburie, and declared to them the perils and dangers imminent, the miserie that their neighbours were come in to, the pride and insolencie of the Normans, and the hardnesse and griefe of bondage and servile estate. Whereupon all the people rather chosing to end their unfortunate life, than to submit themselves to an unaccustomed yoke of servitude and bondage, with a common consent determined to meet duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their countie. Also, the foresaid Stigand the archbishop, and the abbat Egelsin, chosing rather to die in battell, than to see their nation in so euill an estate, being encouraged by the examples of the holie Machabees, became capitains of the armie. And at a date appointed, all the people met at Swanescombe, and being hidden in the woods, laye pynlie in wait for the comming of the foresaid duke William.

Now, because it cannot hurt to take great heed, and to be vertie warie in such cases, they agreed before hand, that when the duke was come, and the passages on euerie side stopped, to the end he should no waie be able to escape, euerie one of them, as well horsemen as footmen should beare boughes in their hands. The next daie after, when the duke was come into the fields and territories nere vnto Swanescombe, and saw all the countrie set and placed about him, as it had bene a stirring and mourning wood, and that with a meane pace they approached and drew neare vnto him, with great discomfort of mind he wondered at that sight. And as soon as the capitains of the Kentishmen sawe that duke William was inclosed in the midst of their armie, they caused their trumpets to be sounded, their banners to be displaied, and threw downe their boughes, & with their bowes bent, their swords drawne, and their speares and other kind of weapons stretched forth, they shewed themselves ready to fight. Duke William and they that were with him stood (as no maruell it was) soxe astonied, and amazed: so that he which thought he had already all England fast in his fist, did now despaire of his owne life. Therefore on the behalfe of the Kentishmen, were sent vnto duke William the archbishop Stigand, and Egelsin abbat of S. Augustines, who told him their

My lord duke, behold the people of Kent come forth to meet you, and to receiue you as their liege lord, requiring at your hands the things which pertain to peace, and that vnder this condition; that all the people of Kent enjoy for ever their ancient liberties, and may for evermore vse the lawes and customes of the countrie; otherwise they are ready presently to bid battell to you, and them that be with you, and are minded rather to die here altogether, than to depart from the lawes and customes of their countrie, and to submit themselves to bondage, thereof as yet they neuer had experience.

The duke seeing himselfe to be dzinen to such an exigent & stay to pinch, consulted a while with them that came with him, prudently considering, that if he should take anie repulse or displeasure at the hands of this people, which he called the people of England, all that he had done before should be disannulled and made of none effect, and all his hope and safetie should stand in danger and leoparchie: not so willinglie as wiselie he granted the people of Kent their request. Now when the covenant was established, and pledges giuen on both sides: the Kentishmen being ioyfull, conducted the Normans (who also were glad) vnto Rochester, and yelded vp to the duke the earledome of Kent, and the noble castell of Dover. Thus the ancient liberties of England, and the lawes and customes of the countrie, which before the comming of duke William out of Normandie, were equally kept throughout all England, be (through this industrie and earnest traueil of the archbishop Stigand and Egelsin abbat of S. Augustines) remaine inuoluable obserued vntill this daie within that countie of Kent. ¶ Thus far Thomas Spot, and after him William Thorne writeth the same. Of the which the former (that is Spot) liued in the daies of king Edward the first, and William Thorne in the daies of king Richard the second.

The ancient liberties and lawes of England remaine in Kent onke.

Wil. Thorne.

But now, before we proceed anie further in recital of the Conquerours doings, we haue here in a table noted all the noble capitains and gentlemen of name, aswell Normans as other strangers, which assisted duke William in the conquest of this land: and first, as we find them written in the chronicles of Normandie by one William Tailleux.

With other lords and men of account in great numbers, whose names the author of the chronicles of Normandie could not come by (as he himselfe confesseth.) In consideration whereof, and because diuers of these are set forth onlie by their titles of estate, and not by their surnames; we haue thought it conuenient to make you partakers of the roll which sometime belonged to Battell abbeie, containing also (as the title thereof importeth) the names of such Nobles and Gentlemen of Marque, as came at this time with the Conqueror, whereof diuerse maie be the same persons which in the catalog aboue written are contained, bearing the names of the places whereof they were possessed, and owners, as by the same catalog maie appeare.

Epische Syl

Richard Fitz Sicroppe.

The ruler of wye.
King William
returneth into England.

When king William had set all things in order through the most part of the realme, he deliuered the guiding thereof vnto his brother Mdo, the bishop of Bayeux, and his cosine William Fitz Osborne, whom he had made erle of Hereford. In Lent following he sailed into Normandie, leading with him the pledges, and other of the chiefe lords of the English nation: among whom, the two earles Edwin and Marchar, Stigand the archbishop, Edgar Etheling, Walteof sonne to Siward sometime duke of Northumberland, and Agelnothus the abbat of Gloucestreburie were the most famous. Sone after his departing, Eddicke surnamed Syluaticus, sonne to Alfricke that was brother to Eddicke de Streona, refusing to submitt himselfe vnto the king, rebelled and rose against such as he had left in his absence to gouerne the land. Whereupon those that late in the castell of Hereford, as Richard Fitz Scrope and others, did oftentimes invade his landes, and wasted the goods of his farmours and tenants: but yet so often as they attempted to invade him, they lost manie of their owne souldiers and men of war. Moreover, the said Eddicke calling to his aid the kings of the Welshmen, Blothgent and Rithwall, about the feast of the assumption of our Ladie, wasted the countrie of Hereford, euen to the bridge of the riuer of Wyfe, and obtained out of those quarters a marvellous great spoile. In the winter alfo following, and after king William had disposed his busines in Normandie, he returned into England, and euen then began to handle the Englishmen somewhat sharpelie, supposing thereby to keepe them the more easilie vnder his obedience. He also toke alwaie from diuerſe of the Nobilitie, and others of the better ſort, all their liuings, and gaue the ſame to his Poormans. Whereouer, he raiſed great taxes and ſubſidies through the realme: nor any thing regarded the Engliſh Nobilitie, ſo that they who before thought themſelues to be made for euer by bringing a ſtranger into the realme, do now ſee themſelues trodden binder ſot, to be deſpiſed, and to be mocked on all ſides, inſomuch that many of them were conſtrained (as it were for a further teſtimonie of ſeruitude and bondage) to ſhane their beards, to round their heare, and to frame themſelues as well in apparell as in ſeruice and diet at their tables after the Poorman manner, verie ſtrange and farre differing from the ancient cuſtomes and old vſages of their countrie. Others utterly reſuſing to ſuſtaine ſuch an irſufferable yoke of ſhadowe as was lately laid vpon them by the Poormans, choſe rather to leaue all both goods and lands, & after the maner of outlawes, got them to the woods, with their wiues, children, and ſeruants, meaning from thenceforth wholly to liue vpon the ſpoile of the countries adioining, and to take whatſoever came next to hand. Wherevpon it came to paſſe within a while, that no man might trauell in ſafetie from his owne houſe or towne to his next neighbors, and euerie quiet and honeſt mans houſe became as it were an hold or ſtreſſie furniſhed for defence with bowes and arrowes, bills, poles, ſwords, clubs and ſtaues, and other weapons; the doores kept locked and ſtronglie bolted in the night ſeaſon, for feare to be ſurpriſed as it had bene in time of open warre, and amongſt publike enemies. house, as though they had bene in the midst of the seas in some stormie tempest, and when the win- dows or doores should be shut in and closed, they w- sed to saie benedicite, and others to answer, Dominus, in like sort as the prest and his penitent were wont to doe at confession in the church.

Notwithstanding all this, W. William sought to tame & vanquish those of the English Nobilitie, who would not be at his becke. They againe on the other side made themselves strong, the better to resist him, choosing for their chiefe captaines and leaders, the earles Edwine & Edgar Etheling, who valiantlie resisted the Normans, and slue many of them with great rage and crueltie. And as they thus proceeded in their matters, king William being a politike prince, forward and painefull in his businesse, suffered them not altogether to escape cleere awaie, but did sore annoy and put them oft to remedles losses, though he abode in the meane time many laborious iournies, slaughters of his people, and damages of his person. Hereupon the English Nobilitie ever after, yea in time of peace, were hated of the king and his Normans, and at length were kept so short, that being moued partlie with disdain, and partlie with dread, they got them out of the realme, some into Scotland, some into Denmarke, others into Norway; and among these, the two earles Edwine and Harthar, with certeine bishops & others of the cleargie, besides manie also of the tenepozaltie, escaped also to be dynen into Scotland by tempest, as they sailed towards the coasts of Germanie, purposing to haue returned into Hungarie, where the said Edgar was borne: howbeit being arriued in Scotland, he found so friendlie enterainment there, that finally Malcolme the third then king of that realme, toke his sister Margaret to wife, and Christine became a nunne, as in the Scottish chronicles moze plainelie doth appere. King William hereby perswading daily how unwilling the Englishmen were to be vnder his obissance, was in feare of rebellions commotions; and therefore to subdue them the better, he builded foure castles, one at Notingham, another at Lincolne, the third at Porke, and the fourth nere vnto Hastings, where he landed at his first coming into England.

Whereouer, to reduce the English people the sooner vnto obedience and awe, he toke from them all their armour and weapons. He ordeined also that the maister of euerie household about eight of the clocke in the evening, should cause his fire to be raked vp in athes, his lightes to be put out, and then go to bed. Besides this, to the end that euerie man might haue knowledge of the houre to go to rest, he gaue order, that in all cities, towne, and villages, where anie church was, there should a bell be rung at the said houre, which custome is still vsed euen vnto this daie, and comunonlie called by the French word, Couet son, that is, Rake vp the fier.

This yeare on Whitsunday, and the wife of king William was crowned Queene by Aeldred archbishop of Porke. The same yeare also was Venerie his sonne borne here in England: for his other two sonnes Robert and William were borne in Normandie, before he had conquered this land. About the same time also, Godwine and Edmund surnamed the great, the sonnes of H. Harold, came from Ireland, and landing in Somersetshire, fought with Adonothus that had bene maister of their fathers horses, whom they slue, with a great number of others; and so hauing gotten this victorie, returned into Ireland, from whence they came with a great bootie which they toke in their returne out of Cornwall, Deuonshire, and other places thereabouts. In like maner, Erceffer did as then rebell, and likewise the countie of Northumberland, whereupon the king appointed one of his captaines named Robert Cumin, a right noble personage (but moze valiant than circumspect) to go against the northerne people with a part of his armie, whilst he himselve and the other part went to subdue them of Erceffer: where, at his coming before the citie, the citizens prepared themselves to defend their gates and walls: but after he began to make his approach to assaile them, part of the citizens repenting their foolish attempts, opened the gates, and suffered him to enter. Thus hauing subdued them of Erceffer, he greuously punished the chiefe offenders. But the countesse Cita, the sister of Sweine K. of Denmarke, and sometime wife to earle Godwine, and mother to the last H. Harold, with diuers other that were got into that citie, found meanes to fle, and so escaped ouer into Flanders. King William hauing passed his businesse in such wise in Deuonshire, hasted backe towards Porke, being aduertised in the waie, that the Northumbrians hauing knowledge by their spies, that Robert generall of the Normans being come to Durham, did not so diligentlie cause watch and ward to be kept about the towne in the night season as was requisite, did set vpon him about midnight, & slue the same Robert with all his companie, so that of seauen hundred which he brought with him, there was but one that escaped to bring tidings to the king their souereigne.

He heard also, how Edgar Etheling at the same time, being in the countie, riding abroad with a troope of horsemen, and hearing of the discomfiture of those Normans, pursued them egerlie, and slue great numbers of them, as they were about to saue themselves by flight, with which newes being in no small furie, he made speed forward, and coming at the last into Northumberland, he easilie vanquished the foresaid rebels, and putting the chiefe authors of this mutinie to death, he reserved some of the rest as captiues, and of other some he caused the hands to be chopped off in token of their inconstancie and rebellious dealing. After this, he came to Porke, and there in like sort punished those that had aided Edgar, which done, he returned to London.

In the meane time, those Englishmen that were fled (as you haue heard) into Denmarke, by continuall sute made to Sweine then king of that realme, to procure him to make a iourne into England for reuengerie of the right descended to him from his ancestors, at length obtained their purpose, in so much that king Sweine sent his sonnes Harold and Cnutus toward England, who with a nantie of two hundred saile, in the companie of Osborne their vic- cle, arriued in the mouth of Humber betwene the two later ladie daies, and there landing their people with the English outlaues, whom they had brought with them, they straightwaies marched towards Porke, waiking and spoiling the countie with great crueltie as they passed. Soone after, also came Edgar, and such other English exiles as had before fled into Scotland, and ioined their forces with them. When the newes of these things were brought to Porke, the people there were stricken with a maruelous feare, in somuch that Aeldred the archbishop (through verie graefe and anguish of mind) departed this life. The Normans also which late there in gar- rison, after they vnderstood by their spies that the en- mies were come within two daies iourne of them, began not a little to mistrust the faith of the citi- zens, and bicause the suburbs should not be any aio unto them, they set fire on the same, which by the hugeness of the wind that suddenlie arose, the flame became so big, and mounted such a height, that it caught the citie also, and consumed a great part thereof to ashes, together with the minster of S. Peter, and a famous librarie belonging to the same. Hereupon the Normans and citizens in like maner were constrained to issue forth at the same time, and being upon the enemies before they had any knowledge of their approach, were forced to trie the matter by disordered battell: whose number though it was far inferior unto theirs, yet they valiantlie defended themselves for a time, till being oppressed with multitudes, they were overcome and slaine, so that there perished in this conflict, to the number of three thousand of them. Panic of the Englishmen also that came with them to the field, were saued by the enemies, to the end they might gaine somewhat by their ransomes, as William Gallet thirde of the shire, with his wife, and two of their children, Gilbert de Gant, and others other. This slaughter chanced on a saturdaye, being the nineteenth day of September; a dismall date to the Normans.

The two brethren hauing thus obtained this victory, went on further into the countrie of Northumberland, and brought the same wholie to their subiection, insonuch that all the north parts were at their comandement. Upon this they meant to haue gone towards London with the like attempt in the south parts, if the extreame and hard winter which chanced that yere, had not staied their enterprise, as it did king William from assailing them; who hearing of all their doings in the north countrie, would else full gladlie haue set upon them. In the meane time, the Danes wintered in Yorkshire, betwixt the two riuers Ouse and Trent; but so sone as the snow began to melt, and the yce to thaw and waste away, king William sped him with great hast toward his enemies into Yorkshire, and comming to the riuer of Trent, where it falleth into Humber, he pitched his tents there, to refresh his people, for his enemies were at hand. The daie following he brought his armie into the field to fight with the Danish princes, who likewise in battell araiue met them. Then began a right sore and terrible battell, continuing a long space in equall balance, till at length in one of the Danish wings the Norman horsemen had put their enemies to flight. Which when the residue of the Danes perceived, and therewith put in a sudden feare, they likewise fled. Harold and Canutus with a band of hardie souldiers that carried about them, retired backe (though with much a do and great danger) vnto their ships. Edgar also, by helpe of god's graces, escaped into Scotland with a few in his company. Earle Walteof, who had fought most manfully in that battell, & slaine manie Normans with his owne hands, was reconciled into the kings fauour: but the residue were for the most part taken prisoners, and killed. William of Malmesburie writeth, that king William comming at that time into the north parts, besieged the citie of Yorke, and putting to flight a great armie of his enemies that came to the succour of them within, not without great losse of his owne souldiers, at length the citie was deliuered into his hands; the citizens and other that kept it, as Scots, Danes, and Englishmen, being constrained thereto through lacke of vittells. Other writeth, how the Danes, being laden with riches and spoiles gotten in the countrie, departed to their ships before the comming of king William. Here is not to be forgotten, that (as Iohn Leland hath noted) whilst the Conquerour held siege before Yorke, at the earnest request of his wife Queene Maude, he advanced his nephew Alane earle of Britaine, with the gift of all those lands that sometime belonged vnto earle Edwine, the tenor of which gift insueth:

Ego Gulibelmus cognomine Bastardus, do & concedo tibi nepoti meo Alano Britannia comiti, & heredibus tuis in perpetuum, omnes illas villas & terras, qua nuper fuerunt comitis Eadwini in Eboracshira, cum feodis militum & alijs libertatibus & consuetudinibus, ita libere & honorifice sicut idem Eadwinus ea tenuit. Dat. in obsidione coram ciuitate Eboraci: that is, I William surnamed Bastard, doo giue and grant to thee my nephue Alane earle of Britaine, and to thine heires for euer, all those townes & lands that latelie were earle Eadwines in Yorkshire, with the knights fees and other liberties and customes, so freele and honourable as the said Eadwine held the same. Giuen in our seege before the citie of Yorke.

The earle of Britaine, being a man of a stout stomach, and meaning to defend that which was thus giuen to him, built a strong castell nere to his manor of Gillingham, and named it Richmont. The first originall line of the earles of Richmont (that bare their title of honor of this castell and towne of Richmont (as Leland hath set downe the same) is this: Eudo earle of Britaine, the sonne of Gesteire, begat three sonnes, Alane le Roue, otherwise fregaunte, Alane the blacke, and Stephan. These three brethren after their fathers decease, succeeded one another in the earldome of Britaine; the two elder, Alane the red and Alane the blacke died without issue. Stephan begat a sonne named Alane, who left a sonne, which was his heire named Conan, which Conan married Margaret the daughter of William king of Scotland, who bare him a daughter named Constantia, which Constantia was coupled in marriage with Gesteire sonne to king Henrie the second, who had by hir Arthur, whom his uncle king John, for feare to be depriued by him of the crowne, caused to be made awaie; as some haue written. But now to returne where we left touching the Danes, Simon Dunel. affirmeth, that Harold and Canute or Crute the sonnes of Sweine king of Denmarke, with their uncle earle Osborne, and one Christianus a bishop of the Danes, and earle Turketillus were guides of this Danish armie, & that afterwards, when king William came into Northumberland, he sent vnto earle Osborne, promising him that he would permit him to take vp vittells for his armie about the sea coastes; and further, to giue him a portion of monie; so that he should depart and returne home as sone as the winter was passed. But howsoeuer the matter went with the Danes, certeine it is by the whole consent of writers, that king William hauing thus subdued his enemies in the north, he toke so great displeasure with the inhabitants of the countrie of Yorkshire and Northumberland, that he wasted all the land betwixt Yorke and Durham, so that for the space of threescore miles, there was left in maner no habitation for the people, by reason whereof it laie wast and desert for the space of nine or ten yeares. ¶ The goodlie cities with their towers and steeples set vpon a statelie height, and reaching as it were into the aire: the beautifull fields and pastures, watered with the course of sweet and pleasant riuers, if a stranger should then haue beheld, and also knowne before they were thus defaced, he would surclie haue lamented: or if any old inhabitant had bene long absent, & newly returned thither, had seene this pitifull face of the countrie, he would not haue knowne it, such destruction was made throughout all those quarters, whereof Yorke it selfe felt not the smallest portion. The bishop of Durham Egelwinus with his cleargie fled into holie Island with S. Cutberts bodie, and other iewels of the church of Durham, where they carried three moneths and odd daies, before they returned to Durham againe. The kings armie comming into the countrie that lieth betwixt the riuers Theise and Tine, found nothing but void felde and bare walles; the people with their goods and cattell being fled and withdrawne into the woods and mountaines, if any thing were forgotten behind, these new gesss were diligent inough to find it out.

In the beginning of the spring, king William returned to London, and now after all these troubles, began to conceiue greater hatred against the Englishmen than euer before; so as doubting that he should neuer by gentlenesse win their good willes, he now determined by a harder measure to moete with them; insonmuch that he banished a great number, other some also (not a few) he spoiled of their goods, those especiallie of whom he was in hope to gaine any great portion of substance.

Thus were the Englishmen generallie in danger to lose life, lands and goods, without knowledge, or orderlie proceeding in iudgement, so that no greater miserie in the earth could be imagined, than that whereinto our nation was now fallen. He toke from the tostones and cities, from the bishops sees and abbeies all their ancient priuileges and freedoms, to the end they should not onelie be cut short and made weaker, but also that they (for the obtainment of their quietnesse) might redeeme the same of him for such summes of monie as pleased him to exact. Among other things, he ordeined that in time of warre they should aide him with armoz, horse and monie, according to that order which he should then prescribe: all which he caused to be registred, inrolled, and laid vp in his treasure. But diuerse of the spirituall persons would not obey this ordinance, whom he banished without remorse.

About this time the archbishop Stigand, and Alexander bishop of Lincolne fled to Scotland, where they kept themselves close for a season. But the king still continued in his hard proceeding against the Englishmen, insonmuch that now protesting how he came to the gouernance of the realme only by plaine conquest, he seized into his hands most part of euerie mans possessions, causing them to redeeme the same at his hands againe, and yet retained a proprietie in the most part of them; so that those that should afterwards enjoy them, should acknowledge themselves to hold them of him, in yeilding a yerlie rent to him and his successors for euer, with certeine other prouisions, whereby in cases of forfeiture the same lands should returne to him, and his said successors againe. The like order he appointed to be vsed by other possessors of lands, in letting them forth to their tenants. He ordeined also, that the Termes should be kept foure times in the yere, in such places as he should nominate, and that the iudges should sit in their seuerall places to iudge and decide causes and matters in controuersie betwixt partie and partie, in manner as is vsed vnto this day. He decreed mozeouer, that there should be shiriffes in euerie shire, and iustices of the peace to keepe the countries in quiet, and to see offenders punished. Furthermore, he instituted the court of the Exchequer, and the officers belonging to the same, as the barons, the clerks, and such other, and also the high court of Chancerie.

After he had in this sort ordeined his magistrates and ministers of the lawes, he lastlie toke order what ordinances he would haue obserued: whereupon a brogating in manner all the ancient lawes vsed in times past, and instituted by the former kings for the good order and quietnes of the people, he made new, nothing so equall or easie to be kept; which neuertheless those that came after (not without their great harme) were constrained to obserue: as though it had bene an high offense against God to abolish those euill lawes, which king William (a prince nothing friendlie to the English nation) had first ordeined, and to bying in other moze easie and tollerable. Here by the waie I giue you to note a great absurditie; namelie, that those lawes which touched all, and ought to be knowne of all, were notwithstanding writtten in the Norman tong, which the Englishmen vnderstood not; so that euen at the beginning you should haue great numbers, partlie by the iniquitie of the lawes, and partlie by ignorance in misconstruing the same, to be wrongfullie condemned: some to death, and some in the forfeitures of their goods; others were so intangled in lutes and causes, that by no means they knew how to get out, but continuallie were tolled from poore to piller; in such wise that in their minds they curst the time that euer these vnequall lawes were made.

The lawes were writtten in the Norman tong.

The maner for the trial of causes in controuersie, was deuised in such sort as is yet vsed. Twelve ancient men (but most commonlie vnlearned in the lawes) bring of the same countie where the sute lay, were appointed by the iudges to go together into some close chamber, where they should be shut vp, till vpon diligent examination of the matter they should agree vpon the condemnation or acquitting of the prisoner, if it were in criminall causes; or vpon deciding in whom the right remained, if it were vpon trial of things in controuersie. Now when they were all agreed, they came in before the iudges, declaring to what agreement they were growne: which done, the iudges opened it to the offenders or lutors, and withall gaue sentence as the qualitie of the case did inforce and require. There may happilie be (as Polydor Virgil saith) that will mainteine this maner of proceeding in the administration of iustice by the voices of a iurie, to haue bene in vse before the conquerors daies, but they are not able to proue it by any ancient records of writers, as he thinketh: albeit by some of our histories they should seeme to be first ordeined by Ethelred or Egelred. Wholbeit this is most true, that the Norman kings themselves would confesse, that the lawes deuised and made by the Conqueror were not verie equall; insonmuch that William Rufus and Henrie the sonnes of the Conqueror would at all times, when they sought to purchase the peoples fauor, promise to abolish the lawes ordeined by their father, establish other moze equall, and restore those which were vsed in S. Edwards daies. The like kind of purchasing fauor was vsed by king Stephen; and other kings that followed him. But now to the matter, king William having made these ordinances to keepe the people in order, set his mind to enrich his cofers, and therupon caused first a tribute to be leuied of the commons; then the abbeies to be searched, and all such monie as any of the Englishmen had laid vp in the same, to be kept. Besides all this, he seized into his hands their charters of priuileges made to them by the Saxon kings of the land, and spared not so much as the towels and plate dedicated to sacred vses. All this did he (as some write) by the counsell of the earle of Hereford.

First, for that he had wrongfullie holden that bishoprike, whilst the archbishop Robert was li-

2 Secondlie, for that he kept the see of Winchester in his hands, after his investiture unto Canturburie, which he ought not to haue done.

3 Thirddie, for that he had receiued the pall at the hands of pope Benedict the tenth, whom the cardinals, as one not lawfullie elected, had deposed.

Howbeit, manie writers burthen king William (who was present at this synod) for the procuring of Stigand his depriuation, to the end he might place a stranger in his roome. For as he had roted out the English nobilitie, and giuen auaie their lands & liuings to his Normans; so meant he to turne out the English cleargie from bearing any office of honor within the realme, which meaning of his did well appeare at his counsell, wherein diuers bishops, abbats, and priors were deposed, and Normans preferred to their places. Stigand after his depriuation was kept in perpetuall prison at Winchester, till he died, and yet (as some write) the same Stigand was an helper vnder hand for king William to attaine the crowne.

In the feast of Pentecost next ensuing, the king being at Windsor, gaue the archbishopricke of York to one Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, and to Walhelme one of his chaplins he gaue the bishopricke of Winchester. After this, calling one Lanfranke an Italian from Caen where he was abbat, he made him archbishop of Canturburie, who was consecrated there in the feast of S. John Baptist, in the yeare following, which was after the birth of our Sauiour 1071. The foresaid Thomas was the five and thientith bishop that had gouerned in that see of York, & Lanfranke the thre & thirtieth in the see of Canturburie. But per long, betwixt these two archbishops there rose great contention for the primasie of their churches, in so much that the archbishop of York appealed to Rome, where they both appeared personallie before pope Alexander, in whose presence Lanfranks cause was so much fauoured, that not onelie the foresaid Thomas, but also Remigius the bishop of Dochester were for reasonable causes depriued of their crosiers and rings: and Lanfranke at their humble request was a meane to the pope for them in the end, that they might be restored to their stauces, which was accordingly obtained. For when the pope heard Lanfranke declare in their fauour, how necessarie their seruice might be to the king, in the establishment of his new gotten kingdome, he said to Lanfranke; Well, loke you then to the matter, you are the father of that countrie, and therefore consider what is expedient to be done therein: their stauces which they haue surrendered, there they be, take them, and dispose them as you shall thinke most profitable for the aduancement of the christian religion in that countrie. Whereupon, Lanfranke toke the stauces, and deliuered them to the former possessours, and so were they in the popes presence restored to their former dignities. One cause why Thomas was depriued (as some writers saie) was, for that he had holpen duke William toward his iourne into England when he came to conquer it, for the which pleasure to him then shewed, the duke promised him a bishopricke, if ener he obtained victorie ouer the English: an other cause, for that he was a priests sonne. Now, when the pope vnderstood the full ground of their contention to be for the primasie of the two sees, Canturburie and York, and had heard what could be alledged on both sides, he remitted the determination thereof to the king and bishops of England, that by the histories and records of the land, the matter might be tried, iudged and ordered.

Wherefore at their coming home, and after long debating and discussing of the cause (as in William Marleburgh it appeareth moze at large) at a synod holden at Windsor, in the yeare 1072. sentence was giuen on Lanfranks side, so that in all things concerning religion and the faith of holie church, the archbishop of York should be euer subiect to the archbishop of Canturburie, and come with all the bishops of his prouince to what place soeuer the archbishop of Canturburie should summon any counsell within the realme of England. Moreover, when anie elected bishop of Canturburie was to be consecrated, the archbishop of York (for the time being) should come to Canturburie, and consecrate him there. And if the archbishop of York was to be installed and consecrated, then should he come to Canturburie, or to what place it should please the archbishop of Canturburie to assigne, and there to be confirmed of him, taking an oth with profession of due obedience vnto the higher see. Now, as the said Thomas of York did yeld obedience to Lanfranke of Canturburie, so likewise the elect bishop of Glasgow in Scotland named Spichaell, was some after consecrated of the foresaid Thomas archbishop of York, and made an oth of obedience vnto the said archbishop, as to the primate of all Scotland: and after him Lothar the bishop of S. Andrewes did the like, by commandement of Malcolme the third of that name king of Scotland, and Margaret his wife, who thought good by this recognisance of obedience and dutie, so to prouide against further inconvenience to come, that hereafter, one of the bishops of their realme should not take vpon them to consecrate an other: or do any thing contrarie to the ancient decrees of the old fathers, that might be prejudiciall to the authoritie of the archbishop of York, at whose appointment those and the like things were accustomed to be done. In this controuersie (or the like) it is left written, that in a court held at Rome (the time is not mentioned) the pope perceiuing the strife betwene these two prelates to be but for the highest place or primasie in the church; he solemnlie gaue sentence by decree, that the see of York should haue in title Primas Angliae, & Canturburie Primas totius Angliae, which titles do yet remain to them both.

But to leaue this, and to speake of other things which chanced in the meane time that this controuersie depended betwixt the two archbishops, I find that Edwin and Murchar earles of Merthia and Northumberland, hauing of late obtained pardon for their former misdemeanors, & reconciled to the king, began now so much to dislike the state of the world againe, as euer they did before. For perceiuing how the Englishmen were still oppressed with thraldome & miserie on ech hand, they conspired, & began a new rebellion, but with verie ill success, as shall hereafter appeare. The king vnderstanding of their dealings, and being not onelie armed throughlie with temporal force, but also endued with the spiritvall power of his archbishop Lanfranke (who aided him in all that he might, for the suppressing of those rebels) wasked the countie exceedinglie, where he vnderstood that they had gotten anie releefe, minding vtterlie to vanquish them with sword, fire, and hunger, or by extreme penurie to bring them vnder. They on the other part make as stout resistance; and perceiuing that it stood them vpon, either to vanquish or to fall into vtter ruine, they raise a mightie strong host, and make Edgar Etheling their capteine, a comelie gentleman and a valiant, in whome also the whole hope of the English nation was reposed, as appeareth by this his accustomed by-word, Edgar Etheling Englands dearling. Amongst other noble men that were chiefe dowers in the assembling of this armie, Frederike abbat of S. Albons, a prelate of great wealth and no lesse puissance, was a principall.

The king perceiuing his estate to be now in no small small danger, as in a great perplexitie what to do, in the end, he counselleth with the said Lanfranke archbishop of Canturburie, how he might remedie the matter; who told him that in such a desperate case, the best waie for him should be to seeke by faire words and friendly offers to pacifie the English Nobilitie, which by all meanes possible would neuer cease to molest him in the recouerie of their liberties. Whereupon he made meanes to come to some agreement with them, and so well the matter proceeded on his side, that the Englishmen being deceived through his faire promises, were contented to communion of peace, for which purpose they came also vnder the conduct of the abbat Frederike vnto Berkhamsted, where (after much reasoning and debating of the matter for the conclusion of amitie betwixt them) king William in the presence of the archbishop Lanfranke and other of his lords, took a personall oath vpon all the reliques of the church of S. Albons, and the holie euangelists (the abbat Frederike ministering the same vnto him) that he would from thenceforth obserue and keepe the good and ancient approved lawes of the realme, which the noble kings of England his predecessors had made and ordeined heretofore; but namelie those of S. Edward, which were supposed to be most equall and indifferent.

The peace being thus concluded, and the Englishmen growne thereby to some hope of further quietnesse, they began to forsake their allies, and returned each one, either to his owne possessions, or to giue attendance vpon the king. But he warlike cloyking his inward purpose, notwithstanding the vnitie lately made, determineth particularlie to assaile his enemies (whose power without doubt so long as it was vnitied, could not possible be overcome, as he thought) and being now by reason of this peace dispersed and dispersed, he thought it high time to put his secret purposes in execution: whereupon taking them at vnwares and thinking of nothing lesse than warres and sudden invasion, he imprisoneth manie, killeth diuers, and pursueth the residue with fire and sword, taking awaie their goods, possessions, lands, and inheritances, and banishing them out of the realme. In the meane time, those of the English Nobilitie, which could escape this his outrageous tyrannie, got awaie, and amongst other, Edgar Etheling fled againe into Scotland: but Edwin was slaine of his owne souldiers, as he rode toward Scotland. earle Marchar, and one Hereward, with the bishop of Durham named Egelwinus, got into the Isle of Elic, in purpose there to defend themselves from the iniurie of the Normans, for they took the place (by reason of the situation) to be of no small strength. Howbeit king William endeavouring to cut them short, raised a power, and stopped all the passages on the east side, and on the west part he made a cause through the fennes, of two miles in length, whereby he got vnto them, and constrained them to yeld. But Marchar, or (as others haue) Hereward, foreseeing the imminent danger likelie to take effect, made shift to get out of the Isle by boote, and so by speedie flight escaped into Scotland. The bishop of Durham being taken, was sent to the abbey of Abingdon, to be kept as prisoner, where he was so sparingly fed, that within a short space he died for hunger.

In this meane time, and whilst king William was thus occupied in rooting out the English, Malcolme king of Scotland had wasted the countries of Chetefeldale, Cleueland, and the lands of S. Cutbert, with sundrie other places in the north parts. Whereupon Gospatrike being lately reconciled to the king, made earle of Northumberland, was sent against him, who sacked and destroyed that part of Cumber-land which the said Malcolme by violence had brought vnder his subiection. At the same time Malcolme was at Wieremouth, beholding the fire which his people had kindled in the church of Saint Peter to burne by the same, and there hearing what Gospatrike had done, he took such displeasure thereat, that he commanded his men they should leaue none of the English nation aliue, but put them all to the sword without pittie or compassion, so oft as they came to hand. The bloudie slaughter which was made at this time by the Scots, through that cruell commandement of Malcolme, was pittifull to consider, for women, children, old and yong, went all one way: howbeit, manie of those that were strong and able to serue for iudges and slaues, were reserved, and carried into Scotland as prisoners, where they remained manie yeares after; in so much that there were few houses in that realme, but had one or mo English slaues and captiues, whom they gat at this unhappie boiage. Miserable was the state of the English at that time, one being consumed of another so vnnaturalie, manie of them destroyed by the Scots so cruellie, and the residue kept vnder by the king so tyrannicallie.

But to returne to the purpose in hand, king William hearing of all these things, was not a little moued at the same, but chafelie with Malcolme king of Scots, for that his countrie was the onelie place wherein all the mal-contents of his realme had their refuge. Wherefore, thinking to reuenge the losse of his subiects, and to bring that realme also vnto his subiection, he went thither with an huge armie, about the middle of August, where he first invaded the bounds of Galloway, because he heard how the English were lately fled thither. But after he had wearied his souldiers in vaine pursuit of them (who kept themselves in the mountaines and marres grounds) he gaue ouer the enterprise, and drey towards Lothian, where king Malcolme lay with all his power, & sundrie English fugitiues, with whom he determined by battell either to end his trouble, or else to lose his life. Now as both the kings with their armies were ready to encounter, Malcolme began to doubt somewhat of the fiercenesse of the battell, because he saw the great puissance and ready willes of the English and Normans to fight, whereupon he sent an harrold to king William to treat of peace, wherewith he was content at the last (though with much adoe) and so a vnitie ensued betwixt them, vpon these conditions; namelie, that king Malcolme should doe homage to king William for the realme of Scotland, and therevpon deliuer sufficient hostages: and that on the other side, king William should pardon all the English outlawes in Scotland which then rebelled against him. The place where this peace was concluded, was called Abirneseth. After this, king William returned into England, where he perlong took the earledome of Northumberland from Gospatrike, and gaue it to Waltheof the sonne of Steward; because of right it seemed to descend vnto him from his father, but chafelie from his mother Alfredda, who was the daughter of Alzed sometime earle of that countrie.

At the same time also the king caused a castell to be built at Durham, and returned to London, where he receiued auertisement that his subiects in Normandie toward the parties of Angiew had begun a rebellion against him. Wherevpon with all speed he leuied an armie, wherof the most part consisted of English (whose seruice he liked rather in a forren countrie than in their owne) and sailed ouer into Normandie, where he easilie subdued his enemies by the valiance of the English, whom from thenceforth he began somewhat to fauour and better thinke of than before. Yong Edgar also grew in berie good credit

The yere 1074. three monks of the prouince of Mercia, purposing to restore religion after their manner within the prouince of Northumberland, came into Porke, and required of Hugh Fitz Waldrick (then thirde of the shire) to haue safe conduct vnto Doncaster, which afterwards hight Newcastle, and so is called to this day. These monks, whose names were Aldwin, Alfwine, and Kemfired, comming vnto the foresaid place, found no token or remanent of any religious persons, which sometime had habitati-

For you must consider, that by the inuasion of the Danes, the churches and monasteries throughout Northumberland were so wasted and ruined, that a man could scarce find a church standing in all that countrie, as for those that remained, they were couered with brime or thatch: but as for any abbey or monaste-rie, not one was left in all the countrie, neither did any man (for the space of two hundred yeres) take care for the repairing or building vp of any thing in decaye, so that the people of that countrie wist not what a monke ment, and if they saw any, they won-

Amongst other also of the associates, earle Walteof the sonne of earle Siward was one, who afterward mistrusting the successe of this deuise, first vttered it to archbishop Lanfranke, and by his aduice sailed ouer into Normandie, and there disclosed the whole matter to king William: but in the meane time, the other two earles, namely, Hereford and Cambridge had so farre proceeded in the matter, that they were vp in armour. Holobert, Wolstan bishop of Worcester, and Egelwine abbat of Evesham, with the wife of Worcester & Walter Lacie, so resisted the earle of Hereford, that he could not passe the Seuerne to ioune with the earle of Cambridge. On the other side, Edo the bishop of Bayeux, and Gessrey the bishop of Constances pursued the earle of Cambridge so narrowly with an other armie, which they had gathered of the English and Normans, that they constrained him to flee into Britaine, whereby the rebellion was verie much appeased.

In the meane time, the king vnderstanding by earle Walteof how the matter went in England, came ouer with all speed out of Normandie, & within a short space brought the residue of the conspirators into such a feare, that they were scattered and put to flight, without attempting anie further exploit or conspiracie against him. Manie of them also were apprehended and put to death, among whom Roger and Walteof were most famous. And though Walteof (as ye haue heard before) disclosed the treason, yet to the end he should offend no more hereafter, he was beheaded at Winchester by the kings commandement, and his bodie hauing bene first buried

This earle Walteof or Walbent was sonne (as ye haue heard) to Siward the noble earle of Northumberland, of whose valure in the time of R. Edward the confessor ye haue heard. His son the foresaid Walteof in strength of bodie and hardinesse did not degenerate from his father, for he was tall of personage, in sinewes and muscles verie strong and mighty. In the slaughter of the Normans at Porke, he shewed proofe of his prowesse, in striking off the heads of manie of them with his owne hands, as they came forth of the gates single one by one: yet afterwards, when the king had pardoned him of all former offenses, and receiued him into fauour, he gaue to him in marriage his niece Judith the daughter of Lambert earle of Lens, sister to Stephen erle of Albermarle, and with hir he had of the kings gift, all the lands and liberties belonging to the hono-

This was the end of the foresaid conspiracie. At this verie time the Danes being confederate with these rebels, and by them solicited, set forth towards England vnder the leading of Cnuto, sonne to Sueno, and earle Haco, and (unlooked for) arriue here in England with two hundred sailes. But hearing that the ciuill tumult was ended, and seeing no man readie either to countenance or encourage them in their enterpryse, they sailed first into Flanders, which they spoiled, and after into their owne countrie, with little desire or will to come againe into England. King William also vnderstanding that they were thus departed, passed ouer into Britaine, and there besieged the castell of Doll that belonged to Rafe earle of Cambridge or Northfolke: but by the comming of Philip

In the yeare following, king William led a mighty armie into Wales, and subdued it, receiuing of the rulers and princes there their homages and hostages. About the same time, Robert the kings eldest sonne, a right worthy personage, but yet as one of nature somewhat unstable, entred into Normandie as a rebell to his father, and by force took diuers places into his hands. Which he did by the practise of Philip the French king, who now began to doubt of the great puissance of king William, as foreseeing how much it might prejudice him, and the whole realme of France in time to come. Wherefore to stop the course of his prosperous successe, he deuised a meane to set the sonne against the father. True it is that king William had promised long afore to resigne the government of Normandie vnto the said Robert his sonne. Whereupon the young man, being of an ambitious nature, and now pricked forward by the sinister counsell of his adherents, seeketh to obtaine that by violence, which he thought would be verie long yer he should attaine by curtesie. King William hereof aduertised, was not a little moued against his disobedient sonne, and cursed both him and the time that euer he begat him. Finally, raising an armie, he marched towards him, so that they met in the field. As sone as the one came in sight of the other, they encountred at a place called Archenhaie, and whilst the battell was at the hottest, and the footmen most busied in fight, Robert appointed a powder of horsemen to beake in vpon the rearward of his enimies; & he himselfe following after with all his might, chanced among other to haue a conflict with his owne father, so that thrusting him through the arme with his lance, he bare him beside his horse, and ouerthrew him to the ground. The king being saue, called to his men to remount him. Robert perceiuing by his voice that it was his father, whom he had vnhozied, speedilie alighted, and took him vp, asking him forgiveness for that fact, and setting him vp on his owne horse, brought him out of the prease, and suffered him to depart in safetie. King William being thus escaped out of that present danger, and seeing himselfe not able to resist the puissance of his enimies, left the field to his son, hauing lost many of his men which were slaine in battell and chase, besides a great number that were hurt and wounded, among whom his second sonne William surnamed Rufus or Red, was one; and therefore (as some write) he bitterlie cursed his son Robert, by whom he had sustained such iniurie, losse, and dishonour. Howbeit, other write, that for the curtesie which his sonne shewed, in relieuing and helping him out of danger, when he was cast off his horse, he was moued with such a fatherlie affection, that presentlie after they were made friends, the father pardoned his sonne all his former offenses, and thereupon found him euer after more tractable and obedient than before.

After this battell, king William being thus accorded with his sonne, returned with him into England, and immediatlie sent him against Malcolm king of Scotland, who hauing broken the truce in time of the trouble betwixt king William and his sonne, had done much hurt by forraies vpon the English borders, wasting all Northumberland euen to the riuier of Tyne. Howbeit, when he heard that Robert approached with his armie towards him, he retired into Scotland. Robert Curthose then lodged with his armie vpon the banks of the riuier of Tyne, where he began the foundation of a castell, whereof the towne of Newcastell did after take both beginning and name, for before this season it was called Doncastell.

About the same time, Ddo the bishop of Bayeux was sent to Northumberland, to reuenge the death of Waltheb bishop of Durham, whom not long before the people of Northumberland had slaine in a tumult. The occasion of his death grew by the death of one Liulfus, a noble man of those quarters, and derelic beloued of the people, because he was descended of honorable parentage, and had married the ladie Alghis daughter vnto earle Alered, and sister to Almeda the mother of earle Matcof.

This Liulfus, a man of great possessions through England, now that the Normans ruled in all places, quietlie withdrew himselfe vnto Durham, and grew into such familiaritie and credit with the bishop, that touching the order of temporall matters, he would do nothing without his aduice. Whereat Leofwin the bishops chapline conceiued chenuie (for that he was not so often called to counsell as before) that in the end he procured by his malicious meanes one Gilbert (to whom the bishop had committed the rule of the earldome) to murder the said Liulfus by night in his manors place not farre from Durham. Whereof the bishop hauing vnderstanding, and knowing that the matter would be grieuoullie taken of the people, sent out letters and messengers into the countrie, offering to purge himselfe of the slaughter of this man, according to the order of the canon lawes: howbeit he did nothing lesse. Among other things concerning his purgation, he said that he had banished Gilbert and others, (who had committed the murder) out of Northumberland. Verbpvpon the malice of the people was kindled against him. For when it was knowne that he had receiued the murderers into his house, and fauoured them as before, they stomached the matter highlie: insomuch that when by the trauell of those that went to and fro betwixt the bishop and the king, folks of Liulfus, a daie was appointed, on the which the bishop should come to farther communication with them at Gateshead; he repaired thither according to his promise, but refusing to talke with them abroad, he kept himselfe still within the church, and sent forth such of his counsell as should commune with them. But when the people that were there gathered in great numbers, had signified in plaine words that he should either come forth and shew himselfe amongst them, or else that they should fire the place where he sat: he caused Gilbert to go forth vnto them first, whom they slue, and his partakers also that issued out of the church with him for his defence. But when the peoples furie was not so quenched, the bishop himselfe casting the skirts of his gowne ouer his face, came likewise forth, and was immediatlie slaine of the people. After this, they set the church on fire, because Leofwine the bishops chapline and others were yet within, and refused to come come forth: howbeit in the end, being compelled by the rage of the fire to come out, the said Leofwine was also slaine and hacket in peces (as he had well deserved) being the ringleader of all the mischief.

¶ Thus maie we see what followed of the neglecting of iustice in the bishop: for if he had either banished Gilbert and other his complices (accordinglie as he pretended to do) or otherwise had sene due punishment executed against them, the peoples rage had neuer proceeded so far as it did: for they could not persuade themselves, but that the bishop was guiltie and priuie to Leofus death, sith he had receiued the murderers into his house, the verie same night in which the fact was done, and kept them still about him, which his bearing with them cost him his owne life. But now to the historie.

When bishop Odo was come into those parties to reuenge the bishops death with an armie (as we haue said) he soze afflicted the countrie, by spoiling it on euerie side with great crueltie. Here king William placed and displaced diuerse rulers ouer the Northumbers: for first he appointed one Copsi to haue the rule of that countrie, in place of Harchar who before had held the same. This Copsi expelled Mulse the sonne of earle Eoulse brother to earle Alred, which Mulse was substitute vnto the earles Eoulse and Harchar, who although he was driuen out of his gouernement by Copsi, yet recouering his forces againe, he sene the same Copsi as he entred into the church of Newburne. But within a few moneths after, the same Mulse (as he ran with his horse against a therse) was thrust through the bodie with a spear, which the therse held in his hand, and so died. Then Gospatrike was assigned by king William to haue the gouernement there: whose mother Aldgitha was daughter to Athred sometime earle of Northumberland begotten vpon Elfgina the daughter of king Egfred.

Some write, that Gospatrike purchased the earles dome of king William, and so held it, till the king toke it from him againe, and then gaue it vnto earle Waltes of Waldeue. Next after him Walkher the fozrsaid bishop of Durham had the whole administration committed to him, but (after he was slaine as ye haue heard) one Alberike ruled that countrie, and lastlie, Robert Bulzay a right noble personage (for his wisdom and valiance highlie renowned with all men) was created earle of Northumberland, and gouerned the people of those parties in such politike and wise order, that during his time, it is hard to saie, whether his quietnesse or the obedience of the people was greater.

In like manner, after the fozrsaid Walkher, one William was created bishop of Durham, who was the originall founder of vniuersitie colledge in Oxford, and by whose assistance, the monkes gaying both for riches, ease, and possessions, found the means to displace the secular priests of the colledge of Durham, that they might get into their monies, as they did indeed some after, to their great gaine and aduantage. But to returne againe to the course of the historie. Shortlie after the reuenge of the death of Walkher bishop of Durham, the fozrnamed bishop Odo the kings brother was suspected of some vnruth and sinister dealing, wher vpon he was sent as a banished man into Normandie, or rather (as other write) committed to prison, where he remained, not as a clerke, but as a baron of the realme; for he was both bishop and earle of Bent.

The king hauing at length obtained some rest from wars, practised by sundrie meanes to enrich his coffers, and therefore raised a tribute through out the whole kingdom; for the better leuieing whereof, he appointed all the subiects of his realme to be num-bred, all the cities, towne, villages, and hamlets to be registred, all the abbies, monasteries and priories to be recorded. Moreover, he caused a certificat to be taken of euerie mans substance, and what he might dispend by the yeare; he also caused their names to be written which held knights fees, & were bound therby to serue him in the wars. Likewise he toke a note of euerie poke of oxen, & what number of plow lands, and how manie bondmen were with in the realme. This certificat being made & brought vnto him, gaue him full vnderstanding what wealth remained among the English people. Herevpon he raised his tribute, taking six shillings for euerie hide of land through out this realme, which amounted to a great masse of monie when it was all brought together into his Exchequer. ¶ Here note by the waie, that an hide of land containeth an hundred acres, and an acre containeth fortie perches in length, and foure in breadth, the length of a perch is sixtene foot and an halfe: so that the common acre should make 240. perches; & eight hides or 800. acres is a knights fee, after the best appoyued writers and plaine demonstration. Those therefore are deceiued, that take an hide of land to containe twentie acres (as William Lambert hath well noted in his De prisio Anglorum legibus) where he expoundeth the meaning of the old Saxon termes pertaining to the lawes.

But to proceed & come, a little after the temporals dealing, to some of the spirituall affaires. It hapned about the same time, that when king William had finished the rating of his subiects, that there rose a strife betwixt Thurstane abbat of Glaffenburie a Norman, and the monkes of that house. One cause thereof was, for that the abbat would haue compelled them to haue left the plaine song or note for the seruice which pope Gregorie had set forth, and to haue vsed an other kind of tune deuised by one William of Felcampe: beside this, the said abbat spent and wasted the goods that belonged to the house, in riot, lecherie, and by such other insolent meanes (withdrawing also from the monkes their old accustomed allowance of diet) for the which they first fell at alteration in words, and afterwards to fighting. The abbat got armed men about him, and falling vpon the monkes, slue thre of them at the high altar, and wounded xviij. Howbeit the monkes for their parts plaied the pretie men with formes and candlesticks, defending themselves as well as they might, so that they hurt diuers of the abbats adherents, and droue them out of the quier.

In the end, complaint hereof was brought to the king, by whose iudgement the matter was so ordered, that Thurstane lost his come, and returned vnto Caen in Normandie from whence he came, and the monkes were syped abroad into diuerse houses of religion through the realme, Glaffenburie being replenished with more quiet persons, and such as were supposed readier to prae than to quarrell, as the other did: yet is it said, that in the time of William Rufus this Thurstane obtained the rule of that abbey againe for five hundred pounds.

Where be which write, that the numbring of men and of places, the valuation of goods and substance, as well in castell as readie monie, was not taken till about the xix. yeare of this kings reigne (although the subsidie afore mentioned was gathered about two yeares before of euerie hide of land as ye haue heard) and that the certificat hereof being inrolled, was put into the kings treasure at Winchester, in the xix. yeare of his reigne, and not in the xviij. But in what yeare soeuer it was, and howsoeuer the writers agree or disagree herein, certaine it is, that the same was created, to the great greife and impenishment of the people, who soze lamented the unreasonaborable estate whereinto they were brought, and hated the Normans in their hearts to the verie death. Whobest, the more they grudged at such tolles, tallages, custumes, and other impositions, wherewith they were pressed; the more they were charged and overpressed. The Normans on the other side with their king perceiving the hatred which the English bare them, were fore offended, and therefore sought by all meanes to keepe them vnder. Such as were called to be iustices, were enemies to all iustice; whereupon greater burdens were laid vpon the English, insomuch that after they had bene robbed and spoiled of their goods, they were also debarred of their accustomed games and pastimes. For where naturallie (as they do vnto this daie) they take great pleasure in hunting of deere, both red and fallow, in the woods and forrests about without restraint, king William seizing the most part of the same forrests into his owne hands, appointed a punishment to be executed vpon all such offenders; namely, to haue their eyes put out. And to bring the greater number of men in danger of those his penall lawes (a pestilent policie of a spitefull mind, and sauozing altogether of his French slauierie) he deuised meanes how to breed, nourish, and increase the multitude of deere, and also to make roime for them in that part of the realme which lieth betwixt Salisburie and the sea southward: he pulled downe townes, villages, churches, & other buildings for the space of 30. miles, to make thereof a forrest, which at this daie is called Netu forrest. The people as then fore bewailed their distress, & greatlie lamented that they must thus leaue house & home to the vse of sauage beasts. Which crueltie, not onelie most all men liuing here on earth, but also the earth it selfe might seeme to detest, as by a wonderfull signification it seemed to declare, by the shaking and roaring of the same, which chanced about the 14. yeare of his reigne (as writers haue recorded.) Where be that suppose how the king made that part of the realme waste and barren vpon a policie, to the intent that if his chance were to be expelled by ciuill wars, & he compelled to leaue the land, there should be no inhabitants in that part of the Isle to resist his arriual vpon his new returne.

But to go forth with our purpose. About the same time, a rumor was spread in England that Suenne king of Denmarke meant to invade England with a puissant armie, hauing the assistance of the earle of Flanders, whose daughter he had married. Whereupon king William being then in Normandie, retained a great power of French souldiers, both archers and footmen, which together with his Normans he brought ouer into England in haruest season, & meaning to disburthen himselfe of the charge of their keeping, he caused their finding and wages to be borne by the lords and peers of the realme, by the shirifs of shires, and other officers. Whobest, when he vnderstood that the Danes changed their purpose, and would not hold on their iourneie, he dismissed part of his power, and sent them home againe, keeping the residue all the winter with him in England, readie for his defense, if anie rebellion or other necessitie should befall.

The same yeare, he kept his Christmasse at Glocestre, and made his sonne Henrie knight at Westminster in Whitsunweeke insuing. Shortly after, calling together aswell lords spirituall as temporall, he caused them all to sweare fealtie to him and his heires after him in the possession of this kingdome.

About this season, the people in all places were pitifullie plagued with burning feuers, which brought manie to their end: a murren also came to their castell, whereof a wonderfull number died. At the same time (which is more maruellous) came fowles, as hens, geese, & peacocks, forsaking their owners houses, fled to the woods and became wild. Great hurt was done in manie places of the realme by fire, and speciallie in London, where vpon the 7. daie of Julie a sudden flame began, which burnt Pauls church, and a great part of the citie downe to the verie ground.

Now when king William had taken the oth of fealtie and loialtie of all his lords, Edgar Etheling, who was reconciled vnto his fauour (as you haue heard) obtaining licence of him to depart the realme for a season, sailed into England with two hundred souldiers: of whose acts there and returne into England I spare to speake, because I find little or nothing of moment recorded. And now king William, who hauing brought the Englishmen so lowe and bare, that little more was to be got out of their hands, went once againe ouer into Normandie with an huge masse of money, where some after he fell sicke, so that he was constrained to keepe his bed longer than he had bene accustomed to do, whereat Philip the French king in iesting maner said, that king William his cousine laie now in childbed (alluding belike to his big bellie, for he was verie copulent) and withall added; Wh what a number of candels must I prouide to offer vp at his going to church! certaine I thinke that 100000. will not suffice, &c. This trumping speech so moued the king, that he made this answer: Well, I trust when I shall be churched, that our couline shall be at no such cost, but I will helpe to find him a thousand candels my selfe, and light them for, to some of their paines, if God grant me life. Which promise he bound with an oth, and in deed performed. For in Julie next insuing, when their corne, fruit, and grapes were most flourishing, and readie for the sickle, he entred France with a great armie, set fire on manie of their cities and townes in the westside of that countrie, & came at last to the citie of Auant, which he burnt with the church of our ladie, and an ankresse inclosed in the wall thereof as an holie closet, for the force of the fire was such as all went to wrecke. In this heat king William toke such a sicknesse (which was likewise aggravated by the fall of an horse as he rode to and fro, because he was not able to trauell on foot about his palace by reason of his discale) that cost him his life; so that when he had ordeined his last will, and taken order for the state of things after his decease, he departed this life on the 9. day of September, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauour 1087. and 74. (as Polydor saith) of his age, hauing gouerned Normandie about 51. yeres, and reigned ouer England 20. yeres, ten moneths, and 28. daies (as all writers do report.)

Not long before his death, he released his brother Ado bishop of Bayeux out of prison, Marchar earle of Northumberland, and Wilmotus the sonne of king Harold, or (as some say) his brother. Whereouer he repented him (as some say) when he lay on his deathbed of his cruell dealing with the English, considering that by them he had attained to such honour and dignitie, as to weare the crowne and scepter of a kingdome: but whether he did so or not, or that some monke deuised the excuse in fauour of the prince: surelie he was a puissant prince, and though his time was troublesome, yet he was right fortunate in all his attempts. Againe, if a man shall consider that in a strange realme he could make such a conquest, and so easily and readilie assure the same to his heires, with new lawes, orders, and constitutions (which are like for euer to endure) he would thinke it a thing altogether void of credit. Yet so it was, & so honourable were his doings in the sight of the world, that those kings, which succeeded liethens his death, begin their account account at him, as from one that had by his prudence renewed the state of the realme, and instituted an other forme of regiment, in attaining whereof he did not so much pretend a rightfull challenge by the grant of his cosine king Edward the Confessor, as by the law of armes and plaine conquest, than the which (as he supposed) there could be no better title.

He bare but two lions or rather leop-ards as some thinke.

Whereupon also those that haue sithens succeeded him, vse the same armes as peculiar to the crowne of England, which he vsed in his time; namelye, three li. ns passant gold in a field gewels (as Polydor writeth) the three floure delices were sith that time annexed thereto by Edward the third, by reason of his claime to the crowne of France, whereof hereafter ye shall heare. Among other greivances which the English susteined by the hard deling of the Conquerour, this is to be remembred, that he brought Jewes into this land from Rouen, and appointed them a place to inhabit and occupie.

Polydor.

There be that write, how the inconstancie of the English people by their oft rebellions occasioned the king to be so rough and rigorous against them; whereas (of his naturall disposition and proper inclination) he was rather gentle and courteous than sharpe and cruel. But sith he continued his extremitie euen to his last daies, we may rather beleue, that although from his childehood he shewed signs tokens of clemencie, bountie, and liberalitie; yet by following the wars, and practising to reigne with sternesse, he became so inured therewith, that those peaccable vertues were quite altered in him, and in maner clearely quenched. He was inuend with a certeine stoutnesse of courage and skill in feats of warre, which good hap euer followed: he was free from lecherous lusts, without suspicion of bodilie vices, quicke of wit, desirous of honor, painefull, watchfull, and able to tolerate heat and cold, though he were tall of stature, and verie grosse of bodie.

Toward the end of his daies he wearied verie deuout, and became desirous to aduance the state of the church, inasmuch that he builded three abbeies in three seuerall places, endowing them with faire lands and large possessions, one at the place where he hauy quitted king Harold, five miles from Hastings, which he named Battell, of the field there fought: the other at Celby in Northeshire: and the third in Normandie at Caen, where his wife Quene Maud had builded a nunnery, which Maud died in the yere 1084. before the decease of the king hir husband.

After his death, his bodie was buried in Caen, in S. Stephens church; but before it could be committed to the ground, the executors were constrained to agree with the lord of the soile where the church stood, which (as he said) the king in his life time had in turlouslie taken from him, and gaue him a great summe of monie to release his title.

By this we may consider the great miserie of mans estate, in that so mightie a prince could not haue so much ground after his death as to couer his dead carps, without doing iniurie to another. This also may be a speciall lesson for all men, and namelye for princes, noblemen, and gentlemen, who oftentimes to enlarge their owne commodities, doe not regard what wrong they offer to the inferiour sort.

The said king William had by Maud his wife the daughter of Balduine earle of Flandres, fourte sonnes, Robert surnamed Curthose (unto whome he bequeathed the duchie of Normandie) Richard who died in his youth, William surnamed Rufus, to whom he gaue by testament the realme of England, and Henrie surnamed Beauclerke for his cunning, knotwledge and learning, unto whom he bequeathed all his treasure and moueable goods, with the possessions that belonged to his mother. Besides these fourte sonnes, he had also by his said wiffe five daughters, Cecillie, who became a nunne; Constance, who was married to Alane duke of Britaine: Adela, who was giuen in marriage to Stephan earle of Blois (of whom that Stephan was boine which reigned after Henrie the first) Adelliza, who was promised in marriage to Harold king of England (as before you haue heard) but she died yer the was married either to him, or to any other, and so likewise did the fifth, whose name I cannot reherse.

But to conclude, though king William held the English so binder foot, that in his daies almost no Englishman bare any office of honor, or rule in his time, yet he somewhat fauoured the citie of London, and at the earnest sute of William a Norman then bishop of that see, he granted vnto the citizens the first charter, which is written in the Saxon tongue, scaled with greene wax, and expessed in viij. or ix. lines at the most, cremplified according to the copie, and so printed, as followeth.

But howsoever he vsed the rest of the English, this is recorded of some writers, that by his rigorous proceedings against them, he brought to passe that the countrie was so rid of theues and robbers, as that at length a maid might haue passed through the land with a bag full of gold, and not haue met with any misdoer to haue bereft hir of the same: a thing right strange to consider, sith in the beginning of his reigne there were such routs of outlawes and robbers, that the peaceabler people could not be safely possessed of their owne houses, were the same neuer so well fortified and defended.

Among manie lawes made by the said William, this one is to be remembred, that such as forced any woman, should lose their genitals.

William, surnamed Rufus or William the Red, second sonne to William Conque-

England the ninth of Sep-the 37. of Philip the first, reigning in Scotland. Immediatlie after his fa-with no lesse speed than was possible, and following the counsell of Lanfranke archbishop of Cantuar-rie (in whome he reposed all his trust) he sought to win the fauour of the Peers and Nobilitie of the realme by great and liberrall gifts. For although there were but few of the homeborne States that bare rule in the land at this season; yet those that remained, and whome his father in extreme sort had wronged, he verie gentlie entertained, promising them not onlie to continue their good lord and souereigne, but also to make more sauourable ordinaces than his father had left behind him; and furthermore to restore the former lawes and liberties of the realme, which his said father had abolished. Thus by faire words and policie he obtained his purpose.

The Nobles at the first wished rather to haue had the elder brother duke Robert to haue gouerned them: whobeyt by the aide onelie of the said Lanfranke, whose auctoritie was of no small force amongst all the lords of the land, this William (according to his fathers assignation) was proclaimed and crowned at Westminister on the 26. of September (being Sunday, the 6. kalends of October) and the 11. indiction, as the best writers do report.
After his coronation, to gratifie the people, he went to Winchester, where he found great treasure which his father had laid by there for his owne vse; this he freely spent in large gifts, and all kind of princelie largesse. He set verie manie prisoners at libertie, & did many other things to benefit the people, wherein the diligence and good aduice of Lanfranke did not a little preuaile. For he perceiued that there was in the king a variable mind, an vnstable nature, and a disposition to lightnesse and follie. Wherefore he tooke oftentimes the more paines in perswading him not onelie to liberrallitie (which is none of the least vertues in a prince) but also to vse a discret and orderlie behauiour in all his doings. Moreover, he sticked not to put him in feare of an euill end, and troublesome regiment likelie to insue, if he did giue himselfe to vice and wilfulnesse, & neglect the charge thus by the prouidence of GOD committed to his hands. After this maner did the said prelat trauele with the king, whom we will leaue at this time as it were hearkening to his admonitions, and set forth by the waie what his brother Robert did, whilst William Rufus his brother was occupied in such wife as you haue heard.

It happened that this Robert was abroad in Ger-manie, when king William his father died (whither he went to raise a power, to the intent he might there by obtaine the possession of Normandie, which he trusted to enioy in his fathers life time) where he re-ceiued newes of his death, he hasted straightwaies into Normandie, and there being iustlie receiued, was peaceablie proclaimed duke of that countie, with great gladnesse and shouting of the people.

After this, considering with himselfe how vnsuperable a thing it was for him, that his yonger brother should possesse the crowne of England, which of right (as he said) belonged vnto him, by reason of his age; he determined with all expedition to passe the seas with an armie, and recouer that into his hands, which his father had giuen from him, partly (as it is thought) for his wilfulnesse and disobedience towards him, and partly also because he doubted that if he should leaue it vnto him, he would through his too much gentlenesse and facilitie, giue occasion to the English to resume strength, and thereby to reuolt.
Wherefore he iudged his yonger brother the fittest William (a man of a rougher nature) the master of the swaine for the gouernement.

As duke Robert was thus moued by his owne desire to bereane his brother of the dominion of England, so he was not a little incensed therunto by such of the English Nobilitie and Normans, as came daily ouer vnto him out of the realme, complaining of the present state of the world, as those that mistaked of the whole manner of regiment vied in the beginning of the reigne of his brother William. His uncle Ddo also (then bishop of Baſeour) furthered the matter all that he might. This Ddo was at first in great estimation with his brother the Conqueror, and bare great rule vnder him, till at length for enuie that the archbishop Lanfranke was preferred before him, he conspired against him, who understanding thereof, committed him forthwith to prison, where he remained, till the said prince then lieng on his death-bed, released and restored him to his former libertie. When the king was dead, William Rufus took him backe into England, supposing no lesse but to haue had a speciall friend and a trustie counsellor of him in all his affaires. But per long after his coming thither, he fell againe into the same offense of ingratitude, wherof he became culpable in the Conquerors daies: for perceiving that Lanfranke was so highlie esteemed with the king, that he could beare no rule, and partlie suspecting that Lanfranke had bene cheefe causer of his former imprisonment, he conspired with the rest against his nephew, and thereupon wrote sundrie letters ouer vnto duke Robert, counselling him to come ouer with an armie in all hast, to take the rule vpon him, which by his practise should easilie be compassed.

Duke Robert being thus animated on all sides, and yet wanting sufficient monie to the furniture of this iourne, engaged a portion of his duchie of Normandie, as the countie of Constantine to his youngest brother Henrie, for a great sum of gold, and therewith returned answer to the foresaid bishop, that he should prouide and loke for him vpon the south coast of England, at a certeine time appointed. Hereupon Ddo fortified the castell of Rochester, & began to make fore wars against the kings friends in Kent: he procured others of the complices also to do the like in other parts of the realme; and first on the west part of England, where Geoffrey bishop of Consans with his nephew Robert de Howbray earle of Poymoutherland setting forth from Wilsow, came toward Bath, which towne they took and sacked, and likewise Berkley, with a great part of Wiltshire, and brought the spoile and booties backe to Wilsow, where they had a castell stronglie fortified for their more safetie. In like maner Roger de Wygod, departing from Southwich, with great forraies overrode and robbed all the countie about, and couered such riches as he had gotten into the said citie. In like sort did Hugh de Grandmoull at Leicester, spoiling and waſking all the countie about him.

The earle of Shrewsburie called Roger de Mountgomerie, with a power of Welshmen set forth from Shrewsburie, and with him were William bishop of Durham the kings household chapline, Barnard of Peterburgh, Roger Lacie, and Wase Mortimer, (all Normans or Frenchmen) who ioyning their powers together, invaded the countie, and with fire and sword did much hurt where they came, killing and taking a great number of people. Afterwards coming to Worcester, they assaulted the citie, & terran the suburbs, & set the same on fire. For the citizens shutting fast the gates of their citie (though with the sudden coming of the enemies they were somewhat afraid) made valiant resistance: and consulting their gods, their wiues, and their children into the castell, got them to the walles and places of defense, to repell & beat backe the enemies. Among them in the towne was bishop Wolsan, whom the citizens would haue compelled to go into the castell for his surer safeguard, but he refused it.

At length it chanced that the enemies (continuing the said siege) began to war negligent, and ranged abroad in the countie, little regarding watch and ward about their campe; whereupon the English within the citie took this oportunitie, being moued thereto with the comfortable exhortation of bishop Wolsan, and sailing forth of the towne did set on their enemies with great fiercenes, whome they got at such aduantage, that they slue and took that daie about five hundred men (as Henrie of Huntingdon recordeth.) For the English bearing a continuall mallice in their hearts against the French and Normans, did now their best to be fullie reuenged of them, vpon so conuenient an occasion offered. Those that escaped by flight, hid themselves in the next townes, making such shifts for their liues as the present necessitie could minister.

Whilest the realme was thus troubled on eche side, archbishop Lanfranke sendeth writeth, and admonisheth all the kings friends to make themselves ready to defend their prince. And after he understood that they were assembled together for that purpose, he counselleth the king to march into the field with them speedilie, to repress his enemies. The king following his counsell, first appointed his nauie to scowle and keepe the seas, and to withstand (if it were possible) the arrivall of his brother by faire words. Also he reconciled Roger de Mountgomerie earle of Shrewsburie vnto him, and therewith maketh large promises to the English, that he would out of hand giue and restore vnto them such fauourable lawes as they would wish or desire. Whereouer he commanded all vnjust imposts, tolles and tallages to be laid downe, and granted free hunting in the woods, chafes and forrests. All which grants and promises he kept not long, though for the time he greatlie contented the people with such a shew of good meaning towards them. This done, he goeth with a mightie armie into Kent, where the sedition began, and first coming to the castell of Tunbridge, he compelled capteine Gilbert to yeld vp the fortreſſe into his hands. Then went he to Horne castell, where he heard saie Ddo was (but the report was untrue, for he had betaken himselfe to the castell of Pemsey) which when he had ouerthrowne, he passed forth vnto Pemsey, and besieged the castell there a long season, which the bishop had stronglie fortified.

During this time, and about the fiftieth daie after the beginning of the siege, word was brought to the king, that his brother duke Robert was landed at Southampton, and minded with all possible speed to come to the succour of the bishop, and of other his friends, whom he and his power had not a little assisted. ¶ Here authors varie: for some report that duke Robert came not ouer himselfe at the first at all, but sent a part of his armie, with a certeine number of ships, which encountering with the kings fleet, were discomfited. Others write that duke Robert hearing of the losse of his men, came after himselfe, and landed with a mightie armie as before, which is most likelie. And certeinlie (as Gemeticen, affirmeth) he might easilie as then haue recovered England from his brother, if he had not lingred the time, considering that Cusface earle of Bullongne, Ddo bishop of Baſeour, and the earle of Mortaigne, with other lords of Normandie that were passed to England, had already taken Rochester, and diuers other castels in the prouince of Canturburie, keeping the same a certeine time, still looking that he should haue come ouer to their aid, which he deferred to do, till they were constrained by siege and lacke of necessaries succor to returne into Normandie, leauing those places which they had won vnto the king, and that to their great bishopric. But howsoever it was, the king still continued the siege before Hereford castle, till Wdo (though want of victuals) was glad to submit himselfe, and promised to cause the castle of Rochester to be delivred: but at his coming thither, they within the citie suffered him to enter, and straightwaies laid him fast in prison. Some iudge that it was done under a colour by his owne consent.

Rochester besieged by the king.

There were in Rochester a sort of valiant gentlemen (the flower in manner of all Normandie) with Eustace earle of Bolougne, and manie gentlemen of Flanders, which were in mind to defend the place against the king: who hearing what was done, came with his armie and besieged the citie of Rochester on each side so sharpe, that they within were glad to deliver it up into his hands. Thus lost bishop Wdo all his livings and dignities in England, and so returned into Normandie, where under duke Robert he had the cheefe government of the countie committed unto him.

The bishop of Durham expelled.

After this he overcame divers of his enemies some by force and some by subtle meanes. Notwithstanding this, there yet remained the bishop of Durham, one of the cheefe conspirators, who withdrew himselfe into the citie of Durham, there to lie in safety, till he saw how the world would go: but being therein besieged by the king, who came thither personally, he was at length forced to surrender the citie, and yield himselfe: whereupon also he was expelled the land, with diverse of his complices. But twelvemonths after, he was called home againe, and restored to his church, wherein he lived not long, but died for sorrow, because he could not cleare himselfe of offence in the said rebellion, albeit that he laboured most earnestly so to do, that he might thereby have attained to the kings favour againe.

Whilist these things were thus in hand, the archbishop Lanfranke fell sicke and dieth, in the 19. yeare after his first entering into the government of the see of Canturburie. This Lanfranke (as should seme) was a wise, politike, and learned prelate, who whilist he lived, mollified the furious and cruell nature of king William Rufus, instructing him to forbear such wild and outrageous behaviours as his youthfullnesse was inclined unto: and moreover persuaded the English to obey the same king as their loiall prince, whereby they should occasion him to be their good lord and king, not using them rigorously as his father had done. So that Lanfranke could not well have bene spared in the time of the rebellion, without great danger of subverting the state of the commonwealth. He builded two hospitals without the citie of Canturburie, for the releefe of poore people and strangers, the one of S. John, the other at Sparbaldone. He advanced the church of Rochester from foure secular clerkes, to the number of fiftie monkes: he repaired Christes church in Canturburie, and the abbey of S. Albons, whereof he made one Paule that was his nephew abbat, which Paule governed that house by his uncles assistance greatlie to the advancement thereof, as well in temporall as spirituall preferments, as it was then indged. Likewise the said Lanfranke was verie fortunate in the government of his church and see of Canturburie, recovering sundrie portions of lands and rents alienated from the same before his daies, insomuch that he restored to that see 25. manors. For amongst other, whereas Wdo the Bishop of Bayeux, who also was Earle of Kent, bearing great rule in England under his nephew king William the Conquerour, had usurped diverse possessions which belonged to the see of Canturburie, and had seized the franchises appertaining to the same Lanfranke, into his owne hands, by suite and earnest travail he recovered the same, and being impleaded about that matter by the said Wdo, he so defended his cause, that in the end (though with much woo) he had his will, and so remained in quiet possession of his right after that so long as he lived, without any trouble or vexation concerning the said possessions and liberties.

Whereas also not onlie Walkhem the bishop of Winchester, but diverse other bishops in England were in mind to have displaced monkes out of their cathedrall churches, and to have brought canons into their houses, Lanfranke withstood them, and would tolerate no such dislocation: an act at that time so well liked, that he was highlie commended for the same. After Lanfrankes death, the king began greatlie to forget himselfe in all his dealings, insomuch that he kept many concubines, and was verie cruell and inconstant in all his doings, so that he became an heauie burthen unto his people. For he was so much addicted to gather goods, that he considered not what pertained to the maiestie of a king, insomuch that nothing tending to his gaine, and the satiffing of his appetite, was esteemed of him unlawfull, sith he measured all things by the uncontrolled rule of his roialtie, and considered nothing what so high an office required. He kept the see of Canturburie foure yeares in his hands, to see who would give most for it, in the meane time taking the profits thereof, and making the uttermost of the same that by any meanes could be devised.

Lanfranke praised for holding with the monkes.

The king given to sensual lust and covetousnesse.

The like he used when other benefices and abbeies were vacant, and furthermore that little which the prince spared, his officers and farmers, no lesse covetous than he, converted to their advantage: so that what by the king, and what by his procurators, the church of England was now sore charged and siced of hir wealth. Diverse of hir prelates in like manner were not a little offended, to see their mother so spoiled of hir treasure and livelihood, insomuch that they practised a redresse: and to begin withall, complained of the king to pope Urban: but he was so busied with other troubles of his owne nearer home, that he could have no time to seeke meanes how to redresse enormities a far off, whereby the lands and goods belonging to the church here in England were still wastfullie spent and consumed by the king and others, to whom he gave or let them forth to farme at his owne pleasure, and to his most commotie.

But albeit the prince was of such a disposition by nature, yet there is one thing written of him which ought not to be forgotten, to admonish vs that there is no man of so evil an affection, but that sometime he dealeth uprightlie, though it be by hap or other extraordinary motion. It chanced that an abbeie was void of an abbat, wherein were two monkes verie courteous persons about the rest, and such as by scraping and gathering together, were become verie rich, for such (saith Polydor) in those daies mounted to preferment. These two appointed to go together to the court, each hoping at their coming thither to find some meanes that he might be made abbat of that house. Being thus agreed, to the court they come, and there offer verie largelie to the king to obtaine their sute: who perceiuing their greedy desires, and casting his eyes about the chamber, espied by chance an other monke (that came to beare them companie, being a more sober man, and simple after his outward appearance) whom he called unto him, and asked what he would give him to be made abbat of the foresaid abbeie. The monke after a little pause, made answer, that he would give nothing at all for any such purpose, since he entered into that profession of mere zeale to despise riches & all worldly pompe, to the end he might the more quietlie serve God in holinesse & puritie of conversation. Saiesst thou so, quoth

But to returne to our historie. After the expulsion of the bishop of Durham, and other of his adherents, the king passed ouer into Normandie, purposing to depriue his brother of that dukedome, and being arrived there, he besieged and toke S. Valerie, Albemarle, and diuerse other townes and castles, wherein he placed a number of his best souldiers, the better to mainteine warre against his foresaid brother. Whereupon also the said Robert sent vnto the French king for aid, who came downe at his request with a noble armie, and besieged one of those castles which king William had lately wonne; howbeit by such means as king William made, in sending to the French king an huge summe of monie, he raised his siege shortly & returned home againe. At length a peace was concluded betwixt king William and the duke his brother, but yet verie dishonorable to the said Robert: for it was accorded, that king William should retaine & still intop the countie of Cwe, with Herehampe, the abbacie of mount S. Michell, Eversberg, and all those other places which he had wonne & gotten out of his hands in this his late boiaage. On the other side it was agreed, that king William should aid the duke to recouer all other places beyond the sea, which belonged to their father. Also, that such Normans as had lost anie of their lands & livinges in England, for taking part with the duke in the late rebellion, should be restored to the same. And furthermore, that whether soeuer of both should die first, the survivor should be his heire, and succeed in his dominions.

This peace was concluded at Caen, and that by procurement of the French king, at what time king William was verie strong in the field neare vnto Cwe. After which conclusion, they united their powers, and besieged their yongest brother Henrie in the castell of mount S. Michell, which (being situated in the confines of Normandie and Britaine) he had strongly fortified not long before for feare of assaults. But when they had lien about it by the space of all the best season, and had made manie bickerings with his men, more to their losse than lucre, they raised their siege, and voluntarilie departed. Not long after this, king William depriued Edgar Etheling of his heroe, which duke Robert had assigned vnto him, beaushing him out of Normandie for euer.

Shortly after also the aforesaid Henrie won a strong towne called Damfront, and furnishing it at all points he kept the same in his possession as long as he lived, mauer both his brethren. Thus the warres hat betwixt those three, holobest suddenly & without vpon what occasion) this Henrie was reconciled with king William and his brother Robert, so that all debates being quietted on euerie side, they were made friends and wellwillers. King William also returned into England, hauing his brother Robert in his companie, all men reioicing at their pacification and amitie, which happened in the yeare 1091. and fourth of the reigne of the king.

Toward the end wherof, and vpon the first daie of October, a marvellous sore tempest fell in sundrie parts of England, but especiallie in the towne of Winchcombe, where (by force of thunder and lightning) a part of the steeple of the church was throwne downe, and the crucifix with the image of Marie standing vnder the rood-loft, was likewise overthrowne, broken, and shattered in peces; then followed a foule, a noisome, and a most horrible stinke in the church. On the 17. daie of the same moneth much harme was done in London with an outragious wind, the violence wherof ouerturned and rent in peces aboue five hundred houses, at which time and tempest the roose of S. Marie bolue church in cheape was also overthrowne, wherewith two men were slaine. Moreover, at Salisbury much hurt was done with the like wind and thunder, for the top of the steeple and manie buildings besides were soe shaken and cast downe. But now we will speake somewhat of the doings of Scotland, as occasion inoueth. Whilist (as yee haue heard) variance depended betwixt king William and his brother duke Robert, the Scottish king Malcolme made sore wars vpon the inhabitants of Northumberland, carrying great booties and preies out of that countie, which he invaded euen to Chester in the street. Wherefore king William, sone after his returne, gathered his power together, and sped him northwards. But king Malcolme hearing of his puissance & great strength sent to him for peace, which was granted in the end.

Some writers affirme, that king William prepared a great armie both by sea and land against Malcolme; and that his nauie being abroad on the seas, was lost by tempest, and the most part of his ships drownded; that the armie by land entring into Scotland, suffered manie damages through want of vittels, and so recoiled: finaltie, that duke Robert lying on the borders with an armie in his brothers name (wherby it should appeare that the king himselfe was not there) by the helpe and furtherance of Edgar Etheling, who then serued him, Malcolme in his wars, concluded a peace betwixt his brother and the said Malcolme, vpon certeine articles, by vertue wherof certeine places in Northumberland were restored vnto Malcolme, which he had held in William Conquerours daies. Some other write in like manner, that king Malcolme did homage to king William and duke Robert that brought the said Edgar Etheling into the fauour of the king.

Whosoever the truth of the storie doth stand in this behalfe, certeine it is, that the king returned out of Northumberland into the west parts of the realme, reteining still with him duke Robert, who looked daile when he should performe such covenants as were concluded vpon betwixt them in their late reconciliation. But when he saw that the king meant nothing lesse than to stand to those articles, and how he did onlie protract and delaye the time for some other secret purpose, he returned into Normandie in great displeasure, and toke with him the said Edgar Etheling, of whom he aluokes made verie great account. Sone after king William returned into the north parts, and (as it chanced) he staied a few daies about Carleil, where being delisted with the situation of the towne (which had bene destroyed by the Danes two hundred yeares before) he set workemen to repaire the same (meaning to vse it in stead of a bulworke against the Scots on those west borders) which when he had fenced with walles, and builded a castell in the most convenient place thereof, he caused churches and houses to be erected for the benefit of such people as he had determined to bring vnto the same. This being done, he placed a colonie of southren men there with their wiues and children, and gaue large priuileges vnto the towne, which they intop at this daie.

¶ Here haue I thought good to aduertise you of an error in Math. ged the earldome of Chester with Rafe o^r Kanulfe de Picenis, alias Hefchines, for the earldome of Carleil, which the said Hefchines held before, and had begunne there to build and fortifie that towne: whereas it is certeine that Kanulfe de Hefchines came to enioy the earldome of Chester by way of inheritance, as after shall appeare. For better profe thereof ye shall vnderstand, that we find by ancient records, how one Hugh Lou o^r Lupus enioied the earldome of Chester all the daies of the Conqueror, and long after, which Hugh was sonne to Richard earle of Auranges and the countesse Emma daughter of a noble man in Normandie named Herlotwin, who married Arlet the daughter of a burgeisse in Fflais, and mother to William Conquerour. So that the said Hugh, being sisters sonne to the Conquerour, receiued by gift at his hands the earldome of Chester, to hold of him as frælie by right of the sword, as he held the realme of England in title of his crowne. For these be the words: Tenendum sibi & heredibus ita liberè ad gladium sicut ipse (Rex) totam tenebat Angliam ad coronam.

Earle Hugh then established in possession of this earldome, with most large priuileges and freedoms, for the better gouernement thereof, ordeined vnder him foure barons; namelie, his cousine Pigell o^r Deal baron of Halton, sir Piers Palbanke baron of Hauntych, sir Cusace * baron of Hatwasse, and sir Warren Meron baron of Shipbroke. Pigell held his baronie of Halton by seruite, to lead the Clauitgard of the earles armie when he should make any iourne into Wales; so as he should be the foremost in marching into the enemies countrie, and the last in comming backe: he was also constable and marshall of Chester. From this Pigell o^r Deal, the Ladies that were earles of Lincolne had their originall. When earle Hugh had gouerned the earldome of Chester the terme of 40. yeares, he departed this life, in the yeare 1107. He had issue by his wife Armetrida, Richard the second earle of Chester after the conquest; Robert, abbat of Saint Edmundburie; and Dtnell, tutor to the children of king Henric the first. Moreover, the said earle Hugh had a sister named Margaret, that was married to John Bohun, who had issue by hir, Kanulfe Bohun, otherwise called Hefchines, which Kanulfe by that meanes came to enioy the earldome of Chester in right of his mother (after that earle Richard was downed in the sea) and not by exchange for the earldome of Carleil, as by this which we haue already recited may sufficientlie be proued.

Now to returne where we left. After that king William Rufus had given order for the building, fortifying, and peopling of Carleil, he returned southwards, and came to Gloucester, where he fell into a greuous and dangerous sicknesse; so that he was in despaire and doubt of his life: wherefore he repented him of his former misdoeds, and promised (if he escaped that dangerous sicknesse) to amend and become a new man. But when he had his health, that promise was quickelie broken, for his doings which were so bad and wicked before his sicknesse, being compared with those which followed after his recovery, might haue bene reputed god and sufferable.

Moreover, whereas he retained and kept in his hands the bishopricke of Canturburie the space of foure yeares, he now bestowed it vpon Anselme, who was before abbat of Becchellouin in Normandie; and for certeine abbies which he had held long time in his possession, he ordeined abbats: by meane whereof all men (but especiallie the spiritualtie) began to conceiue a verie good opinion of him. The yere where in Anselme was thus elected, was from the birth of our Saviour 1093. on the first of March, being the first fundaie in Lent (as Eadmerus recordeth.) Furthermore he gaue the see of Lincolne (being void by the death of bishop Remigius) to his counsellour Robert Bluet; but afterward repenting himselfe of such liberalitie, in that he had not kept it longer in his hands towards the enriching of his coffers, he deuised a shift how to wipe the bishops nose of some of his gold, which he performed after this maner. He caused the bishop to be sued, quarelinglie charging him that he had wrongfullie vsurped certeine possessions, together with the citie of Lincolne, which appertained to the see of Poike. Which although it was but a forged cauallation, and a shamefull buttruff; yet could not the bishop be deliuered out of that trouble, till he had paid to the king five thousand pounds. And as he dealt with the spiritualtie, so he caused diuerse of the probilitie to be put to greuous fines, for transgressing of his lawes, though the fault were neuer so little. He also caused the archbishop Anselme to paie him a great summe of monie, vnder colour of a contribution which was due in Lanfrankes daies, though it was certeinlie knowne that Lanfranke had paid it. Thus grew king William from time to time more sharpe and rigorous to his subiects, so that whosoever came within the danger of the lawes, was sure to be condemned; and such as would plaie the promoters and giue informations against any man for transgressing the lawes, were highlie rewarded.

In this first yeare there chanced such an excessive raine, and such high floods, the riuers overflowing the low grounds that lay nere vnto them, as the like had not bene seene of many yeares before; and afterwards insued a sudden frost, whereby the great streames were congeled in such sort, that at their dissoluing o^r thawing, manie bridges both of wood and stone were borne downe, and diuerse water-milles rent vp and caried awaie.

Furthermore, king William perceiuing that by his cruell and conetous gouernment, sundrie of his subiects did dallie steale out of the realme, to liue in foreine countries, he published a proclamation, charging that no man should depart the realme without his licence and safe-conduct. Whereof it is thought, that the custome rose of forbidding passage out of the realme, which oftentimes is vsed as a law, when occasion seruet. Some after, he went against the Welshmen, whom he vanquished in battell nere to Beckknocke, and slue Rees their king, who had done much hurt within the English borders, when he was their incamped. This Rife o^r Rees was the last king that reigned ouer the Welshmen, as authors affirme: for afterwards, though they oftentimes rebelled, yet the kings of England were reputed and taken as supreme gouernors of that part of the Island. Moreover, to haue the countrie the better in quiet, he did cut downe their woods, and builded manie castles and piles in places conuenient, by meanes whereof they were somewhat tamed, and trained in due time to obedience, though not at the first, nor in the daies of sundrie of his successors.

Having thus finished his iourne into Wales, Malcolme king of Scotland came vnto Gloucester to see the king, and to common with him of sundrie matters touching the peace betwixt both the realms, as he returned homewards: but because king William disdained to enterteine him in such pompous maner as he expected and made account of; and forsomuch as he did not at the verie first admit him to his presence, the said Malcolme returned into Scotland in great displeasure, and immediatlie raising a power, entred into England, destroying the country vnto Alnewike castell, where he was so cruictoned with an ambushment laid by Robert earle of Hereford.

thamberland, that he and his eldest sonne Edward were slaine. At which mishap his whole host being utterly discomfited, fled out of the field, with the losse of manie, whereof some were slaine, and some taken by pursute. Thus came king Malcolme to his end (by the iust prouidence of God) in that prouince whiche he had wasted and spoiled at five severall times, as first in the daies of king Edward, when earle Tostie was gone to Rome; the second time, in the daies of William Conquerour, when he spoiled Cleueland; thirdlie, in the same Conquerours daies, whilest bishop Walkher possessed the see of Durham, at that time all the countrie was spoiled and forraied, even to the river of Tyne; fourthlie, about the fourth or fift yeare of the reigne of this William Rufus, at which time he entered the land as farre as Chester in the street, whilest king William was in Normandie; the fift time was now, when he lost his life on saint Wices day, by the hands of a verie valiant knight named Morkell. King Malcolme being thus surprised by death, his bodie was buried at Tinnmouth (as in the Scottish histories more plainlie appeareth) where also ye may find, how the sonnes of king Malcolme were aided by king William Rufus to obtaine the crowne of Scotland, whereunto they were interested; whereas otherwise by the force and practise of their uncle Donald they had bene kept from the scepter and crowne of the kingdome.

This yeare England and Normandie were forevered with mortalitie both of men and beasts, insomuch that tillage of the ground was laid aside in manie places, by reason whereof there folowed great dearth & famine. Manie grizelie and hideous sights were seene also in England, as hosts of men fighting in the aire, flashes of fier, stars falling from heauen, and such like strange wonders. About this time new occasions of breach of amitie grew betwixt the king and his brother Robert, who accused him of perjurie, for not observing the articles of the last peace concluded betwixt them: wherefore he purposed to saile over into Normandie, and so came unto Hastings, about the first of Februarie, where he sojourned for a time, and caused the church of Battell abbey to be dedicated in the honour of S. Martin. He deprivd Herbert bishop of Hereford of his bishopps staffe, because he meant to have stoline away secretly to Rome, and there to have purchased absolution of pope Urban for his bishopricke, which he had bought of the king for himselfe; and likewise for the abbacie of Winton, which he had purchased for his father, paying for them both a thousand pounds.

the king and his brother.

Math. West.

After this, about midlent he passed over into Normandie with an armie, purposing to trie the matter with his brother in plaine battell, that thereby he might rather grow to some certaine point of losse or lucre, than to stand ever upon uncertainties, whether to have peace or war, that he must be constrained to be at all times in a readinesse to defend himselfe. But after he was come into Normandie, & had forraied part of the countrie once or twice, he fell to a parole with his brother duke Robert, & in the end descended to put the matter in compromise to the arbitrement of certaine graue persons, whose iudgement the king reiected, because they gaue not sentence on his side. Whereupon both parts prepared for war afresh, insomuch that the king persecuting how his brother was aided by the French king, and that his power was to weak to withstand them both, he sent his commission into England for the levying of 20. thousand men, commanding that they should be sent over unto him into Normandie by a daie, which was diligently performed. But as they were come together about Hastings, readie to enter a shipboard, immediatlie cometh the kings lieutenant with a countermand, and signifieth to them, that the king minding to fauour and spare them for that iourne, would that euerie of them should giue him 10. shillings (as Matt. Paris hath, or 20. shillings as others haue) towards the charges of the war, and thereupon depart home with a sufficient safeconduct, which the most part were better content to do, than to commit themselves to the fortune of the sea, and bloudie successe of the wars in Normandie. In deed king William changing his mind, was now determined to end the matter with monie, and not with the sword, as it afterward appeared: for by bribing of king Philip, in whome duke Robert had reposed his whole trust, he concluded peace upon such articles and conditions as he himselfe required.

Having dispatched his businesse in Normandie, he returned into England, where he happened to meet with new and more dangerous wars: for the Welshmen hearing of the variance betwixt the brethren, after their accustomed maner begin to invade the English marches, taking botties of cattell, destroying the countries, killing and spoiling many of the kings subjects, both English and Normans. After this (waxing proud of their good successe) they besieged the castell of Mountgomerie, where though the garison made stout resistance for a time, yet in the end the enimie finding shift to overthrow the walles, entred perforce, and slue all that they found within. Wherewith though king William was offended when he heard of it, yet could he not remedie the matter as then, being troubled with a conspiracie netolie kindled against him by Robert earle of Poorthumberland, who upon displeasure conceived against him (because he was not rewarded nor thanked at his hands for his good seruice shewed in the killing of Malcolme king of Scotland) refused to come unto him being sent for by letters, and herewith began to practise with certaine other Noble men of that countrie, how to depose king William. But per he could bring anie peece of his purpose to passe, the king having advertisement of his attempt, first appointed his brother the lord Henrie to go thither with an armie, and forthwith foloweth himselfe; and coming to Petercastell, where the most part of his complices were assembled, he surprised them yer they could haue time to provide for their safetie. That done, he went to Tinnmouth, and in the castell took the earles brother there, and after came to Banbourgh castell, which the said earle with his wife and children did hold for their better safeguard and defense.

in example to others. The earle himselfe was conue-ed to Winchester castle, and there committed to prison.

Some write that the meaning of the earle and his complices, amongst whom was William earle of Clare, his renouncing his allegiance to Robert duke of Normandie, was become the kings man) was to haue displaced the king from his roiall throne, and to haue set by his sonne William de Al-bemarke, whom he had begotten of his concubine.
But whatsoeuer their purpose was, after that the king had quieted his countrie in the north parts, he bent all his force against the Welshmen, who the yeare before had destroyed and ouerthrowne the castell of Youngomerie, and slaine the Normans that laie there in garison to defend it, whereat he was ve-rie much offended, & therefore entering into Wales, he began to spoile and wast the countrie. For he saw that the Welshmen would not ioine in battell with him in the plaine field, but kept themselves still a-loose within the woods and marishes, and aloft vpon mountaines: albeit oftentimes when they saw aduantage, they would come forth, and taking the Englishmen and Normans at vnawares, kill manie, and wound no small numbers, he still pursued them by hills and dales, though more to the losse of his owne people than the hurt of the Welshmen, who easilie eschewed the danger of battell, and still at the straites and comber some passages distressed manie of their enemies: whereby the king at length percei-ning that he could not preuaile against them, ceased further to follow on with his purposed voyage, and therewith returned home, not without some note of dishonour.

About the same time Dungherbach king of Ireland, with the clergie and people of the cite of Dublin, elected one Samuell a monke of S. Albons, an Irish man home, to the gouernement of the church and bishops see of Dublin, and (according to the ancient custome) presented him by sufficient letters of testimonie vnto Anselme archbishop of Canturburie, to be consecrated of him, who (according to their request) did so, and receiued from him a promise of his canonically subiection, after the old vsuall maner, hauing foure bishops (suffragans to the see of Canturburie) ministering to him at that consecration.

In like maner, pope Urban calling a counsell at Clermont in Auerngne, exhorted the christian princes so earnestlie to make a iourneie into the holie-land, for the recouerie thereof out of the Saracens hands, that the said great and generall iourneie was concluded vpon to be taken in hand; wherein manie noble men of christendome went vnder the leading of Godfrey of Bullion, and others, as in the chronicles of France, of Germanie, and of the holie land doth more plainlie appeare. There went also among other diuers noble men forth of this reline of England, speciallie that worthilie bare the surname of Beauchamp. Robert duke of Normandie minding also to go the same iourneie, and wanting monie to furnish and set forth himselfe, mortgaged his duchie of Normandie to his brother king William, for the summe of ten thousand pounds. About this time another occasion was offered vnto king William, to laie a new payment vpon his subiects, so greuous and intolerable, as well to the spirituallie as the temporalitie, that diuerse bishops and abbats, who had already made away some of their chalices and church iewels to paie the king, made now plaine answer that they were not able to helpe him with any more. Vnto whom on the other side (as the report went) the king said againe: Haue you not I beseech you) coffins of gold and silver full of dead mens bones: meaning the shynes wherein the reliques of saints were inclosed. Which (as his words seemed to import) he would haue had them conuert into mo-nie, therewith to helpe him in that need, iudging it no sacrilege, though manie did othertwise esteeme it, considering (as he pretended) that it was gathered for so godlie an vse, as to mainteine warres against Infidels and enemies of Christ.

The archbishop Anselme toke the worth of two hundred markes of silver of the iewels that belonged to the church of Canturburie (the greater part of the couent of monks twinkling thereat) towards the making vp of such payment as he was constrained to make vnto the king towards his aid at that time.
But because he would not leaue this for an example to be followed of his successours, he granted to the church of Canturburie the profits and reuenues of his manour of Petteham, vnto the vse of the same church for the terme of seauen yeares, which amounted to the summe of thirtie pounds yearelie in those daies.

Thus king William seeking rather to spoile the realme of England, than to preserue the roiall state thereof, after he had gotten together a great masse of monie, sailed ouer into Normandie, and there de-liuering vnto the duke the ten thousand pounds aforesaid, was put in possession of the duchie, to enioy the same, and the profits rising thereof, till the said ten thousand pounds were paid him againe: or (as some write) it was couenanted that in recompense thereof, the king should enioy the profits for terme onelic of thre yeares, and then to restore it without any further interest or commoditie. This done, he returned againe into England.

Now duke Robert setteth forward on his iourneie, in companie of other noble men, towards the holie land. In which voyage his valorous hart at all affaires (when any seruice should be shewed) was most manifestlie perceiued, to his high fame and renowne among the princes and nobilitie there and then assembled.

About the same time, the citizens of Waterford in Ireland, perceiuing that by reason of the great multitude of people in that cite, it was necessarie for them to haue a bishop, obtained licence of their king and rulers to erect in their cite a bishops see, and besought them that it might please them to write vnto Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie their pimate, to haue his consent therein, so as it might stand with his pleasure to institute and ordeine such a one bishop, to haue gouernement of their church, as they should name, knowing him to be a man of such learning, knowledge, discretion, and worthines, as were fit for the same. Wherevpon were letters sent by messengers from Dungherbach king of Ireland vnto Anselme, informing him of the whole matter: wherein one Malchus was commended and presented vnto him to be admitted and consecrated, if he thought good. These letters were subscribed with the hands, not onelic of king Dungherbach, but also of his brother duke Dermeth, bishop Dunald, Aidman bishop of Methe, Samuell bishop of Dublin, Ferdinachus bishop of Lagina, or Letnister, and many others both of the spirituallie and temporalitie.

Anselme considering their request to be full and necessarie, granted to fulfill their desires, and so vpon examination had of the man, and taking of him his oath of obedience, according to the maner, he consecrated the same Malchus, and so ordeined him to rule the church of Waterford as bishop. This was done at Canturburie the 28. day of October, Rafe bishop of Chichester, and Gundulfe bishop of Rochester helping Anselme in the consecration as ministers vnto him in that behalfe. The said Malchus was a monke,

But to the purpose, king William after his returne into England, remembryng what damage he had suffeyred two yeres before at the hands of the Welshmen, determined eynes to invade their countrie, and therefore doubling his power, cometh into the marches, pitcheth his field, and consulteth with his capteines what order he were best to use in that his enterpryse, for the taming of his enemies. The Welshmen hearing of the kings approach, and that his armie was farre greater than the last which he brought into their countrie, fell to their wonted policie, and got them into the woods, there to lie in wait, trusting more to the advantage of starting holes, than to their owne force & puissance.

When the king understood their practise, he set armed men in divers places, and builded towlers and fortifications to defend him and his, because he durst not assaie to enter into wild and wast grounds where he had bene hindred and damnyfied before that time, hoping by this meanes in stopping up the waies and passages of the countrie, to bring the rebels to more subjection. But when this policie was found by proofe to wearie the kings followers rather than to hurt the enemies, which straieng up and downe in the woods intrapped oftentimes the Normans and English, in taking them at advantage, the king without bringing his purpose to any good effect, departed home into England. After this, he sent Edgar Etheling with an armie into Scotland, that he might place his cosine Edgar the sonne of king Malcolme in the government of that kingdome, and expell his uncle Duffinald, who had usurped the same.

King William, being still inflamed with ire, for that he could not have his will, determined with continuall warres to wearie the rebellious stomachs of the Welshmen: and therefore was first to set upon them of Anglesey, which being an Ile environed with the sea, was ever a refuge for them when they were sharpelie pursued. This enterpryse was chieflie committed unto Hugh earle of Shrewsburie and Arundell, and to Hugh earle of Chester, who at their first coming wan the Ile, and tempered the victorie with great crueltie and bloudshed, putting out the eyes of some, cutting off the noses, the armes, or hands of others, and some also they gelded. Howsoever (as authors write) the said earle of Shrewsburie made a kenell of the church of Saint Fridancus, saving his hounds within it for the night time, but in the morning he found them all raging wood. How true so ever this report is I wote not, but thortlie after they had executed in manner as before is said) such strange kinds of crueltie in that Ile, it chanced that a naue of rowers came thither from the Isles of Orkney, whose chiefe admiral was named Magnus, who incountring with the said earle of Shrewsburie, shot him into the eie with an arrow, which part of his body remained bare and unarmed, so that by & by he fell downe dead out of his ship into the sea. When Magnus beheld this, he said scornfully in the Danish tongue, Zeit loupe, that is; Let him leape now: the English neuertheless had the victorie at that time (as some write) and overcame their enemies with great slaughter and bloudshed. Not long after, the earle of Chester going over to Wales, with long and continuall warres tired and fumed the wild Welshmen, who for a good while after durst not shew their faces.

The king being thus at quiet and without warre in all places, began now to set his mind on building, and first caused new walles to be made about the towler of London, and also laid the foundation of Westminster hall, which though it be a verie large and roomthie place, yet after it was finished at his returne out of Normandie, he came to view it, and held his court therein with great pompe and honor. He repented that he had made it no larger, saieing; it was to little by the halfe, and therefore determined to have made a new, and that this other should have served but for a dining chamber. A diligent searcher (saith Matthew Paris) might yet find out the foundation of the hall, which he had purposed to build, stretching from the Thames side unto the common street. But though those his buildings were great ornaments to the realme, yet because he took by monie by extortion of his subjects towards the charges of the same, he was evil spoken of; the report being spread, that he should take them in hand but onelie vnder a colour to spoile his subjects, in gathering a far greater summe than the expenses of them did amount unto. About the same time that king William beganne these buildings, he went over into Normandie, to understand in what state that countrie stood.

About the same time also, or rather two yeres before; to witt 1097. nere to Abington, at a towne called Finchamsted in Barkshire, a well or fountain flowed with blood, in manner as before it used to flow with water, and this continued for the space of thre daies, or (as William Malm. saith) fifteene daies together.

After the king had dispatched his businesse in Normandie, & was returned into England (as he was making provision to ride forth on hunting) a messenger came suddenly unto him, bringing word, that the cite of Mans was besieged, and like to be surprised. The king was then at dinner, meaning first to make an end thereof, and after to take advice in that matter: but being repowred by the messenger, for that to the great danger of his subjects which were besieged he passed not to make delays, rather than to go and succour them with all speed, he taketh the mans blunt speech in so good part, that he called straightwaie for masons to breake downe the wall, to the end he might passe through the next way, and not be driuen to step so farre out of his path, as to go forth by the doores: and so without any long aduancement taken in the cause, he rode straightwaie to the sea, sending his lords a commandement to follow; who when they came in his presence, counselled him to staie till his people were assembled. Howbeit he would not giue care to their aduice in that point, but said; Such as love me, I know well will follow me, and so went a shipboard, setting apart all doubts of perils; and yet was the weather verie darke, rough and cloude, insomuch that the maister of the ship was afraid, and willed him to tarrie till the wind did settle in some quiet quarter: but hee commanded to hoist up sailes, and to make all speed that could be for life, encouraging the shipmaister with these words, that he neuer heard as yet of any king that was drowned.

Thus passing the seas, he landed in Normandie, where he gathered his power, and made towards Mans. When those which held the siege before the cite, heard of his approach, they brake up their campe and departed thence: howbeit, the capteine named Helias, that pretended by title and right to be earle of Mans, was taken by a traine, and brought before the king, who tested at him, as though he had bene but a foole and a coward. Whereupon, the said Helias kindled in wrath, boldlie said unto him; Whereas thou hast taken me prisoner, it was by mere chance, and not by thy manhood: but if I were at libertie againe, I would so use the matter with thee, that thou shouldst not thinke I were a man so lightlie to be laughed at. So should (saith the king) Well then I giue

" giue thee thy libertie, and go thy waies, doe euen the " worst that lieth in thy power against me, for I care not a button for thee. Helias being thus set at libertic, did nothing after (to make anie account of) against the king, but rather kept himselfe quiet. Howbeit some write, that he was not taken at all, but escaped by flight. To proceed, king William being returned into England, and puffed vp with pride of his victories, and now seeing himselfe fullie deliue-red from all troubles of warre, began after his old manner to spoile and wast the countrey by unreasonable exactions, tributes and painments.

Whereupon fell a great controuersie betwene An-selme and the king, who pretended a reproch of cruell surcharging of his commons with subsidies, lones, and unreasonable fines: but the chiefe cause was, for that he might not call his synods, nor correct the bishops, but all to be done as the king would. The king also challenged the inuestiture of prelates, and indeed soe taxed both the spiritualtie and temporall tie, spending the monie vpon the reparations and buildings of the Towre, & Westminster hall, as is before remembred. Besides this, his seruants spoiled the English of their goods by indirect meanes: but especiallie one Maſe sometime chaplaine vnto William the Conquerour, & at this time the kings proctor and collector of his taskes and subsidies was so malicious & couctous, that in stead of two taskes, he would leuie three, pilling the rich, and potoling the poore, so that manie through his cruell dealing were oftentimes made to forfeit their lands for small offences: and by his meanes also diuerse bishoprikes were bought and sold as other kinds of merchandises, whereby he was in singular fauour with the king. The clergie also were vſed verie ſtreightlie, and (as I suppose) not without good cause; for ſuerlie in those daies it was far out of order, not onelie in couctous practises, but in all kinds of worldlie pompe and vanitie: for they had by busshed and beaded perukes, long side garments verie gorgeous, gilt girdels, gilt spurs, with manie other vnſemelie disorders in attire. To be short, the contention grew so hot betwixt the king and Anselme, who would also haue corrected such vices in the clergie (as some write) that in the end the archbishop was quite cast out of fauour. There are which alledge the verie first and originall occasion of their falling out to be, for that the archbishop denied to paie a thousand markes of silver at his request: in consideration of the kings great beneuolence shewed in preferring him to his see, whereas the archbishop iudged the offense of simonie, to rest as well in giuing after his promotion receiued, as if he had bidden him aforehand, and therefore refused to make anie such payment: but yet (as Eadmerus writeth) he offered him five hundred pounds of silver, which would not be receiued, for the king was informed by some of his counsell, that the archbishop (in consideration of his bound-ous liberalitie extended towards him) ought rather to giue him two thousand pounds, than five hundred, adding, that if he would but change his countenance, and giue him no frendlie looks for a while, he should perceiue that Anselme would ad to the first offer, other five hundred pounds. But Anselme was so far from being brought to the kings lure with such fetches, that openlie to the kings face he told him, that better it should be for his maiestie to receiue of him a small summe granted of him with a free and franke hart, so as he might helpe him effsones with more, than to take from him a great deale at once, without his good will, in such sort as if he were his bondman. For your grace (saith he) may haue me, and all that is mine, to serue your turne with frendlie beneuolence: but in the waie of seruitude and bondage you shall neither haue me nor mine. With which words the king was in maruel-lous choler, and therewith said in anger: Well then, get thee home, take that which is thine to thy selfe, that which I haue of mine thou shalt trust will suffice me. The archbishop being on his knees, rose herewith and departed, reioicing in his mind that the king had refused his offer, whereby he was deliuered out of suspicion to haue bribed the king, and giuen him that monie in waie of reward for his preferment to the miter, as of malicious men would happilie haue bene construed. Whereupon being after laboured to double the summe, he utterly refused, and determining rather to forsake the realme than to commit such an offense, made suit to the king for licence to go to Rome to fetch his pall of the pope.

The king hearing the pope named, waxed maruel-lous angrie: for they of Rome began already to demand donations and contributions, more impudentlie than they were hitherto accustomed. And as it chanced, there was a schisme at that time in the church, by reason the emperor Henrie had placed a pope of his owne aduancing (namely Wibeth archbishop of Rauenna) against pope Urban: for the em-perour maintained that it belonged to his office on-lie to elect and assigne what pope it pleased him.

King William therefore conceived displeasure against Urban, who withstood the emperours pretense, and alledged by the like, that no archbishop or bishop within his realme should haue respect to the church of Rome, nor to anie pope, with whom they had nothing to doe, either by waie of subiection, or otherwise; sith the popes wandered out of the steps which Peter trode, seeking after bribes, lucre, and worldlie honor. He said also that they could not retaine the power to lose and bind, which they sometime had, since they shewed themselves nothing at all to follow his most vertuous life and holie conuerſation.
He added furthermore, that for himselfe, sithens the conuerſion of the realme to the christian faith, he had as great authoritie, franchises and liberties within the same, as the emperor had in his empire. And what hath the pope then to doe (quoth he) in the empire, or in my kingdome touching temporall liberties, whose dutie it is to be carefull for the soule of man, and to see that heresies spring not by, which if the prelates of the prouince be not able to reforme, then might the pope doe it, either by himselfe or his legats. Again, by reason of the schisme, & for the displeasure that he bare pope Urban, he asked Anselme of which pope he would require his pall, sith he was so hastie to go to Rome for it: Where to Anselme anſwe-red, that he would require it of pope Urban. Which words when the king had heard, he said, I haue not as yet admitted him pope: adding further that it was against the custome vſed either in his or his fathers time, that anie man within the realme of England should name or obte anie man for pope, without the kings licence and consent, saing moreover, that if the said Anselme would ſeeke to take that prerogatiue and dignitie from him, it should be all one, as if he should go about to take awaie from him his crown, and all other roſall dignitie. Wherevnto Anselme answered, that at Rochester (before he was consecrated bishop) he had declared his mind therein, and that being abbat of Becheſloun in Normandie, he had receiued Urban for pope; so that whatſoeuer chanced, he might reuolt from his obedience and subiection.

The king being the more kindled herewith, protested in plaine words, that Anselme could not keepe his faith and allegiance towards him, and his obedience also to the see of Rome, against his will and pleasure. But (to conclude) this matter went so far

A counsell at
in Rutland-

in controuersie betwixt the king and the bishop, that a counsell was called at Rockingham in Rutlandshire, and there in the church within the castell, the matter was earnestlie decided, and much adoe on euerie side, to haue constrained Anselme to renounce his opinion, but he would not. Wherefore it was then deuised, that if he would not agree to the kings pleasure, they would by and by see if they might by any meanes deprive him: but Anselme still held hard, and could not be feared by all these threats; and in like manner to iudge of an archbishops cause, the other bishops concluded that they had no authoritie.

Moreover, while the matter was in consultation among the bishops, another of the kings counsell that was a knight, came before Anselme in place where he sat almost alone, to looke for an answer by them from the king, which knight kneeling downe before the archbishop, spake these words vnto him: "Reuerend father, your humble children beseech your Grace not to haue your heart troubled with these things which you heare; but call to remembrance that blessed man Job, vanquishing the diuell on the dunghill, and reuenging Adam whome he had overcome in paradise. Which words the archbishop considering with a frendlie countenance, perceiued that the minds of the people remained on his side, whereof both he and such as were about him, were right ioyfull and greatlie comforted, hauing hope (according to the scripture) that the voice of the people was the voice of God. When the king understood all these things, he was maruelouslie disquieted in mind, and therefore perceiuing that the bishops and other of his counsell had promised more than they could performe, he blamed them for it: vnto whom the bishop of Durham that was the chiefe doer in this matter, framed this answer: He spake so faintlie (quoth he) and so colddie at the first, that he seemed not to haue any store of wit or wisdom.

Finallie, the matter was deferred vntill the next morning, and then the said bishop of Durham, alleging that they could not well overcome him by arguments, so long as he grounded his opinion in such sort vpon the scripture, and the authoritie of Saint Peter; The best way therefore (said he) shall be, to compell him by force, either to agree to the kings mind, or else to deprive him of his ring and staffe, and after banish him the realme. But the lords of the counsell allowed not the bishops words herein. Well (saith the king) and what other way will you thinke good, if this like you not: so long as I may liue, I will not surelie suffer any to be my pēre within my realme: and if you knew his cause to be so good, why did you suffer me to commende this aduice against him: go your waies therefore, and take aduice together, for by Gods face (for that was his oth) if you condemne him not at my will, I will reuenge my selfe vpon you. Neuerthelesse, when he was informed, that because he was an archbishop, they had no power to iudge or condemne him, though his cause proued neuer so euill, which they could not perceiue so to be; he told them yet they might at the leastwise renounce their obedience to him, and forsake his companie, which they said they might do. Then do it (saith the king) with speed, that he may (when he shall see himselfe abandoned, and despised of all men) repent that he hath followed Urban, and neglected me his soueraigne lord and master. And that ye may do it the more safelie, first of all I deprive him of the suertie and allegiance which he may pretend to haue of me within all my dominions, and from hence forth I will haue no affiance in him, nor take him for an archbishop.

The bishops would faine haue persuaded Anselme to haue shewed himselfe conformable to the kings pleasure, and therefore toke paines with him earnestlie in that behalfe, but all would not serue. He answered indeed verie courteously, but his benefice he would not renounce, as touching the name and office, though in exterior things he were neuer so much disquieted. The king perceiuing him to stand stiffe in his opinion, said vnto his lords; His words are euer contrarie to my mind, and I will not take him for my friend, whosoever doth fauour him. I shall therefore require you that be pēres of my realme, to renounce all the faith and friendship which you beare him, that he may see what he hath gained by that allegiance, which (to the offending of my person) he obserueth to the apostolike see. Whereunto the lords answered; As for vs, we were neuer his men, and therefore we cannot abiure any fealtie which we neuer acknowledged. He is our archbishop, and hath rule in matters pertaining to christian religion within this land, for which cause we that are christians may not refuse his authoritie whilst he remaine here on earth, because he is attainted with no blemish of any heinous crime, which may constrain vs otherwise to do. The king restrained and dissembled his wrath, least he should prouoke them to further displeasure by speaking against their reason.

The bishops were sore abashed herat, and diuent to a shewd pinch. Now then, not long after, the king required to know of euerie of them apart, whether they vtterlie renounced all manner of subiection and obedience vnto Anselme without any condition intermitted, or else that onelie which he did pretend by authoritie of the pope: the bishops making answer diuerslie herevnto, the king appointed those to sit downe by him as faithfull subiects, who acknowledged that their renuntiation was absolutelie made, without intermitting of any condition: as for the other, who protested that they renounced their subiection and obedience vnto him onelie in that which he presumed vpon in the behalfe of the pope, he commanded them to go aside, and to remaine in a corner of the house to heare the sentence of their condemnation pronounced.

Wherefore being put in a marvellous feare, they withdrew themselves aside, but yet straightwaies they deuised a shift wherewith they had bene well acquainted before, as followeth. They presented to the king a great masse of monie to appease his wrath, and so thereby were restored to his fauour. Anselme notwithstanding was obstinate in his opinion, so that in the end, the sentence touching this controuersie betwixt him and the king, was respited till the octaues of Pentecost next ensuing. All this was notified well enough to the pope, who vied the matter with such moderation, that by secret aduertisements giuen, he toke awaie from his brethren all rigorous waies of proceedings, saing;

But yet the kings enmitie towards Anselme was openlie declared, and that chéfelie for the deniall of the monie which he demanded; but at length he got it, though not with any free hart or goodwill of the archbishop: insomuch that the king reputed him gillie of treason. Within a few daies after, Walter bishop of Alba, bringing to him his pall, verie wiselie reconciled the pope and the king. Notwithstanding all this, Anselme could not purchase the kings goodwill to his contentment, though he wiselie dissembled for the time: so that when the bishop of Alba should returne to Rome, he made sute for licence to go with him. Neuerthelesse, the king offered him, that if he would desist from his purpose, and sweare vpon the euangelists neither to go to Rome, nor to appeale in any cause to the popes court, he might and should liue in quietnesse free from Anselme here with departing from the court, came to Canturburie, declaring openlie what had bin said vnto him, and immediatlie sought to flee out of the realme in the night, providing for himselfe a ship at Dover. But his purpose being reuealed to the king, one William Clarelwaist the kings seruant was sent after him, and finding him readie to depart, took from him all that he had, & gaue him a free passport out of the land. Anselme repairing to Rome, made vnto pope Urban a greuous information against the king, declaring into what miserable state he had brought the Realme, and that for want of assistance in his suffragans it laie not in him to reforme the matter.

Ranulph bishop of Chichester.

Indeed we find not that any of the bishops held with Anselme in the controuersie betwixt him and the king, Ranulph bishop of Chichester excepted, who both blamed the king, and rebuked all such bishops as had refused to stand with Anselme, and fauoured the king in cases concerning the foresaid variance. Moreover, the same bishop of Chichester withstood the king and his officers in taking fines of priests for the crime of fornication; by reason of which presumption, the king became sore offended with him, & found meanes to suspend many churches of his diocesse. Whereat in the end, the bishop demeaned himselfe in such wise, that he had his owne will, and his church doores were opened againe, which had bene stopped vp before with thornes. Besides this, the king was contented, that the said bishop should haue the fines of priests in crimes of fornication within his diocesse, and enjoy many other priuileges in right of his church. But how beneficiall so euer he was vnto the see of Chichester, true it is (as Polydor writeth) that he let out diuers abbeies, and the bishoprike of Winchester and Salisburie, with the archbishoprike of Canturburie vnto certaine persons that farmed the same at his hands for great summes of monie, in so much that (beside the said sees of Canturburie, Winchester, and Salisburie, which at the time of his death he kept in his hands) he also receiued the profits of eleuen abbeies which he had let out, or otherwise turned to his most aduantage.

Robert Lo-fange, of some called Herbert, that some time had bin abbat of Ramsey, and then bishop of Ely, by gift of a thousand pounds to the king (as before we haue heard) repented him, for that he was iudged by the king, who after he had bewailed his offense, went to Rome, and did penance for the same in all points as the pope enioined him. Which being done, he returned into England, removing per long his see from Ely to Norwich, where he founded a faire monastrie of his owne charges, and not of the churches goods (as some say) wherein is a doubt, considering he was first an abbat, and after a bishop.

Stephan War-
king a monk.

About this time, by the meanes of Stephan War-king a monk of Shireborne, an Englishman, the order of Cisterciens or white monkes had his beginning within the countrie of Burgongne, as witnesseth Ranulph the monk of Chester: but other writers (as Jacob. Philippus) say that this Stephan was the second abbat of that place, and that it was founded by one Robert abbat of Molinense, in the yeare of Grace 1098. This order was after brought into England by one called Walter Speke, who founded the first abbey of that religion within this reline at Kiuall, about the yeare of Grace 1131.

And yet he was warned by manie strange wonders (as the common people did descant) to refraine from these euill doings: for the Thames did rise with such high springs and tides, that manie towne were drowned, and much hurt done in places about London, and elsewhere. Diuerse rare things happened also at the same time, which I passe ouer. But the king hearing hereof, did nothing regard those which were so bold as to tell him that they were euident significations of some vengeance to followe thereupon.

The king also himselfe on a night as he slept & dreamed, thought that the beines of his armes were broken, and that the blood issued out in great abundance. Likewise, he was told by Robert Fitz Hammon, that a monke should dreame in his sleepe, how he saw the king gnaw the image of Christ crucified with his teeth, and that as he was about to bite awaie the legs of the same image, Christ with his feet should spurne him downe to the ground, inso much that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, and such abundance of smoke, that the aire was darkened therewith. But the king made a iest of these and the like tales; he is a right monke (saith he) and to haue a peece of monie, he dreameth such things, giue him therefore an hundred shillings, and bid him dreame of better fortune to our person. Nevertheless, the king was somewhat moued herewith in the end, and doubted whether he should go into the New forest to hunt on Lammes day (as he had purposed) or no, because his friends counselled him not to trie the truth of dreames to his owne losse and hinderance. Whereupon he forbore to go forth before dinner, but when he had dined and made himselfe merrie with receiuing more drinke than commonlie he used to doe, as broad he got him into the forest with a small traine: amongst whom was one sir Walter Tirell a French knight, whom he had retained in seruice with a large stipend.

This sir Walter chanced to remaine with the king, when all the rest of the companie was dispersed here and there, as the manner in hunting is. Now as the sunne began to draw lowe, the king perceiuing an hart to come along by him, shot at the same, and with his arrow stroke him; but not greatly hurting him, the beast ran awaie. The king, to marke which way the hart toke, and the manner of his hurt, held vp his hand betwene the sunne and his eyes; who standing in that sort, out came another hart, at whom as sir Walter Tirell let driue an arrow, the same by glancing stroke the king into the breast, so that he neuer spake word, but breaking off so much of the arrow as appeared out of his bodie, he fell downe, and giuing onelie one groane, immediatlie died, without more noise or mouing. Sir Walter running to him, and perceiuing no speech nor sense to remaine in him, straitwaies got to his horse, and riding awaie, escaped and saved himselfe: for few there were that pursued him, euerie man being amazed at the chance, some departing one waie, and some another, euerie one for his owne aduantage and commoditie, as the time then serued. The dead bodie of the king was straightwaies carried to Winchester, and there buried the morrow after, which was the second day of August, the pere of our Lord 1100. To this end came king William, after he had reigned almost 13. yeares, and liued 43. and somewhat more.

This prince, altho: he euill reported of by writers for the couetous taking of his subjects, and retetning of ecclesiasticall liuing in his hands; yet was he he endued with manie noble and princelie qualities. He had good knowledge in feats of warre, and could well awake with bodilie labour. In all his affaires he was circumspect: of his promise, trustie; of his word, steadfast; and in his wars no lesse diligent than fortunate. He gave to the monkes called Monachi de charitate in Southwarke, the great new church of S. Saviour of Bermondsay, and also Bermondsie it selfe. He founded a goodlie hospitall in the citie of Poike, called S. Leonards, for the sustentation and finding of the poore as well breden as fillers. To wards souldiers and men of warre he was verie liberall, and to enrich them, he passed not for taking from farmers and husbandmen what soever could be gotten. He was indeed of a prodigall nature, and therefore when in the beginning of his reigne, doubting some troubles, he had assembled manie men of warre for his defense, there was nothing that they could aske which he would denie them, in so much that his fathers treasures were some consumed, by reason whereof he was put to his shifts to provide more. For though substance wanted to shew his liberallitie, yet there failed not in him a mind still to be bountifull, with continuall use of giuing rewards, was in manner turned in him to a nature, so that to furnish himselfe with monie and necessaries, he was put to extremities unbefitting a king; and to bestow his beneuolence vpon some, he spared not to impoverish others. For in such sort he was liberall, that therewith he was prodigall; and in such wise stout of courage, as proud withall; and in such manner seuer, as he seemed cruell and inextorable. But what meanes he used to make his best of benefices and spirituall linings, partly appereth before.

In deed such was his condition, that who soeuer would giue, might haue, & that oftentimes without respect, whether their sute was reasonable and allowable or not, in so much that it is said of him, that being in Roan on a time, there came to him diuerse Jewes who inhabited that citie, complaining to him, that diuerse of their nation had renounced their Jewish religion, and were become christians: wherefore they besought him, that for a certeine summe of monie which they offered to giue, it might please him to conserne them to abiure christianitie, and turne to the Jewish law againe. He was contented to satisfie their desires, and so receiving the monie, called them before him, & what with threats, and putting them other wise in feare, he compelled diuerse of them to forsake Christ, and returne to their old errors.

There was about the same time a yong man a Jew, who by a vision appearing vnto him (as is said) was conuerted to the christian faith, and being baptised, was named Stephan, because S. Stephan was the man that had appeared to him in the vision, as by the same he was informed. The father of the yong man being sore troubled, for that his sonne was become a christian, and hearing what the king had done in such like matters, presented to him 60 marks of silver, conditionally that he should inforce his sonne to returne to his Jewish religion. Whereupon was the yong man brought before the king, vnto whom he said; Sirra, thy father here complaineth that without his licence thou art become a christian: if this be true, I command thee to returne againe to the religion of thy nation, without aint more adoe. To whom the yong man answered, Your grace (as I gesse) doth but test. Therewith the king being moued said, What thou dunt hill knowe, shuld I tell with thee? Get thee hence quicklie, and fulfill my commandement, or by S. Lukes face I shall cause thine eyes to be plucked out of thine head. The yong man nothing abashed here at, with a constant voice answered, Trulie I will not do it, but knowe for certeine, that if you were a good christian, you would neuer haue offered aint such words, for it is the part of a christian to reduce them againe to Christ which he departed from him; & not to separate them from him, which are ioined to him by faith. The king herewith confounded, commanded the Jew to auaunt & get him out of his sight. But his father perceiving that the king could not persuaide his sonne to forsake the christian faith, required to haue his monie againe. To whom the king said, he had done so much as he promised to do, that was, to persuaide him so far as he might. At length, when he would haue had the king to haue dealt further in the matter, the king (to stop his mouth) tendered backe to him the one halfe of his monie, & retained the other to himselfe.

Moreouer, to increase the suspicion which men had of his infidelitie, it is written, that he caused a disputacion to be kept betwixt the Jewes & the christians, promising that if the Jewes ouercame the christians in argument, he would be a Jew: but the Jewes being ouercome, and receiving the foile, would not confesse their errors, but alledged, that by factions (and not by reason) they were put to the worse. Howbeit, what opinion soeuer he had of the Jewes faith, it appereth by writers that he doubted in manie points of the religion then in credit. For he liked not to protest openly, that he belaeued no saint could profit aint man in the Lords sight, and therefore neither would he nor aint other that was wise (as he affirmed) make intercession, either to Peter, or to aint other for helpe.

He was of stature not so tall as the common sort of men, red of haire, whereof he toke his surname Rufus, somewhat big of bellie, and not readie of tong, speciallie in his anger, for then his vtterance was so hindered, that he could scarcelie shew the conceits of his mind: he died without issue, and bled concubines all the daies of his life. I find that in apparell he loued to be gaie and gorgeous, & could not abide to haue aint thing (for his wearing) esteemed at a small valure. Whereupon it came to passe on a morning, when he should pull on a new paire of hose, he asked the grome of his chamber that brought them to him what they cost: Thre shillings saith he; Why thou horse son (said the king) doth a paire of hose of thre shillings price become a king to weare? Go thy waies, and fetch me a paire that shall cost a marke of silver. The grome went, and brought him another paire, for the which he paid scarcelie so much as for the first. But when the king asked what they stood him in, he told him they cost a marke: and then was he well satisfied, and said; Hea marie, these are more fit for a king to weare, and so drew them vpon his legs.

In this kings daies John bishop of Welles ioined the monasterie of Bath vnto his see, and repairing the same monasterie, began to inhabit there in the yere 1094. The church of Conentrie was in like sort ioined vnto the see of Chester by Robert bishop of that diocesse. Wlstan bishop of Worcester died about the same time, and Anselme having purchased bulles of pope Paschall, wherein was contained an admonition vnto king William to desist from his greuous oppressing of the church, and to amend his former doings, was now on his returne towards England, and by the waie heard of the kings death. Hugh earle of Chester in this kings daies builded the abbey of Chester, and procured Anselme (afterwards archbishop of Canturburie) to come ouer from Normandie, that he might direct the same abbey, and place such religious persons as were necessarie and conuenient for so good a foundation.

Long it was per Anselme would come ouer, because he doubted to be had in suspicion of an ambitious desire in seeking to be made archbishop of Canturburie. For it was talked that if he went ouer into England, he should surely be elected before he returned into Normandie. But at length so it chanced, that the foresaid Hugh earle of Chester fell sicke, and despairing of life, sent with all speed to An-selme, requiring him most instantlie to come ouer to him lieng in extremitie of sicknesse; adding, that if he passed not the soner, it would be to late, whereof he would after repent him. Then Anselme, for that he might not faile his friends in such necessitie, came ouer, and gaue order to the abbeie, according as it seemed best to him for the establishment of religion there.

Thus farre William Rufus.

Henrie the first, yoongest sonne to WWilliam the Conquerour.

Anno Reg. I.

Henrie the yoongest sonne to William the first, brother to Rufus latelie departed, the first of that name that ruled here in England, & for his knowledge in god literature surnamed

Beauclerke, was admitted king by the whole assent of the lords and commons, and began his reigne ouer England the first of August, in the yeare after the creaton of the world 1067. after the birth of our Saviour 1100. and 44. of the emperor Henrie the fourth, Paschall the second then governing the see of Rome, which was about the 51. yeare of Philip the first of that name king of France, and in the beginning of the reigne of Edgar king of Scotland. This king was consecrated and crowned at Westminster, the first daie of August, by Thomas archbishop of Doerke, and Maurice bishop of London, because at that time Anselme archbishop of Canturburie was exiled. This prince had aforehand trained the people to his humor, and being, in bringing them to thinke well of him, and to conceiue a maruelous euill opinion of his brother duke Robert, persuading them mozeouer, that the said duke was likelie to proue a sharpe and rigorous gouernour, if he once obtained the crowne and dominion of the land. Mozeouer, he caused to be reported for a certeine truth, that the same Robert was already created king of Jerusalem. And therefore considering that the kingdome of Palestine (as the rumor ran) was of greater reuenues than that of England, there was no cause why they shuld staie for him, who would not willinglie leaue the greater for the lesser. By which means the Nobilitie and Commons were the soner persuaded to decline from the election of the said Robert, and to receiue his brother Henrie for their lawfull king, who on the other side ceased not to promise mountaines, till his enterprise toke effect; and then at leisure paid some of them with molhils: as by the sequelle of the storie shall more at large appere.

This Henrie therefore comming thus to the crowne, considered furthermoze with himselfe, that hereafter, when his eldest brother Robert should returne, and vnderstand how the matter was brought about, he would thinke himselfe to haue had much wrong, and bene verie euill dealt withall, sith that as well by birthright, as also by agreement made with his brother William Rufus, he ought of right to be preferred, and thereupon would not faile but make earnest claime against him. Wherefore per he should come home out of the holie land (where he then remained) the king studied by all possible meanes how to gratifie all the states of his realme, & to plant in their hearts some god opinion of him. And first of all he reformed such things as his brother had left verie preiudiciall to the estate of the church, setting the same free which before was sore oppressed. And furthermoze, somewhat to relieue the common-wealth, he promised to restore the lawes of god king Edward, and to abolish or amend those which by his father and brother were already ordained to the hurt & preiudice of the old ancient liberties of the realme of England. He reuoked Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie out of exile, who fled (as yee haue heard) to auoid the wrath of king William. Mozeouer, he placed in the see of Winchester, one William Gifford, a graue and discret person, and also ordained monkes of honest reputation to be abbats in certeine abbeis which had bene long void, and in the hands of William his brother: in like maner he remitted certeine payments which his brother and predecessor had caused to be raised by waie of taxes and customes. Besides this, on the 8. daie of September, he committed Rafe bishop of Durham to the Tower of London, by whose lewd counsell his said brother being seduced, had in his life time done manie oppressions to his people. He ordeined also that one length of measuring should be used through this realme, which was a yerd, appointing it to be cut after the length of his owne arme. Panie other things he redressed, to the contentation and commoditie of his subjects, who gaue God thanks that he had in such wise deliuered them out of the hands of cruell extortioners.

lawfull companie keeping with concubines: which demand was not unlikelie at all. Whereupon they considered that Edgar king of Scotland had a sister named Spau, a beautiful ladie, and of vertuous conditions, who was a professed nunne in a religious house, to the end she might avoid the stormes of the world, and lead her life in more securitie after her fathers deceasse. This gentlewoman, notwithstanding her vow, was thought to be a meet bedfellow for the king: wherefore he sent ambassadoys to his brother Edgar, requesting that he might haue her in marriage. But she refusing superstitiously at the first to breake her professed vow, would not heare of the offer: wherewithall king Henrie being the more inflamed, sent new ambassadoys to moue the case in more earnest sort than before, in so much that Edgar, vpon the declaration of their ambassage, set the abbess of the house (where then she abode) in hand to perswade her, who so effectually and diuersly telling her how necessarie, profitable, & honorable the same should be both to her countrie and kinred did so preuaile at the last, that the yong ladie granted willingly to the marriage. Whereupon she was transported into England, and wedded to the king, who caused the archbishop Anselme to crowne her quene on S. Martins daie, which fell vpon a Sundaye, being the eleuenth of Nouember.

¶ It should seme by Eadmerus, that she was neuer nunne, but onelie veiled by her mother, and placed amongst nunnas against her will (as she professed to the whole world) at such time as archbishop Anselme refused to solemnize the marriage betwixt them, till that doubt were cleared, and the occasion remoued, whereupon euill disposed men would haue surmised illenouice, and reported the worst. Howbeit whether she were professed, or veiled onelie, loth she was to consent at the first (as partlie ye haue heard) but after that she was coupled with the king in marriage, she proued a right obedient wife.

About this season the archbishop of Lienna came ouer into England with the popes authoritie (as he pretended to be legat ouer all Britaine, which was strange newes vnto England, and greatly wondered at (as Eadmerus saith) of all men. For it had not bene heard of in England before that time, that any person should supplie the popes come, except the archbishop of Cantuarie. And so he departed as he came, for no man receiued him as legat, neither did he exercise any legantine authoritie. Not long after, the king sent ambassadoys to Rome, about a suit which he had against the archbishop Anselme, for that he denied not onelie to doe him homage, but also would not consecrate such bishops and ecclesiasticall gouernours as he undertooke to inuest. Touching which matter no small trouble arose, as hereafter shall appere.

In the meane time, Robert the kings elder brother, returning out of the holie land, came into Normandie: for after he had aduertisement of the death of his brother Rufus, and that his yonger brother was crowned king of England, he was greatly displeased in his mind, and meant with all speed to assaile if he might recouer it out of his hands.

¶ We read, that when christian princes had wone Hierusalem, they met together in the temple to chuse a king for the gouernement of that citie and countrey, in which conuent duke Robert was chosen before all the residue to be king there, by reason of a miracle (as some haue last recorded) wrought by quenching of a taper, and the sudden kindling thereof againe, as he held the same in his hand, standing in the church before the altar amongst other on Easter euen: so as thereby it should be thought he was appointed among all the residue to be king, and so was nominated. But he hauing his mind more inclined to England, refused to take the charge vpon him: whereupon after that daie he neuer greatly prospered in anye businesse which he toke in hand: as some doe gather. Other authors of good credit, which haue written that voiage into the holie land, make no mention of anye such matter, but declare, that Geoffrey of Bolongne was by the generall consent of all the princes and capitaines there elected king, as in the description of that voiage more plainelie appereth. But now to returne from whence I haue digressed.

¶ When the same was blowne into England, that duke Robert was returned into Normandie, and that the people had receiued him for their duke with great triumph and ioy: there were diuers which desiring innouations, delighting in alterations, and being wearie of the quiet gouernement of king Henrie, wrote letters into England to the duke, signifying to him, that if he would make hast, and come to recouer the realme out of his brothers hands (who vsurped it by an vniust title) they would be readie to aid him with all their power. Wherewithall the duke being readie of his owne accord to this enterprise, was not a little inflamed, and grew more earnest to make hast about this businesse: in so much as, where he would not seme at the first to esteeme greatly of the offer made to him by the Englishmen, who had thus written ouer vnto him (blaming generallie all the English Nobilitie, for that while he was abroad in the seruice of the christian common-wealth against the infidels, they would suffer him to be in such wise defrauded of his fathers inheritance, by his brother, through their vntruth and negligence) yet although he meant to delaie the matter, and thought it rather better to dissemble with them for a time, than to commit the successe of his affaires and person to their inconstancie; shortly after being set on fire, and still encouraged by the persuation of Rafe bishop of Durham (who by a wonderfull tuicke shift, about the first of Februarie had broken out of prison) with all speed possible he gathered an armie, purposing out of hand to passe ouer with the same into England, and to hazard his right by dent of sword, which was thus by plaine iniurie most wickedly detained from him.

King Henrie in the meane time vnderstanding his meaning, assembled likewise his power, and rigged forth a great number of ships, appointing them to lie in a readinesse to stop his brothers coming to land if it might be. He himselfe also lodged with his maine armie nere the towne of Hastings, to giue him battell if he landed thereabouts.

Duke Robert also meaning to set forward, sent certeine of his ships before, to chuse some convenient place where he might land with his armie: which ships by chance fell into the danger of the kings nauie, but yet abstaining from battell, they recouered the wind, and returned backe to the duke, signifying from point to point how they had sped in this voiage. The duke as he was of a bold courage, and of so gentle a nature that he beleued he should win their good wills, with whom he should haue any thing to doe, passed forward, and approaching to the kings nauie, vsed such mild persuations, that a great part of the souldiours which were aboard in the kings ships, submitted themselues vnto him, by whose conduct he arrived in Portsmouth haven, and there landed with his host, about the beginning of August. Now when he had rested a few daies & refreshed his men, he toke the way towards Winchester, a great number of people flocking vnto him by the way.

The king hauing knowledge as well of the arrival of his enemies, as also of the reuolting of his

They were also in manner ready to haue joined battell, when diuers noble men that ought good will to both the brethren, and abhorred in their minds so vnnaturall discord, began to entreat for peace, which in the end they concluded vpon, conditionallie that Henrie (who was borne after his father had conquered the realme of England) should now enioy the same, yielding and paying pœrelie vnto duke Robert the summe of iii. M. marks. Prouided, that whose hap of the two it shold be to suruiue or outliue, he should be the others right and lawfull heire, by mutuall agrément. Conditionallie also, that those English or Normans, which had taken part either with the king or the duke, should be pardoned of all offenses that could be laid vnto them for the same by either of the princes. There were twelue noble men on either part that receiued corpesall othes for performance of this agrément, which being concluded vpon in this sort, duke Robert, who in his affaires shewed himselfe more credulous than suspicious, remained with his brother here in England till the feast of S. Michaele, and then shewing himselfe well contented with the composition, returned into Normandie. In the second yeare of this kings reigne, the Quene was deliuered of hir daughter Maude or Mathild, so called after hir owne name, who afterward was emperesse, of whom yee shall heare by Gods grace anon in this historie.

The king being now rid of foreen trouble, was shortly after disquieted with the seditious attempts of Robert de Belesme earle of Shrewsburie, sonne to Hugh before named, who fortified the castell of Bridgenozth, and an other castell in Wales at a place called Caircoue, and furnished the towne of Shrewsburie, with the castels of Arundell & Tickerhill (which belonged to him) in most substantiall manner. Moreover he sought to win the fauour of the Welchmen, by whose aid he purposed to defend himselfe against the king in such vnlawfull enterprises as he ment to take in hand. But the king hauing an inkling thereof about he went, straitwaies proclaimed him a traitor, wherevpon he got such Welchmen and Normans together as he could conuenientlie come by, with whom and his brother Arnold, he entered into Staffordshire, which they forsaied and wasted exceedingly, bringing from thence a great bootie of beastes and cattell, with some prisoners, whom they led forthwith into Wales, where they kept themselves as in a place of greatest safetie.

The king in the meane time with all conuenient speed raised a power, first besieging the castell of Arundell, and then planting diuerse battillions before it, he departed from thence, and sending the bishop of Lincoln with part of his armie to besiege Tickerhill, he himselfe went to Bridgenozth, which he encircled about with a mightie armie made out of all parts of his realme: so that what with gifts, large promises, and fearefull threatnings, at the last he allured to his side the sickle Welchmen, and in such wise won them, that they abandoned the earle, and toke part against him. Wherevpon the king within 30. daies subdued all the townes and castels (which he held) out of his hands, and banished him the realme, and shortly after confined his brother Arnold for his traitorous demeanour vnto an end.

After this, at the feast of saint Michaele, Anselme archbishop of Canturburie held a counsell at Westminister, whereat were present the archbishop of York, the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Worcester, Chester, Bath, Norwich, Rochester, and two other bishops latlie elected by the king, namelie, Salisburie and Hereford: the bishop of Exeter was absent by reason of sickness.

At this counsell or synod, diuers abbats and priors, both French and English, were deputed of their promotions and benefices by Anselme, because they had come vnto them other wise than he pretended to stand with the decrees of the church; as the abbats of Persy, Ramsey, Evesham, Peterborough, Middleton, Burie, and Stoke, the prior of Ely, and others.

The chiefest cause of their deposing, was, for that they had receiued their inuestitures at the kings hands.

Diuers constitutions were made by authoritie of this counsell, but namelie this one.

1 That priests shold no more be suffered to haue wiues, which decree (as saith Henrie of Huntingdon) seemed to some verie pure, but to some againe verie dangerous, least whilest diuers of those that coueted to professe such cleannesse and puritie of life as pleased their powers to obserue, might haplie fall into most horrible uncleannesse, to the high dishonour of christianitie, and offense of the Almighty.

2 That no spirituall person shold haue the administration of any temporall office or function, nor sit in iudgement of life and death.

3 That priests shold not haunt alehouses, and further, that they shold weare apparell of one manner of colour, and shewes after a comelie fashion: for a little before that time, priests vsed to go verie vncomelie.

4 That no archdeaconies shold be let to farme.

5 That euerie archdeacon shold at the least receiue the orders of a deacon.

6 That none shold be admitted to the orders of a subdeacon, without profession of chastitie.

7 That no priests sonnes shold succeed their fathers in their benefices.

8 That monks and priests which had forsaken their orders (for the loue of their wiues) shold be excommunicated, if they would not returne to their profession againe.

9 That priests shold weare broad crownes.

10 That no tithes shold be given but to the church.

11 That no benefices shold be bought or sold.

12 That no new chappels shold be builded without consent of the bishop.

13 That no church shold be consecrated except provision were first had to the maintenance of it and the minister.

14 That abbats shold not be made knights or men of war, but shold sleepe & eat within the precinct of their owne houses, except some necessitie moued them to the contrarie.

15 That no monks shold inioyne penance to any man without licence of their abbat, and that abbats might not grant licence, but for those of whose soules they had cure.

16 That no monks shold be godfathers, nor nuns godmothers to any mans child.

17 That monks shold not hold and occupie any farmes in their hands.

18 That no monks shold receiue any parsonages, but at the bishops hands, nor shold spoile those which they did receiue in such wise of the profits and reuenues, that curats which shold serue the cures might thereby want necessarie provision for themselves and the same churches.

19 That contracts made betwene man and woman without witnesses concerning marriage shold be void, if either of them denied it.

20 That such as did weare their heare long shold be neuertheless so rounded, that part of their eares might appere.

21 That kinnsfolke might not contract matrimony

Prouided alſo that no religious man might be abſolued of this crime, but at the biſhops hands.

26 That euery ſundae this curſe ſhould be read in euery church.

The king alſo cauſed ſome neceſſarie ordinances to be deuised at this counsell, to moue men to the leading of a god and bright life.

About the third yeare of K. Henries reigne, the foundation of ſaint Bartholomeus by Smithfield was begun by Kaier one of the kings muſicians (as ſome write) who alſo became the firſt prieſt thereof. In thoſe daies Smithfield was a place where they laid all the ordure and filth of the citie. It was alſo the appointed place of execution, where felons and other malefactors of the lawes did ſuffer for their miſdeeds.

In this third yeare of king Henries reigne the queene was deliuered of a ſonne called William.

When the earle of Shrewſburie was baniſhed (as ye haue heard) the ſtate of the realme ſeemed to be reduced into verie good order and quietneſſe: ſo that king Henrie being aduanced with good ſucceſſe in his affaires, was now in no feare of danger any manner of waie. Holobet herein he ſomewhat diſpleaſed the cleargie: for leaning vnto his princelie authoritie, he toke vpon him both to nominate biſhops, and to inueſt them into the poſſeſſion of their ſees: amongſt whom was one Kemelid, biſhop of Hereford by the kings ordinance. This Kemelid or Kemeline did afterwards reſigne that biſhoprike to the king, becauſe he was perſuaded he had greatly offended in receiuing the ſame at a temporall mans hands.

Tridie not onelie king Henrie here in England, but alſo other princes and high potentates of the temporaltie about the ſame ſeaſon, challenged this right of inueſting biſhops and other cleargie men, as a thing due vnto them and their predeceſſors, with out all preſcription of time, as they alledged, which cauſed no ſmall debate betwixt them and the ſpiritualtie, as in that which is written thereof at large by others may more eaſilie appeare.

Holobet Anſelme the archbiſhop of Canturburie more earneſt in this caſe than any other, would not admit nor conſecrate ſuch biſhops as were nominated and inueſted by the king, making no account of their inueſture: and further he toke vpon him to admoniſh the K. not to violate the ſacred lawes, rites and ceremonies of chriſtian religion ſo lately decreed concerning thoſe matters. But ſo far was the king from giuing any eare to his admonitions, that he ſtood the more ſtiffe in his challenge. And where Thomas the archbiſhop of Porke was not long before departed out of this tranſitorie life, he gaue that benefice then void to one Gerard, a man of great wit, but (as ſome writers report) more deſirous of honoz than was requiſite for his calling, and willed him in deſpite of Anſelme to conſecrate thoſe biſhops whom he had of late inueſted. This Gerard therfore obteing his commandement, did conſecrate them all, William Giſſford biſhop of Wincheſter excepted; who reſuſed to be conſecrated at his hands, wherevpon he was deſpried and baniſhed the realme. The archbiſhop Anſelme alſo was quite out of fauour, for that he ceaſed not to ſpeake againſt the K. in reſpouing him in this behalfe, till time that the king was contented to referre the matter to pope Paſchall, and to ſtand to his decre and determination: alſo, that ſuch as he had placed in any biſhoprike, ſhould haue licence to go to Rome to plead their cauſes, whether he promiſed thoſe to ſend his ambadaours, and ſo he did: appointing for the purpoſe, Herbert biſhop of Dorwich, and Robert biſhop of Lichfield, being both of his priue counsell, and William Warlewast, of whom mention is made before, who went on their waie and came to Rome, according to their commiſſion.

After them alſo folowed Anſelme archbiſhop of Canturburie, Gerard archbiſhop of Porke, & William the elect of Wincheſter, whom the pope receiued with a courteous kind of intertainment. But Anſelme was highlie honozed aboue all the reſidue, whoſe diligence and zeale in deſe of the ordinances of the ſee of Rome, he well enough underſtood. The ambadaours in like maner declaring the effect of their meſſage, opened vnto the pope the ground of the controuerſie begun betwene the king and Anſelme, & with good arguments went about to proue the kings cauſe to be lawfull. Vpon the other ſide, Anſelme and his partakers with contrarie reaſons ſought to confute the ſame. Wherevpon the pope declared, that ſich by the lawes of the church it was decreed, that the poſſeſſion of any ſpiritual benefice, obtained otherwiſe than by meanes of a ſpiritual perſon, could not be good or allowable; from thenceforth, neither the king nor any other for him, ſhould challenge any ſuch right to appertene vnto them.

The kings ambadaours hearing this, were ſomewhat troubled in their minds: wherevpon William Warlewast burſt out and ſaid with great vehemencie euen to the popes face: Whatſoeuer is or may be ſpoken in this maner to or fro, I would all that be preſent ſhould well underſtand, that the king my maſter will not loſe the inueſtitures of churches for the loſſe of his whole realme. Vnto which words Paſchall himſelfe replieng, ſaid vnto him againe: If (as thou ſaiest) the king thy maſter will not forgo the inueſtiture of churches for the loſſe of his realme, know thou for certeine, and marke my words well, I ſpeake it before God, that for the ranſome of his head, pope Paſchall will not at any time permit that he ſhall enioie them in quiet. At length by the aduiſe of his counsell, the pope granted the king certeine priuileges and cuſtomes, which his predeceſſors had vſed and enioied: but as for the inueſtitures of biſhops, he would not haue him in any wiſe to meddle withall: yet did he confirme thoſe biſhops whom the king had already created, leaſt the reſuſall ſhould be occaſion to ſolue any further diſcord.

This buſineſſe being in this maner ordered, the ambadaours were licenced to depart, who receiuing at the popes hands great rewards, and Gerard the archbiſhop of Porke his pall, they thoſtly after returned into England, declaring vnto the king the popes decre and ſentence. The king being ſtill otherwiſe perſuaded, and looking for other newes, was nothing pleaſed with this matter. Long it was per he would giue ouer his claime, or yeld to the popes

In this meane time, the king had ſeiſed into his hands the poſſeſſions of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and baniſhed Anſelme, ſo that he ſtaied at Lions in France for the ſpace of one yeare and ſoure moneths, during which time there paſſed manie letters and meſſages to and fro. The pope alſo wrote to king Henrie in verie courteous maner, exhorting him to call Anſelme home againe, and to releaſe his claime to the inueſtitures of biſhops, whereunto he could haue no right, ſith it appertained not to the office of any tempoꝛall magiſtrate: adding furthermoze, if the king would giue ouer that vngodlie and vſurped cuſtome, that he would ſhew ſuch frendlie fauour in all things, as by the ſufferance of God in any wiſe he might be able to perſorme, and further would receiue not onelie him, but alſo his yong ſonne William (whom latelie it had pleaſed God to ſend him by his vertuous wiſe queene Maude) into his proteccion, ſo that who ſo euer did hurt either of them, ſhould be thought to hurt the holie church of Rome.

The pope ſorteth courteouslie to the king.

In one of the letters which the ſaid pope wrote vnto Anſelme (after that the king was contented to renounce the inueſtitures aforeſaid) he willed Anſelme, according to the promiſe which he had made, to aſſiſte as well from ſinne as from penance due for the ſame, both the king and his wiſe queene Maude, with all ſuch perſons of honour as in this behalfe had travelled with the king to induce him to be agreeable to his purpoſe.

Duke Robert cometh into England to viſit his brother.

Moreouer, the earle of Mellent, and Richard de Ruiners (who had counſelled the king to ſtand ſtoutlie in the matter, and not to giue ouer his title of ſuch inueſtitures, ſith his anceſſors had vſed them ſo long a time before his daies, by reaſon whereof, in renouncing his right to the ſame, he ſhould doe a thing greatly prejudiciall to his roiall eſtate and princelie maiestie) were now earneſt labourers to agree the king and the pope, in ſo much that in the end the king was perſuaded by Anſelme and them to let go his hold, reſigning the inueſtitures with ſtaffe and ring; notwithstanding that, he reſerued the right of elections, and ſuch other roialties as otherwiſe appertained to his maiestie, ſo that ſuch biſhops as had done homage to the king, were not diſabled thereby, but quietlie permitted to receiue their iuriſdictions.

About this time Robert duke of Normandie came into England to ſee his brother: who through the ſugred words and ſweet entertainment of the king, releaſed the perelie tribute of 3000. markes, which he ſhould haue had out of the realme vpon agreement (as before ye haue heard) but cheſelie indeed at the request of the queene, being inſtruted by hir husband how he ſhould deale with him that was knowne to be free and liberall, without any great conſideration what he preſentlie granted.

Now hauing bene here a certeine time, and ſolaced himſelfe with his brother and ſiſter, he returned into Normandie, where ſhortlie after he began to repent him of his follie, in being ſo liberall as to releaſe the ſoreſaid tribute: wherevpon he menaced the king, and openlie in his reproch ſaid that he was craftilie circumvented by him, and ſatlie comened. Wuerſe in Normandie deſired nothing more than to ſet the two brethren at ſquare, and namely Robert de Beſelme earle of Shrewſburie, with William earle of Poꝛtaine: theſe two were baniſhed the realme of England. The earle of Shrewſburie for his rebellious attempts (as before you haue heard) and the earle of Poꝛtaine left the land of his owne willfull and ſtubboꝛne mind, exiling himſelfe onelie vpon hatred which he bare to the king. For being not contented with the earledome of Poꝛtaine in Normandie, and the earledome of Cornuwall in England, he made ſute alſo for the earledome of Bent, which his vnkle Mo ſometime held. Now becauſe he was not onelie denied of that ſute, but alſo by order of lawe had certeine parcels of land taken from him, which he wrongfullie deteined, he got him into Normandie, and there made war both againſt thoſe places which the king held, and alſo againſt other that belonged to Richard earle of Cheſter, who was then vnder the kings tuition and gouernement by reaſon of his minozitie.

Richard earle of Cheſter.

The threatning words of duke Robert comming at the laſt to king Henries eares, cauſed him ſortly with to conceiue verie ſore diſpleaſure againſt the duke, in ſo much that he ſent ouer a power into Normandie, which finding no great reſiſtance, did much hurt in the countrie, by fetchyng and carieyng ſpoiles and pretes. Againe, the Normans rather fauoured than ſought to hinder the enterpriſe of king Henrie, becauſe they ſaw how duke Robert with his ſolliſh prodigalitie and vndiſcreet liberalitie had made a waie all that belonged to his eſtate; ſo that of the whole duchie of Normandie, he had not any citie or towne of name left in his owne poſſeſſion, Roan onelie excepted, which he alſo would haue alienated, if the citizens would haue conſented to his ſond motion.

A power of men ſent into Normandie.

Now king Henrie hearing of the good ſucceſſe of his men, paſſed ouer himſelfe ſone after with a mighty armie, and with little adoe toke Curcuor (as others haue) Baieur and Caen, which cities when he had furniſhed with ſufficient garriſons of men, he reſpaſſed the ſea into England, becauſe the winter approached, and the weather wared troubleſome for ſuch as late in the field. Herevpon duke Robert conſidering how vnable he was (by reaſon that his people failed him at need) to reſiſt king Henrie, ſith the Normans alſo, and they of Aniou, toke part with the ſaid king, he thought good to late armour aſide, and to paſſe ouer into England, to entreat with him by way of brotherlie amitie, in full hope by that meanes to auoid this preſent danger. But at his arriual here, he learned how the king his brother as then was at Poꝛthampton: wherefore he haſted thither, and comming to him, made earneſt ſute for peace, beſeechng the king in reſpect of brotherlie loue to grant the ſame; or if it were that he regarded not the goodwill of his naturall brother, to conſider at leaſt wiſe what appertained to his accuſtomed gentleneſſe, and to thinke with himſelfe that warre betwixt brethren could not be maintained without reproch, nor that victorie be honorable which was obtained againſt his owne fleſh. Wherefore he required him not to reſuſe peace, frendſhip, and voluntarie benenolence, ſith he was now ready to render all that euer he had into his hands.

Anno Reg. 7.

The king nothing moued herewith, but as one that diſdained to make a direct answer, murmured certeine things with himſelfe, and turned away from the duke, as one that either by experience knew his brothers light and vnſtable mind, or as one that determined to be reuenged of him euen to the bittermoſt. Duke Robert alſo, abhorring and vtterlie deteſting this his brothers pride, ſtreightwaies returned home, purpoſing with himſelfe to trie the hazard of warre, ſith he ſawe no hope to be had in brotherlie loue and amitie. Wherevpon he provided for warre with all his power, ſeking aid from all places where he might get any, though the king his brother gaue him ſmall leſure thereto, who followed him continually with a new ſupplie of ſouldiours, deſiring nothing more than to get him within his danger.

Some after, both the brethren approaching nere together, ech of them pitched their campe within the sight of other, preparing themselves to giue battell with princelie stomache. The king surmounting the duke his brother in number, first bringeth forth his men in order of battell, and straightwaies the duke likewise, both being ready to trie the matter by dint of sword. Then the one prouoking the other, and the trumpets sounding aloft, the conflict began. The kings souldiers trusting too much in their owne force, by reason of their great multitude, brake their arraie, and assailed their enemies on ech side verie disorderlie: but the Normans being wiselie ordered and instructed by their duke, kept themselves close together: so that the kings battell, which had without order kept forth to assaile them, finding sturdie resistance, began now to resolt or giue backe: for not onelie duke Robert but also William earle of Mortaigne pressed forward amongst their men, and fought valiantlie with their owne hands. Whereupon the king, when he perceived how his men began to shrink, cried vpon them to staie, and withall commanded his horsemen to breake vpon the flanks of his enemies battell: which they did, with such violence that they disperised the same, and caused the enemies to scatter. Wherewith also the kings footmen, together with the horsemen invaded the Normans afresh, who neuertheless resisted a while, till being compassed about in manner on euerie side, they began to flee: as oftentimes it chanceth, when a few diuise in sunder by a multitude, are assailed on all sides. The king then having vanquished his aduersaries, followeth the chase, and maketh great slaughter of them, though not without some losse of his owne: for the Normans despairing of safetie, turned oftentimes againe vpon their pursuers.

Duke Robert and the earle of Mortaigne fighting most manfully in the verie pcease of their enemies, were taken, or (as other saie) betrayed, and deliuered into their enemies hands: beside which twaine, William Crispine, William Ferrers, Robert Coutenille the elder, with foure hundred men of armes, and to the number of 10. thousand footmen were taken. As for the number that were slaine in this battell, there is none that declareth the certeinie: but yet it is reported by diuers writers, that no one battell in those daies was soer fought, nor with greater bloodshed either in Normandie, or elsewhere.

Gemeitenensis theweth besides, that king Henrie was offered with his brother duke Robert, for alienating the duchie of Normandie his inheritance, & for waisting his revenues with such riotous demeanour as he vsed, so that he left himselfe nothing but the title of Roan, which he had not passed to haue giuen away also, if the citizens would thereto haue granted their consent. The king (I saie) taking displeasure herewith, went ouer into Normandie, and assuming a mightie power, first besieged Baieur, & then halfe destroing it, he took it by force. After this he took Caen also, and then besieged a castell called Tenechbay pertaining to the earle of Mortaigne, during which siege his brother Robert, and the said earle of Mortaigne came with a great multitude of people in hope to be reuenged of the king, and to chase him out of the countrie. But the punishment of God fell so vpon them, that they were both taken, and manie of their friends with them, as Robert de Coutenille, William de Crispine, and others, who were brought before king Henrie as prisoners. & Thus did almightie God grant vnto the king a notable victorie without bloodshed, for he lost not a man: as for his aduersaries, there died in the field not past thyr score persons.

Wil. Malm.

This seemeth also to agree with that which Wil.

Malmesburie writeth: for he saith, that king Henrie with small adoe brought into his hands duke Robert, who with a great troope of men came against him then lodging nere the said castell of Tenechbay. The earle of Mortaigne was also taken, but the earle of Shrewsburie escaped by flight, notwithstanding he was apprehended, as he went about to practise some priue conspiracie against the king. ¶ This battell was fought (as the same Wil. Malm. affirmeth) vpon a saturdaye, being the daie of S. Michael In gloria, and (as may be thought) by the prouident iudgment of God, to the end that Normandie should be subdued vnto England on that daie, in the which 40. yeares passed, king William the Conquerour first set foot on land at Hastings, when he came out of Normandie to subdue England. Neither doth Simon Dunelmensis varie in any thing from Gemeitenensis touching the conclusion of this businesse, and the taking of duke Robert.

These wars being thus finished, and the countrie set in quiet, which through the mere folie of duke Robert was wonderfullie impouerished, the king received the heies of all the towne and castles that belonged either to the duke or the earle of Mortaigne, and furnished the same with garisons to be kept for his behoefe. Having thus pacified the countrie of Normandie, he came to Bec or Bechelent, where archbishop Anselme then remained, whom by mediation of friends he receiued to fauour againe, and sending him ouer into England, immediatlie after followed himselfe.

Duke Robert being also spoiled of his dominions, lands and liberties, was shortly committed to prison within the castell of Cardiff in Wales, where he remained about the space of 26. yeares, and then died. He gouerned the duchie of Normandie 19. yeares, he was a perfect and expert warrior, & comparable with the best capitaines that then liued, had he bene somewhat more warie and circumspect in his affaires, and therewithall constant in his opinion. His worthie acts valiantlie and fortunatlie achieved against the infidels, are notified to the world by manie and sundrie writers, to his high commendation and long lasting praise. It is said also, that he was after his taking once set at libertie by king Henrie, and bound to forswear the realme of England and Normandie, being appointed to auide within the space of 40. daies, and twelue houres. But because he was perceiued to practise somewhat against the king, he was effones taken againe, and having his eyes put out, committed to prison, where finally worn through age and griefe of mind, he ended his miserable life. ¶ The forme of banishing men out of the realme, was ordeined by Edward the Confessor, and remained as a law in vse till these our daies, for the benefit of them which fled to any church or other priuiledged place, thereby to escape the punishment of death due for their offenses. By a latter custome it was also deuised, that they should beare a crosse in their hand, as a signe that they were pardoned of life, for the holie place take where they sought for succour.

But duke Robert (as it should appere by that which others write) found no such fauour, saue onlie libertie to walke abroad in the kings forests, parks, and chases nere the place where he was appointed to remaine; so that vpon a daie, as he was walking abroad, he got a horse, and with all post hast rode his waie, in hope to haue escaped: howbeit his keepers being aduised thereof, followed him with hue and cry, and at length ouertooke him in a newe, where he had laid his horse vpon the belie in a quauemire. Then being brought backe, his keepers kept him in close prison, aduertising the king of his demeanour:

whereupon he commanded that the sight of his eyes should be put out, but so, as the ballies of them should remaine unbroken, for the avoiding of a noisome deformitie that otherwise would ensue, if the glasse twinkles should take hurt.

In his returne out of the holie Land, he married one Sibell, the earle of Conuersans sister in Puglia, his father hight Roger or Gessrey (as some booke haue) and was nephew to Robert Guythard duke of Puglia, and by hir had issue one sonne named William afterwarde earle of Flanders, whereof (God willing) more shall be said hereafter.

Here must I leaue duke Robert, and speake somewhat of Anselme the archbishop, who shortly after his returne into England, receiued letters from pope Paschall, wherein Anselme was authorized to dispose and order things as should seeme to him most expedient. Now, whereas the greater and better part of the English clergie consisted of preests sonnes, he committed to his discretion the order to dispense with them; namely, that such as were of commendable life and sufficient learning, might be admitted to the ministerie, as the necessitie of time and state of the church should require. The pope also by the same letters gave Anselme authoritie to absolve Richard the prior of Clee, upon his satisfaction permitted, and to restore him to the gouernement of the priorie of Clee, if the king thought it conuenient.

About the calends of August, in this yeare 1107, the king held a counsell of bishops, abbats, and other lords of his realme in his palace at London, where in the absence of Anselme, the matter touching the inuestitures of churches, was argued upon for the space of thre daies together, and in the end because the pope had granted the homages of bishops and other prelates to the king, which his predecessor Urban had forbidden, together with the inuestitures; the king was contented to consent to the popes will in forbearing the same. So that when Anselme was come, the king in presence of him and a great multitude of his people, granted and ordeined, that from thenceforth no bishop nor abbat should be inuested within the realme of England, by the hand either of the king or any laie man: on the other side it was granted againe by Anselme, that no person elected into the prelacie, should be deputed of his consecration for doing his homage to the king.

These things thus ordeied, the churches which through England had bin long vacant, were prouided of gouernors, which were placed without any inuestiture of staffe or ring. About this time, Anselme consecrated siue bishops at Canturburie in one day, archbishop William to the see of Winchester, Roger that was the kings chancellor to Salisbury, William Warlewast to Crecster, Remaline the quenes chancellor to Hereford, and one Urban to Glamorgan in Wales.

About this season a great part of Flanders being drowned by an inundation or breaking in of the sea, a great number of Flemings came into England, beseeching the king to haue some void place assigned them, wherein they might inhabit. At the first they were appointed to the countrie lieng on the east part of the riuer of Alward: but within foure yerres after, they were remoued into a corner by the sea side in Wales, called Penbroke-shire, to the end they might be a defense there to the English against the unquiet Welshmen.

It should appeare by some writers, that this multitude of Flemings consisted not of such onelic as came ouer about that time by reason their countrie was ouerslowne with the sea (as ye haue heard) but of other also that arrived here long before, euen in the daies of William the Conquerour, through the friendship of the quene their countrewoman, at thens which time their number so increased, that the realme of England was sore pestered with them: whereupon king Henrie deuised to place them in Penbroke-shire, as well to auoid them out of the other parts of England, as also by their helpe to tame the bold and presumptuous fiercenesse of the Welshmen. Which thing in those parties they brought verie well to passe: for after they were settled there, they valiantlie resisted their enemies, and made verie sharpe warres upon them, sometimes with gaine, and sometimes with losse.

In the yeare 1108, Anselme held an other synod or counsell, whereat in presence of the king, and by the assent of the earles and barons of the realme it was ordeined.

1 That preests, deacons, and subdeacons should liue chastlie, and keepe no women in their houses, except such as were nere of kin to them.

2 That such preests, deacons, and subdeacons, as contrarie to the inhibition of the counsell holden at London, had either kept their wines, or married other (of whom as Eadmerus saith, there was no small number) they should put them quite away, if they would continue still in their preesthood.

3 That neither the same wines should come to their houses, nor they to the houses where their wines dwelled: but if they had any thing to say to them, they should take two or thre witnesses, and talke with them abroad in the street.

4 That if any of them chanced to be accused of breaking this ordinance, he should be driuen to purge himselfe with six sufficient witnesses of his owne order, if he were a preest: if a deacon, with foure: and if a subdeacon, with two.

5 That such preests as would forgo seruing at the altar, and holie order (to remaine with their wines) should be deputed of their benefices, and not suffered to come within the quire.

6 That such as contemptuously kept still their wines, and presumed to say masse, if being called to satisfaction, they should neglect it, they should then be excommunicated. Within compasse of which sentence all archdeacons and prebendarie canons were comprised, both touching the forgoing of their women, and auoiding of their companie, and also the punishment by the censures of the church, if they transgressed the ordinance.

7 That euerie archdeacon should be swayne, not to take any monie for fauouring any person transgressing these statutes: and that they should not suffer any preests, whom they knew to haue wines, either to say masse, or to haue any vicars. The like oth should a deane receiue. Provided that such archdeacons or deanes as refused this oth, should be deputed of their romes.

8 That preests, who leauing their wines, would be content to serue God at the altar, should be suspended from that office, by the space of foure daies, and be allowed to haue vicars in the meane time to serue for them: and after, upon performance of their imposed penance by the bishop, they might returne to their function.

In this meane time king Henrie being aduertised of the death of Philip king of France, and not knowing what his sonne Lewis, surnamed Crassus might happlie attempt in his new preferment to the crowne, failed ouer into Normandie, to see the countrie in god order, and the towines, castles, and fortresses furnished accordingly as the doubtfull time required. Now after he had finished his business on that side, he returned into England, where he met with ambassadours sent to him from the emperor Henrie. The effect of whose message was, to require his his daughter And in marriage unto the said em-perour, whereunto (though she was not then past five yeares of age) he willingly consented, and shewing to the ambassadoys great signes of loue, he caused the espousals by waie of procuracion to be solemnized with great feasts and triumphs. This being ended, he suffered the ambassadoys honored with great gifts and princelie rewards to depart.

About this time Gerard archbishop of Porke died, whom one Thomas the kings chapleine succeeded, who for lacke of monie to furnish his iourne, and for other causes (as in his letters of excuse, which he wrot to Anselme it doth appere) could not come to Canturburie for to be consecrated of him in so short a time as was conuenient. But Anselme at length admonished him by letters, that without delay he should dispatch and come to be consecrated. And whereas Anselme understood that the same Thomas was purposed to send unto Rome for his pall, he doubted, least if the pope should confirme him in his see by sending to him his pall, he would haplie refuse to make unto him profession of his due obedience. Therefore to preuent that matter, Anselme wrote to pope Paschall, requiring him in no wise to send unto the nominated archbishop of Porke his pall, till he had (according to the ancient customes) made profession to him of subiection, least some troublesome contentions might thereof arise, to the no small disquieting of the English church. He also aduertised pope Paschall, that because he permitted the emperour to inuest bishops, and did not therefore excommunicate him, king Henrie threatened, that without doubt he would resume the inuestitures into his hands, thinking to hold them in quiet as well as he; and therefore besought him to consider what his wisdom had to do therein with speed, least that building which he had well created, should utterly decaie, & fall againe into irrecoverable ruine. For k.
Henrie maketh diligentlie inquirie (saith he) what order you take with the emperour.

The pope receiuing and perusing these letters, wrote againe unto Anselme a verie frendlie answer concerning the archbishop of Porke. And as for suffering of the emperour to haue the inuestitures, he signified to him that he neither did nor would suffer him to haue them: but that hauing borne with him for a time, he now ment verie short-lie to cause him to feele the weight of the spirituall sword of S. Peter, which already he had drawen out of the scabers, therewith to strike if he did not the so-ner for sake his horrible error & naughtie opinion.

There was another cause also that moued An-selme to doubt of the archbishop of Porke his meaning, as after it appered. For being summoned to come and receiue his consecration at Canturburie (as already ye haue heard) through counsell of the canons of Porke he refused so to do: because they informed him that if he so did, it should be greatlie preiudiciall to the liberties of that see, whose archbishop was of like authoritie in all things unto the archbishop of Canturburie, so that he was bound onlie to fetch his consecration and benediction at Canturburie, but in no wise to acknowledge anie subiection unto that see. ¶ For ye must understand, that there was great stomaching betwixt the clergie of the two prouinces, Canturburie and Porke, about the metropolitane prerogative: and euer as occasion serued, and as they thought the fauor of the prince, or opportunitie of time might aduance their quarels, they of Porke stuck not to offer their grieues, in that (as they toke it) some iniurie was offered them therein.

The archbishop of Porke being thus instructed by the canons of his church, signified to archbishop An-selme the cause why he came not at his summons.

The copie of a parcell thereof is here exemplified.
*Causam, qua differtur sacratio mea, quam nemo studio-sius quam ego vellet accelerare, qui protulerunt, non desunt 10 The cause why my consecration is deferred, which no man living would wish to be done with more speed than I my selfe: those that haue prolonged it, ceasse not to confirme. Therefore how dangerous and how dishonest it should be for me to inuade the gouernment of that church, which I ought to rule, without consent of the same, your discretion right well vnderstandeth. Psea and how dreadfull a thing it is, and how much to be auoided to receiue a curse, inder colour of a blessing, &c.

20 Anselme hauing already written twice unto the said Thomas archbishop of Porke about this matter, and now receiuing this answer, could not be quiet in mind, and thereupon taking aduice with certeine bishops whom he called unto him, determined to send two bishops unto the said Thomas of Porke: and so the bishop of London (as deare to the archbishop of Canturburie) & the bishop of Rochester (as his household chapleine) were sent to commune with him, who met them at his manour of Southwell, where they declared to him the effect of their message: but he deferred his answer, till a messenger which he had sent to the king (as then being in Normandie) was returned, and so without any full answer the bishops came backe againe.

The bishop of 40 Whatbeit shortly after, there came to Canturburie a messenger on the behalfe of the archbishop of Porke, with letters inclosed under the kings seale, by the tenour whereof the king commanded Anselme, that the consecration of the archbishop of Porke might staie till the feast of Easter; and if he might returne into England by that daie, he promised (by the aduice had therein of the bishops and barons of his realme) that he would set a direction betwixt them in all matters, thereof anie controuersie had bene moued heretofore: or if he could not returne so soone, he would yet take such order, that betwixt the loue & concord might remaine betwixt them.

50 When he that brought these letters required an answer, Anselme answered, that he would signifie his mind to the king, and not to his master. Immediatlie therefore was the deane of Winchester sent ouer from Anselme, with a monke of Bechelouin to the king, to informe him of all the matter, and to beseech his maiestie, by his authoritie to provide, that no discord should rise to the diuiding of the present state of the church of England. Furthermore, whereas he had commanded him to grant unto Thomas the archbishop of Porke, a time of respite; he should take for certeine answer, that he would rather suffer himselfe to be cut in peces, than to grant so much as one hours space on the said Thomas of Porke, whom he knew already to haue set himselfe vniustlie against the ancient constitutions of holie fathers, and against the Lord himselfe. The messengers declared these things to the king, and brought word backe againe at their returne, that the king had heard their message with fauourable mind, and promised by the power of God, to declare to the world that he com-fessed vnitie, and not any diuision in the church of England.

eth to the king.

and greuous sicknesse, and yet not forgetfull of the obstinate dealing of Thomas of Porke, he wrote letters unto him, by vertue whereof he suspended him from exercising all pastorall function, till he had reformed his error, submitted himselfe to receive his blessing, and acknowledged his subiection to the church of Canturburie, as his predecessours Thomas and Gerard had done, and before them other ancientes, as custome had prescribed. Thus he charged him, upon paine of cursing, except he would renounce his archbishops dignitie: for in so doing he did grant him licence to use the office and ministerie of a priest (which before time he had taken upon him) or else not.

In the same letters he prohibited all the bishops within the precinct of the Ile of Britaine, that in no wise they should consecrate him, upon paine of cursing: and if he should chance to be consecrated by any stranger, that in no wise they should (under the like paine) receive him for archbishop, or communicate with him in any condition. Cuerie bishop also within the whole Ile of Britaine had a copie of these letters directed to him from Anselme under his seale, commanding them to behaue themselves therein according to the contents, and as they were bound by the subiection which they owght to the church of Canturburie. The letters were dated alike in March.

Notwithstanding all this, upon the 21. of Aprill ensuing, Anselme ended his life in the sixteenth yeare after his first preferment to that see, being threescore and fixtene yerres of age. He was an Italian, borne in Piemont, nere to the Alpes, in a citie called Asta, he was brought up by Lanfranke, and before he was made archbishop, was abbat of the monastierie of Becheham in Normandie.

About the same time was the bishops see of Elye created by the king, who appointed one Harue to be the first bishop there, who before had bene bishop of Bangor. Cambridgeshire was annexed to that see, which because it had of former time belonged to the see of Lincolne, the king gaue unto the bishop of Lincolne (as it were in recompense) the towne of Spalding which was his owne. The prior of Elye, named Richard, desirous to honour himselfe and his house with the title of a bishops dignitie, procured the creation of that bishopricke, first moving the king therein, and after persuading with the bishop of Lincolne to grant his good will: but yet per the matter was brought to perfection, this prior died, and so the said Harue enioied the roome: wherein the prouer be toke place, that One soweth, but an other reapeth (as Polydor alledgeth it.) But to proceed.

Shortlie after the deccasse of Anselme, a Legat came from Rome, bringing with him the pall for the archbishop of Yorke. Howbeit it now that Anselme was dead, the said Legat wist not what to do in the matter, because he was appointed to deliuer the pall first and immediatlie unto Anselme, and further therein to deale (concerning the bestowing thereof) as should seme good unto him.

In the feast of Pentecost next ensuing, the king returned from Normandie, and held his court at London, where after the solemnitie of that feast, he called an assemblie of the bishops, to understand what was to be done in the matter, for the consecration of the archbishop of Yorke. Here were the letters shewed which the archbishop Anselme had (a little before his death) directed unto cuerie of the bishops as before we haue heard. Which when the earle of Melent had read, and understood the effect, he asked what he was that durst receive any such letters without the kings assent and commandement: At length the bishops advising themselves what they had to do, required Samson bishop of Worcester to declare his opinion, who boldlie spake these words: Although this man, who is elected archbishop, is my sonne, whome in times past I begot of my wife, and therefore ought to seeke his aduancement as nature and worlde respects might moue me: yet am I more bound unto the church of Canturburie, my mother, which hath preferred me to this honor: that I do beare, and by the ministerie of a bishoplike office hath made me partaker of that grace, which it hath deserued to enioy of the Lord. Wherefore I would it should be notified unto you all, that I meane to obeie in cuerie condition the commandement contained in the letters of our father Anselme concerning the matter which you haue now in hand. For I will neuer giue mine assent, that Thomas nominated archbishop of Yorke shall be consecrated, till he haue professed his due and canoncall obedience touching his subiection to the church of Canturburie. For I my selfe was present when my brother Thomas archbishop of Yorke, constrained both by ancient customes and inuincible reasons, did professe the like subiection unto archbishop Lanfranke, and all his successours the archbishops of Canturburie.

These words thus uttered by the bishop of Worcester, all the bishops returned together, and coming before the kings presence, boldlie confessed that they had received Anselmes letters, and would not do any thing contrarie to the tenour of the same. Whereat the earle of Melent thoke the head, as though he ment to accuse them of contempt towards the king. But the king himselfe uttered his mind, and said, that whatsoever other men thought of the matter, he suerlie was of the like mind with the bishops, & would be loth to run in danger of Anselmes curse. Wherefore it was determined, that the elect of Yorke should either acknowledge his subiection to the church of Canturburie, or else forgo his dignitie of archbishop: whereupon in the end he came to London, and there upon the 28. daie of Maie was consecrated by Richard bishop of London, as beane to the see of Canturburie. Then hauing the profession or protestation of his subiection to the see of Canturburie deliuered him under seale, he brake by the same, and read the wyting in maner and forme following:

Ego Thomas Eboracensis ecclesie consecrandus metropolitani, profiteor subiectionem & canonicam obedientiam sancte Dorobernensi ecclesie, & eiusdem ecclesie primati canonice electo & consecrato, & successoribus suis canonice inthronizatis, salua fidelitate domini mei Henrici regis Anglorum, & salua obedientia ex parte mea tenenda, quam Thomas antecessor meus sancte Romane ecclesie ex parte sua professus est: that is;

I Thomas to be consecrated metropolitane archbishop of Yorke, professe my subiection and canoncall obedience unto the holie church of Canturburie, and to the primate of the same church canonically elected and consecrated, and to his successours canonically inthronized, sauing the faith which I owe unto my soueraine lord Henrie king of the English, and sauing the obedience to be holden of my part, which Thomas my predecessour professed on his behalfe unto the holie church of Rome.

When this wyting was read, the bishop of London toke it, and deliuered it unto the prior of Canturburie, appointing him to keepe the same as a testimoniall for the time to come. Thus was Thomas the archbishop of Yorke consecrated, being the 27. in number that had gouerned that see, who when he was consecrated, the popes Legate went unto Yorke, and there deliuered to the same archbishop the pall, wherewith when he was inuested, he departed and returned to Rome, as he was appointed.

At the feast of Christmasse next ensuing, the king held his court at London with great solemnitie. The archbishop of Yorke prepared to haue set the crowne on the kings head, and to haue song masse afore him, because bicause the archbishops see at Canturburie was void. But the bishop of London would not suffer it, claiming as high deane to the see of Canturburie to execute that office, and so did, leading the king to the church after the manner. Howbeit when they should come to sit downe at dinner, there kindled a strife betwixt the said two bishops about their places, bicause the bishop of London, for that he had bene ordained long before the archbishop, and therefore not onelic as deane to the see of Canturburie, but also by reason of priozitie, pretended to haue the upper seat. But the king perceiuing their manner, would not heare them, but commanded them out of his house, and got them to dinner at their innes.

Priests pro-

About the same time the cause of the mariage of priests and their keeping of women came againe in to question, so that by the kings commandement, they were more strenghtlie forbidden the companie of women than before in Anselmes time. For after his deceasse, diuerse of them (as it were promising to themselves a new libertie to do that which in his life time they were constrained for against their willes to forbear) deceiued themselves by their hastie dealing. For the king being informed thereof, by the force of the ecclesiasticall lawes compelled them to stand to and obeye the decre of the counsell holden at London by Anselme (as before ye haue heard) at least wise in the sight of men. But if so it be (saith Eadmerus) that the priests attempt to do worse, as it were to the condemnation and reproche of Anselmes doings, let the charge light on their heads, sith euerie man shall beare his owne burthen: for I know (saith he) that if fornicatours and adulterers God will iudge, the abusers of their one cousins (I will not say their owne sisters and daughters) shall not suerlie escape his iudgement.

Now, as also before, the king continued his inordinate desire of enriching himselfe, for the fulfilling of which hungrie appetite (called Sacra of the poets Per antiphrasin) he pinched manie so fore, that they ceased not to speake verie ill of his doings. He did also incur the misliking of verie manie people, bicause he kept still the see of Canturburie in his hands, and would not bestow it, for that he found swatnesse in receiuing all the profits and reuenues belonging thereunto, during the time that it remained vacant, which was the space of foure yeares, or thereabouts.

In like manner, when he was admonished to place some meet man in the come, he would saie, that he was willing to bestow it, but he took the longer time, for that he meant to find such a one to prefer thereto as should not be too far behind Lanfranke and Anselme in doctrine, vertue and wise dome. And sith there was none such yet to be found, he suffered that see to be void till such could be provided. This excuse he pretended, as though he were more carefull for the placing of a worthe man, than of the gaine that followed during the time of the vacation. Howbeit not long after, he translated one Richard bishop of London to that archbishopricke, who enioieng it but a while, he gaue the same to one Rafe then bishop of Rochester, and made him archbishop of Canturburie, being the 35. in order that ruled that see. He was elected at Windsoz the 26. of Aprill, and on the 16. daie of Maie installed at Canturburie, great preparation being made for the feast which was holden at the same. Some after likewise he sent for his pall to Rome, which was brought from Paschall by one Anselme nephue unto the late archbishop Anselme. About this time also the pope found himselfe græued, for that his authoritie was but little esteemed in England, & for that no persons were permitted to appeale to Rome in cases of controuersie, and for that (without seeking to obtaine his licence and consent) they did keepe their synods & counells about ecclesiasticall affaires, neither would obeye such Legats as he did send, nor come to the conuocations which they held. In so much that one Cono the popes Legat in France had excommunicated all the priests of Normandie, bicause they would not come to a synod which they had summoned. Whereupon the king being somewhat troubled, by aduice of his counsell, sent the bishop of Excester to Rome, (though he were then blind) to talke with the pope concerning that matter.

Not long after this Thomas the archbishop of Poike died: after whom succeeded Thurkane, a man of a losse stomach, but yet of notable learning, who euen at the verie first began to contend with Rafe the archbishop of Canturburie about the title and right of the primasie. And though the king aduised him to stand to the order which the late archbishops of Poike had obserued, yet he would not staie the matter, sith he saw that archbishop Rafe being sicke and diseased, could not attend to preuent his doings. Thurkane therfore consecrated certeine bishops of Scotland, and first of all Giles Aldane the elect bishop of S. Pimian, who promised and took his oath (as the manner is) to obeye him in all things as his pymate.

The citie of Worcester about this season was by a casuall fire almost wholie burnt by and consumed. Which mishap, bicause that citie joined nere unto Wales, was thought to be a signification of troubles to folow by the insurrection of the Welshmen: who conceiuing hope of god speed by their god successe in the wars he had with William Rufus, began now to inuade & waste the English marshes. Whereupon king Henrie desirous to tame their hautie stomachs (bicause it was a græfe to him still to be vexed with such tumults and byrings as they daile procured) assembled a mightie armie, and went into Wales. Now bicause he knew the Welshmen trusted more to the woods and mountains, than to their owne strength, he beset all the places of their refuge with armed men, and sent into the woods certeine bands to laie them waste, & to hunt the Welsh out of their holes. The soldiours (for their parts) needed no exhortation: for remembzng the losses sustained a fore time at the Welshmens hands, they shewed well by their fresh pursute, how much they desired to be be reuenged, so that the Welsh were slaine on each hand, and that in great numbers, till the king perceived the huge slaughter, & saw that hauing thowone away their armour and weapons, they sought to saue themselves by flight, he commanded the souldiers to cresse from killing, and to take the residue that were left prisoners, if they would yeld themselves: which they did, and besought the king of his mercie and grace to pardon and forgiue them.

The king thus hauing banquished and overcome the Welshmen, placed garrisons in sundrie townes & castels, where he thought most necessarie, and then returned to London with great triumph. Whither thowille after came ambassadours from the emperor, requiting the kings daughter affianced (as before you haue heard) vnto him, and (being now virtuous & mariable) desired that she might be delivered vnto them. King Henrie hauing heard their sute and willing with speed to performe the same, raised a great tax among his subjects, rated after euerie hide of land which they held, & taking of ech one three shillings towards the payment of the monie which was conuanted to be given with hir at the time of the contract. Which when the king had leuied, with much more, towards the charges to be employed in sending hir forth, he appointed certeine of his greatest piers to safe conduct hir vnto hir husband, who with all convenient speed conuied hir into Germanie, and in verie honorable manner there deliuered hir vnto the foresaid emperor. After this, the king went into Normandie, and there created his sonne William duke of that countrie, causing the people to sweare fealtie and obedience to him, whereof rose a custome, that the kings of England from thenceforth (so long as Normandie remained in their hands) made euer their eldest sonnes dukes of that countrie. When he had done this with other his businesse in Normandie, he returned into England.

In this yeare about the fifteenth daie of October, the sea so decreased and shrank from the old accustomed water-markes and coasts of the land here in this realme, that a man might haue passed on foot ouer the sands and washes, for the space of a whole daie together, so that it was taken for a great wonder. It was also noted, that the maine riuers (which by the tides of the sea used to ebbe and flow twice in 24. houres) became so shallow, that in many places men might go ouer them without danger, and namely the riuier of Thames was so lowe for the space of a day and a night, that horses, men, and children passed ouer it betwixt London bridge and the tower, and also vnder the budge, the water not reaching above their knees. Whereouer, in the moneth of December, the aire appeared red, as though it had burned. In like manner, the Winter was verie extream cold with frosts, by reason whereof at the thawing and breaking of the yce, the most part of all the bridges in England were broken and boone doone.

Not long after this, Griffin ap Rice toke a great price and botie out of the countries subiect to the king within the limits of Wales, and burned the kings castels, because he would not restore such lands and possessions vnto him as appertained to his father Rice or Rice. Howbeit, the king (notwithstanding this businesse) being not otherwise troubled with any other warres or weightie affaires, deferred his voyage into those quarters, and first called a councell of his lords both spirituall and temporall at Salisburie on the nineteenth daie of March, wherein manie things were ordeined for the wealth and quiet state of the land. And first he sware the Nobilitie of the realme, that they should be true to him and his sonne William after his decesse. Secondlie, he appealed sundrie matters then in controuersie betwixt the Nobles and great Piers, causing the same to be brought to an end, and the parties made friends: the diuision betwixt the archbishops of Yorke and Canturburie (which had long depended in triall, and could not as yet haue end) excepted. For ambitious Thurstane would not stand to any decre or order therein, except he might haue had his whole will, so that the king taking displeasure with him for his obstinate demeanour, commanded him either to be conformable to the decre made in Lanfranks time, or else to renounce his miter, which to do (rather than to acknowledge any subiection to the archbishop of Canturburie) he seemed to be verie willing at the first, but afterwards repented him of his speech passed in that behalfe. Now when the councell was ended, and the king went ouer into Normandie, he followed, trusting by some meanes to persuade the king, that he might haue his furtherance to be consecrated, without recognizing any obedience to the see of Canturburie: but the king would not heare him, whereby the matter rested long in sute, as hereafter shall appeare.

¶ Here is to be noted, that before this time, the kings of England used but seldom to call together the states of the realme after any certeine manner or generall kind of processe, to haue their consents in matters to be decreed. But as the lords of the priuie councell in our time do sit onlie when necessitie requirereth, so did they whensoever it pleased the king to haue any conference with them. So that from this Henrie it may be thought the first vse of the parlement to haue proceeded, which sith that time hath remained in force, and is continued vnto our times, insomuch that whatsoeuer is to be decreed touching the state of the commonwealth and conseruation thereof, is now referred to that councell. And furthermore, if any thing be appointed by the king or any other person to be vsed for the wealth of the realme, it shall not yet be receiued as law, till by authority of this assemble it be established.

Now because the house should not be troubled with multitude of vnlearned commoners, whose proprietie is to vnderstand little reason, and yet to conceiue well of their owne doings: there was a certeine order taken, what manner of ecclesiasticall persons, and what number and sort of temporall men should be called vnto the same, and how they should be chosen by voices of free free holders, that being as attornies for their countreies, that which they confessed or denied, should bind the residue of the realme to receiue it as a law. This countreil is called a parlement, by the French word, for so the Frenchmen call their publicke assemblies.

The manner of the parlement
in England.

The manner of their consulting here in England in their said assemblies of parlement is on this wise. Whereas they haue to intreat of matters touching the commodities both of the prince and of the people, that euery man may haue free libertie to vtter what he thinketh, they are appointed to sit in feuerall chambers, the king, the bishops, and lords of the realme sit in one chamber to conferre together by themselves; and the commoners called knights for the shires, citizens of cities, and burgeses of good towne in another. These choose some wise, eloquent, and learned man to be their prolocutor or speaker (as they terme him) who propoundeth those things vnto them that are to be talked of, and asketh euery mans opinion concerning the conclusion thereof. In like sort, when any thing is agreed vpon, and decreed by them in this place (which they call the lower house in respect of their estate) he declareth it againe to the lords that sit in the other chamber called the higher house, demanding likewise their iudgements touching the same. For nothing is ratified there, except it be agreed vpon by the consent of the more part of both those houses. Now when they haue said their minds, and yielded their confirmation therevnto, the final ratification is referred to the prince; so that if he thinke good that it shall passe for a law, he confirmeth also by the mouth of the lord Chancellor of the realme, who is prolocutor to the lords alwaies by the custome of that house.

The same order is vsed also by the bishops and spiritualtie in their conuocation houses. For the bishops sit in one place by themselves as in the higher house, and the deanes, archdeacons, and other procurators of the spiritualtie in another, as in the lower house, whose prolocutor declareth to the bishops what is agreed vpon by them. Then the archbishop (by consent of the more part of them that are assembled in both those conuocation houses) ratifieth and pronounceth their decrees for lawes, remitting (notwithstanding) the final ratification of them to the temporall houses.

This is the order of the lawgiuing of England; and in such decrees (established by authoritie of the prince, the lords spiritual and temporall, and the commons of this realme thus assembled in parlement) consisteth the whole force of our English lawes. Which decrees are called statutes, meaning by that name, that the same should stand firme and stable, and not be repealed without the consent of an other parlement, and that vpon good and great consideration.

About this season, one Owain (whome some name prince of Wales) was slaine, as Simon Dunclun. writeth, but by whom, or in what sort, he sheweth not. In this eighteenth yeare of king Henries reigne, on All halloves daie, or first of Nouember, great lightning, thunder, and such a storme of haile fell, that the people were maruellouslie amazed therewith. Also on the thirteenth of December, there happened a great earthquake, and the mone was turned into a bloodie colour: which strange accidents fell about the midst of the night. At the same time, quene Maude, wife to king Henrie departed this life. But now to returne to other doings.

It chanced vpon a small occasion, that verie soze and dangerous warres followed out of hand, betwixt king Henrie and Lewis surnamed the grosse king of France: the beginning whereof grew hereby. Theobald earle of Champaigne, descended of the earles of Blois, was linked in amitie with king Henrie, by reason of amitie that was betwixt them (for Stephan the earle of Blois married ladie Adela the sister of king Henrie.) Now it happened, that the foresaid Theobald had by chance offended the said Lewis, who in reuenge made sharpe warres vpon him. But earle Theobald hoping for aid to be sent from his friends in the meane time valiantlie resisted him, and at length (by reason of a power of men which came to him from king Henrie) in such sort berced and annoied the French king, that he consulted with Baldwin earle of Flanders, and Foulke earle of Anjou, by what means he might best deprive king Henrie of his duchie of Normandie, and restore the same vnto William the sonne of duke Robert, vnto whom of right he said it did belong.

Now king Henrie hauing intelligence of his whole purpose, endeouored on the other side to resist his attempts, and after he had lenied a large tribute of his subiects, passed ouer into Normandie with a great power, and no small masse of monie, where ioining with earle Theobald, they began to prepare for warre, purposing to follow the same euen to the vttermost. As Lewis in the meane time, supposing that all hope of victorie rested in speedy dispatch of present affaires, determined likewise to haue inuaded Normandie vpon the sudden. But after he perceived that his enemies were all in a readinesse, and verie well provided to resist him: he staied and drew backe a little while. Neuerthelesse in the end he became so desirous to be doing with king Henrie, that approaching nere vnto the confines of Normandie, he made manie skirmishes with the English, yet no notable exploit passed betwixt them in that yeare.

Here will I leaue the kings of England and France skirmishing and encountering one another, and shew something more of the contention that was betwene the archbishops of Canturburie and Poike, to the end that their ambitious desire of worldlie hono: may in some respect appere.

About this verie time, Anselme the nephew to archbishop Anselme came againe from Rome, with free authoritie to execute the office of the popes legat in England: which seemed a thing right strange to the English clergie. Wherefore the bishop of Canturburie, to prevent other inconueniences likelie to insue, took vpon him to go vnto Rome, to vnderstand the popes pleasure concerning the truth and certaintie of this matter, and to require him in no wise to diminish the authoritie or to extenuat the prerogative of his see of Canturburie, which hitherto vsed to determine all causes rising in his prouince.

This said archbishop came to Rome, but finding not the pope there, he sent messengers with letters unto him, then being sicke at Benevento, and obtained a favourable answer, wherewith returning towards England, he came to the king at Roan (where he had left him at his setting forth forward) certifying him how he had sped in this voyage. The forsaide Anselme was also staied by the king at Roan, and could not be suffered to passe over into England all that time, till it might be understood by the returne of the archbishop, what the popes pleasure should be further in that matter. Shortly after whose repaire to the king, word was brought that pope Paschall was departed this life, and that Gelasius the second was elected in his place. This Gelasius (to avoid the dangers that might insue to him by reason of the schisme and controuersie betwixt the see of Rome, and the emperor Henrie the first) came into France, where he lived not long, but died in the abbey of Clugny, after whose decease Calixtus the second was called to the papacie.

Thus by the chance and change of popes, the legatschip of Anselme could take no place, although his bulles permitted him without limitation of time, not onelie to call and celebrate synods for reformation of disorders in the church, but also for the receiuing of Peter pence to be leuied in England (in the which point pope Paschall in his life time thought them in England verie slacke) as by the same bulles more largelie dooth appere. The archbishop of Canturburie had already staied foure or five yeares in the parties beyond the sees, about the matter in controuersie betwixt him and Thurstane archbishop of Yorke, who was likewise gone ouer to solicit his cause. But where as at the first he could not find the king in anie wise agreeable to his mind, yet when the counsell should be holden at Rheims by pope Calixt, he sued at the least wise for licence to go thither: but he could neither haue any grant so to do, till he had promised (vpon his allegiance which he ought to the king) not to attempt anie thing there that might be prejudiciall to the church of Canturburie in anie manner of wise. Fewertheless, at his coming thither, he so wrought with bribes and large gifts, that the popes court (a thing easilie done in Rome) fauoured his cause; yea, such was his successe, that the pope consecrated him with his owne hands, although king Henrie had giuen notice to him of the controuersie depending betwixt Thurstane and him: the archbishop of Canturburie, requiring him in no wise either to consecrate Thurstane himselfe, or grant licence to anie other person to consecrate him: for if he did, surely (for his part) he would banish him quite out of his dominion, which should not be long vndone. But now to the purpose.

In this meane time, the warres were busilie pursued betwixt the two kings of England & France, and a battell was fought betwixt them, with great slaughter on both sides for the space of nine houres. The forwarde on both parties were beaten downe and ouerthrowne; and king Henrie received sundrie stripes on his head at the hands of one William Crispine countie de Curcur, so as (though his helmet were verie strong and sure) the blood burst out of his mouth: wherewith he was nothing afraid, but like a fierce lion laid more lustilie about him, and strooke downe diuerse of his enemies, namelie the said Crispine, who was there taken prisoner at the kings feet. Now were the kings people encouraged at the valiantie and prowesse of their king and chieftaine, so that at length they opened and ouercame the maine battell, and setting vpon the rereward, ouerthrew the whole armie of France, which neuer recoiled, but fought it out euen to the bitter end. There died and were taken prisoners in this conflict manie thousands of men. The French king leauing the field, got him vnto a place called Andelie: and the king of England, recouering a towne by the waie called Nicaum, which the French king had lately woone, returned vnto Rouen, where he was with great triumph receiued, and highlie commended for his noble victorie thus atchieued.

The earle of Flanders (as some write) was so wounded in this battell, that he died thereof. But others affirme, that coming into Normandie in the yeare last past, to make warre against king Henrie in fauour of king Lewes, he won the towne of Andelie, and an other which they name Aqua Nicaia. But as he was come before the towne of Augien in the moneth of September, and assailed the same, he receiued his death wound in the head, wherevpon returning home in the ninth moneth after, when he could not be cured of his hurt, he departed this life at Roslare the 17. daie of June.

Shortly after Foulke earle of Aniou (who before had aided the French king against king Henrie) became now kings Henries friend by alliance, marrying his daughter to William king Henries eldest sonne. But the French king (as their histories make mention) minding still to be reuenged of the earle Theobald, inuaded his countrie againe with a puissant armie, and had destroied the cite of Chartres, which belonged vnto the same earle, had not the citizens humbled themselves to his mercie: and so likewise did the earle, as may be thought. For in the warres which immediatlie followed betwixt Lewes and the emperor Henrie, the erle aided the French king against the same emperor to the uttermost of his power. Some after this, the king came to an enteriue with pope Calixtus at Gisors, where manie matters were talked of betwixt them: and amongst other, the king required of the pope a grant of all such liberties as his father enioied within the limits of England and Normandie, and cheslie, that no legat should haue any thing to do within England, except he required to haue one sent him for some vrgent cause.

All which matters being determined (as the state of the time present required) the pope besought the king to be good vnto archbishop Thurstane, and to restore him to his see: but the king protested that he had bowed neuer so to do whilst he lived. Wherevnto the pope answered, that he was pope, and by his apostolike power he would discharge him of that vow, if he would satisfie his request. The king to shift the matter off, promised the pope that he would take aduice of his counsell, and giue him further knowledge, as the cause required, wherevpon departing from thence, he did afterwards (vpon farther deliberation) send him this message, in effect as followeth.

Whereas he saith he is pope, and will (as he said) assaile me of the vow which I haue made, if contrarie thereto I will restore Thurstane to the see of Yorke: I thinke it not to stand with the honor of a king, to consent in any wise vnto such an absolution. For what shall beleue an others promise hereafter, if by mine example he see the same so easilie by an absolution to be made void? But sith he hath so great a desire to haue Thurstane restored, I shall be contented at his request, to receiue him to his see, with this condition, that he shall acknowledge his church to be subiect vnto the see of Canturburie, as his predecessors haue done before him; although in fine this offer would not serue the turne.

But now to returne againe to the said princes. Not long after the departure of the pope from Gisors, Foulke earle of Aniou found means to make an agreement betwixt king Henrie & king Lewes, so that William sonne to king Henrie did homage unto king Lewes for the duchie of Normandie. And further it was accorded betwene them, that all those that had borne armour either on the one side or the other, should be pardoned, whose subsidies sooner they were. In like manner, Rafe archbishop of Canturburie returned into England, after he had remained long in Normandie, because of the controuersie betwixt him and Thurstan archbishop of Poike, as is aforesaid.

Now shortly after his returne to Canturburie, messengers came with letters from Alexander king of Scotland unto him, signifieng, that where the see of S. Andzeus was void, the same king did instantlie require him to send ouer Eadmer a monke of Canturburie (of whome he had heard great commendation for his sufficiencie of vertue and learning) to be seated there. ¶ This Eadmer is the same which wrote the historie intituled Historia nouum in Anglia, out of which (as may appeare) we haue gathered the most part of our matters concerning Anselme and Rafe archbishops of Canturburie, in whose daies he liued, and was Anselmes disciple.

Archbishop Rafe was contented to satisfie the request of king Alexander in that behalfe, and obtaining the consent of king Henrie, he sent the said Eadmer into Scotland with letters of commendation vnto the said king Alexander, who receiued him right ioyfullie, and vpon the third daie after his coming thither (being the feast of the apostles Peter & Panle) he was elected archbishop of S. Andzeus by the clergie and people of the land, to the great reioicing of Alexander, and the rest of the Nobilitie. The next daie after the king talked with him secretly of his consecration, and vttered to him how he had no mind to haue him consecrated at the hands of Thurstan archbishop of Poike. In which case when he was informed by the said Eadmer, that no such thing needed to trouble his mind, since the archbishop of Canturburie, being primate of all Brittain, might consecrate him as reason was; the king could not away with that answer, because he would not heare that the church of Canturburie should be preferred before the church of S. Andzeus. Whereupon he departed from Eadmer in displeasure, and calling one William (sometime monke of S. Edmundsbury) vnto him, a man also that had gouerned (or rather spoiled) the church of S. Andzeus in the vacation: this William was commanded to take vpon him the charge thereof againe, at the kings pleasure, whose meaning was vtterlie to remoue Eadmer, as not worthy of that roome. Howbeit, within a moneth after (to satisfie the minds of his Nobles) he called for the said Eadmer, and with much adoe got him to receiue the stafte of that bishopricke, taking it from an altar whercon it laie (as if he shuld haue that dignitie at the Lords hands) whereby he was inuested, & went straight to S. Andzeus church, where he was receiued by the quier, the schollers, and all the people, for true and lawfull bishop.

In this meane while Thurstan nothing lacking his lute in the popes court, obtained such fauour (wherein the king of England also was greatly laboured vnto) that he wrote letters thrice vnto the king of Scotland, and once vnto the archbishop of Canturburie, that neither the king should permit Eadmer to be consecrated, nor the archbishop of Canturburie in any wise consecrate him if he were thereunto required. Whereupon it came to passe, that finally Eadmer, after he had remained in Scotland twelue moneths or thereabouts, and perceiued that things went not as he would haue wished (for that he could not get the kings consent that he shuld be consecrated of the archbishop of Canturburie, as it was first meant both by the archbishop and Eadmer) he departed out of Scotland, and returned againe to Canturburie, there to take further aduice in all things as cause should moue him. In like manner king Henrie, hauing quieted his businesse in France, returned into England, where he was receiued and welcomed home with great ioy and triumph; but such publike reioicing lasted not long with him. For indeed, this pleasantesse and mirth was changed into mourning, by aduertisement giuen of the death of the kings sons, William duke of Normandie, and Richard his brother, who together with their sister the ladie Marie countesse of Perch, Richard earle of Chester, with his brother Willem gouernour to duke William, and the said earle of Chester his wife the kings niece, the archdeacon of Hereford, Geoffrey Kiddle, Robert Panduit, William Wigot, and diuerse other, to the number of an hundred and fourtie persons, besides fiftie mariners, toke ship at Harlesto, thinking to follow the king, and sailing forth with a south wind, their ship through negligence of the mariners (who had drunken out their wits & reason) were throwne vpon a rocke, and vtterlie perished on the coast of England, vpon the 25. of Nouember, so that of all the companie none escaped but one butcher, who catching hold of the mast, was dauen with the same to the thore which was at hand, and so saued from that dangerous shipwracke. Duke William might also haue escaped better well, if pitie had not moued him more than the regard of his owne preservation. For being gotten into the shipboat, and lanching toward the land, he heard the shrieking of his sister in dreadfull danger of drowning, and crieng out for succour; whereupon he commanded them that rowed the boat to turne backe to the ship, and to take hir in. But such was the peafe of the companie that stroue to leape in with hir, that it streightwaies sank, so that all those which were already in the boat were cast awaie.

¶ Here (by the way) would be noted the brauified speech of William Rufus to the shipmaister, whome he emboldened with a vaine and desperate persuation in tempestuous weather and high seas to hoise up sailles; adding (for further encouragement) that he neuer heard of any king that was drowned. In which words (no doubt) he sinned presumptuously against God, who in due time punished that offense of his in his posteritie and kindred, euen by the same element, whose fearfulness he himselfe seemed so little to regard, as if he would haue commanded the stormes to cease; as we read Christ did in the gospel by the vertue and power of his word. Here is also to be noted the variableness of fortune (as we commonly call it) or rather the vncertaine and changeable euent of things, which oftentimes doth raise by (euen in the minds of princes) troublesome thoughts, and grievous passions, to the great empairing of their quietnesse: as here we see exemplified in king Henrie, whose mirth was turned into mone, and his pleasures relished with pang of penitences, contrarie to his expectation when he was in the midst of his triumph at his returne out of France into England. So that we see the old adage verified, Miscentur tristitia letis; and that saying of an old poet iustified;

But to returne to the historie. King Henrie being thus deuiued of issue to succeed him, did not a little lament that infortunate chance: but yet to restore that losse, shortly after, euen the 10. of Aprill next ensuing, he married his second wife named Adelicia, a ladie of excellent beautie, and noble conditions, daughter to the duke of Louaine, and descended of the noble dukes of Lozaine, howbeit he could neuer haue any issue by hir. The archbishop Thurstan (after the manner of obtaining suites in the court of Rome) found such fauour at the hands of pope Calixt, that he directed his letters as well to king Henrie, as to Rafe archbishop of Canturburie, by vertue whereof he accused them both, and interdicted as well the prouince of Dorke as Canturburie from the vse of all maner of sacraments, from baptisme of infants, the penance of them that died onlie excepted: if archbishop Thurstan were not suffered (within one moneth next after the receipt of those letters) to inioy his see, without compelling him to make any promise of subiection at all. The king to be out of trouble, permitted Thurstan to returne into the realme, and to repaire vnto Dorke; but with condition, that he should not exercise any iurisdiction out of his owne diocesse as metropolitane, till he had confessed his obstinat errour, and acknowledged his obedience to the church of Canturburie.

Whilste these things were thus a doing, king Henrie was aduertised, that the Welshmen breaking the peace, did much hurt on the marches, & speciallie in Gochire where they had burned two castels. Hearing therefore to be reuenged on them to the bittermost, he assembled an armie out of all parts of his realme, and entred with the same into Wales. The Welshmen, hearing that the king was come with such puissance to invade them, were afraid, and forthwith sent ambassadours, beseeching him to grant them pardon and peace. The king moued with their humble petitions, toke hostages of them, & remitted them for that time, considering that in mainteining of warre against such manner of people, there was more feare of losse than hope of gaine. But yet to prouide for the quietnes of his subiects which inhabited nere the marches, that they shuld not be ouerrun and harried daillie by them (as oftentimes before they had bene) he appointed Warren earle of Shrewsburie to haue the charge of the marches, that peace might be the better kept and maintained in the countrie.

Some after king Henrie caused a chanell to be cast along the countrie in Lincolnshire, from Eorkesey to the citie of Lincolne, that vessels might haue passage out of the riuer of Trent vnto the same. Moreover, Rafe bishop of Durham began to build the castell of Howham, vpon the banke of the riuer of Tweed.

At this time likewise Howke Earle of Anjou being now come out of the holie land (whither he went after the peace was made betwixt king Henrie and the French king) began to picke a quarrell against king Henrie, for withholding the ioincture of his daughter, who (as before you haue heard) was married vnto William the kings sonne that was drownded. He also gaue hir sister in marriage vnto William the sonne of duke Robert, assigning vnto him the earldome of Aquaine to enioy in the right of his wife.

In the meane time, king Henrie visited the north parts of his realme, to vnderstand the state of the countrie, and to prouide for the suertie and good gouernement thereof, as was thought requisite.

In the yeare next ensuing, the twentieth of October, Rafe archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, after he had ruled that see the space of 8. yeares, in whose roine succeeded one William archbishop, who was in number the eight and twentieth from Augustine. Moreover, Henrie the sonne of earle Blois, who before was abbat of Claffenburie, was now made bishop of Winchester, a man for his singular bountie, gentleness and modestie greatlie beloued of the English.

But to returne to the affaires of the king. It chanced about this time, that the parts beyond the sea (being now void of a gouernour (as they suppose) by meanes of the death of the kings sonne) began to make commotions. Some after it came also to passe that Robert earle of Bellent rebelled against the king, who being speedilie aduertised thereof, sailed forthwith into those quarters, and besieged the castell of Ponteaubemer pertaining to the said earle, and toke it. About the same time also the king fortified the castell of Roan, causing a mightie thick wall with turrets therabout as a fortification to be made. Likewise, he repaired the castell of Caen, the castels of Arches, Gisors, Falaise, Argentone, Damfront, Vernon, Ambres, with others, & made them strong. In the meane season, the earle of Bellent (desirous to be reuenged of king Henrie) procured aid where he could, and so with Hugh earle of Mountfort entered into Normandie, waiking and destroying the countrie with fire and sword, thinking yer long to bring the same to obedience. But the kings chamberlaine and lieutenant in those parts, named William de Tankerville, being thereof aduertised, laid an ambush for them, and training them within the danger thereof, set vpon them, and after long fight, toke them twaine prisoners, with diuers other, and presented them both vnto the king, whereby the warres ceased in that countrie for a time.

The king hauing in this maner purchased quietnesse by the sword, gaue himselfe somewhat to the reformation of his house, and among other things which he redressed, he caused all his knights and men of warre to cut their haire short, after the maner of the Frenchmen, whereas before they ware the same long after the vse of woimen.

After this also, in the yeare 1125. a cardinall named Johannes Cremenfis was sent into England from pope Honorius the second, to see reformation in certeine points touching the church: but his chiefe errand was to correct preests that still kept their wiues with them. At his first comming ouer, he sojourned in colledges of cathedrall churches, and in abbeies, addiaing himselfe to lucre & wantonnesse, reaping where he had not sowed. At length, about the feast of the natiuitie of our ladie, he called a conuocation of the cleargie at London, where making an oration, he inuiceth fore against those of the spiritualtie that were spotted with any note of incontinencie. Many thought themselves touched with his words, who hauing smelled somewhat of his secret tricks, that whereas he was a most licentious liuer, and an vnchast person of bodie and mind, yet he was so blinded, that he could not perceiue the beame in his owne eyes, whilst he espied a mote in another mans. Here vpon they grudged, that he should in such wise call other men to accompts for their honest demeanour of life, which could not render any god reckoning of his owne: insonmuch that they watched him so narrowly, that in the euening (after he had blown his hoine so lowd against other men; in declaring that it was a shamefull vice to rise from the side of a strumpet, and presume to sacrifice the bodie of Christ) he was taken in bed with a strumpet, to his owne shame and reproch. But being reuoued thereof, he allegeded this excuse (as some write) that he was no preest, but a reformer of preests. Howbeit to conclude, being thus defamed, he got him backe to Rome againe from whence he came, without any performance of that whereabout he was sent.

But to returne to king Henrie, who whilst he remained in Normandie (which was a long time after the apprehension of the two foresaid earles) vnderstood that his sonne in lawe Henrie the emperor was departed this life at Utrecht, the 23. of Maie last past, wherevpon he sent for his daughter the emperesse emperesse to come ouer vnto him into Normandie, and hauing set his businesse in order on that side the sea, and taken hir with him, he returned into England before the feast of S. Michael, where calling a parlement, he caused hir by authoritie of the same to be established as his lawfull heire and successor, with an article of intaile vpon hir issue, if it should please God to send hir any at all. At this par-lement was David II. of Scotland, who succeeded Alexander the fierce. Stephan erle of Mortoun and Bullongne, and son of Stephan erle of Blois, nephue to R. Henrie by his sister Adela; these two princes cheselic toke their oth amongst other, to obey the foresaid emperesse, as touching hir right and law-full claime to the crowne of England. But although Stephan was now the first that was to sweare, he became hostlie after the first that brake that oth for his owne preferment. ¶ Thus it cometh often to passe, that those which receiue the greatest benefits, do oftentimes soonest forget to be thankfull.

This Stephan latelie before by his uncle R. Henries means, had purchased & got in marriage the onellie daughter and heire of Eustace erle of Bul-longne, and so after the decease of his father in lawe, became erle there: and further, had goodlie possessions in England giuen him by the king, and yet (as farther shall appeare) he kept not his oth made to-with R. Henrie. Some write that there rose no small strife betwixt this earle Stephan, & Robert erle of Glocester, in contending which of them should first receiue this oth: the one alledging that he was a kings son, the other affirming that he was a kings nephue.

Shortlie after this parlement was ended, R. Henrie held his Christmas at Windosor, where Thur-stan archbishop of Dozke (in preiudice of the right of William archbishop of Canturburie) would haue set the crowne vpon the kings head, at his going to the church: but he was put backe with no small re-poch; and his chapleine (whom he appointed to beare his crosse before him at his entrance into the kings chappell) was contemptuouslie and violentlie thrust out of the doores with crosse and all by the friends of the archbishop of Canturburie. In short time, this vnkindlie contention betwixt Thurstan and William the two archbishops grew so hot, that not one-lie both of them, but also the bishop of Lincolne went to Rome about the deciding of their strife.

In this yeare Charles earle of Flanders, the successor of earle Baldwin, was traitorouslie murdered of his owne people: & because he left no issue behind him to succeed as his heire, Helwes the French king made William the sonne of duke Robert Curthose earle of Flanders, as the next confine in bloud to the same Charles. ¶ Truth it is, that by his fathers side, this William was descended from erle Baldwin surnamed Pim, whose daughter Aund being married vnto William Conqueroz, bare by him the foresaid Robert Curthose, father to this William, now aduanced to the gouernment of Flanders, but he wanted not aduersaries that were competitors and malignant sutors for that earldome, who sought to preferre themselves, and to displace him.

King Henrie mistaking the promotion of the said William, although he was his nephue, for that he supposed he would seeke to reuenge old displeasures if he might compass to haue the French kings assistance, thought good with the aduice of his counsell to withstand the worst. Wherevpon he took order for the maintenance of the warre abroad, and the supplie of souldiers, and other things necessarie to be considered of for the suertie of his realme.

After this, because he was in despaire to haue issue by his second wife, about Whitson tide he sent ouer his daughter Aund the emperesse into Normandie, that she might be married vnto Geoffrey Plan-tagnet earle of Anjou, and in August after he followed himselfe. Now the matter went so forward, that the mariage was celebrated betwixt the said earle and emperesse vpon the first sundaie in Aprill, which fell vpon the thirde of the moneth, and in the 27.

of his reigne.

In the yeare ensuing, king Henrie meaning to cause the French king to withdrawe his helping hand from his nephue William earle of Flanders, passed forth of Normandie with an armie, and inua-ding France, remained for the space of eight daies at Vipard, in as good quiet as if he had bene within his owne dominions, and finallie obtained that of the French king which he sought for; namelie, his refusall to aid his nephue the said earle of Flanders.
Who at length contending with other that claimed the earldome, chanced this yeare to be wounded, as he pursued his enemies vnto the walles of a towne called Alhuist, and some after died of the hurt the 16. of August.

¶ It was thought that the great felicitie of king Henrie was the chiefe occasion of this earles death, who meant (if he might haue brought his purpose to passe, and be once quietlie set in the dominion of Flanders) to haue attempted some great enterprise against king Henrie for the recouerie of Normandie, and deliuerie of his father out of prison. Which was knowne well inough to king Henrie, who maintained those that made him warre at home, both with men and monie; namelie, William of Hypres, who toke vpon him as regent in the name of Stephan earle of Bullongne, whome king Henrie procured to make claime to Flanders also, in the title of his grandmother queene Aund, wife to William Conqueroz. But to proceed with our historie.

When king Henrie had sped his businesse in Normandie, where he had remained a certeine space, both about the conclusion and solemnizing of the mariage made betwixt his daughter Aund the emperesse and the earle of Anjou, and also to see the end of the wars in Flanders, he now returned into England, where he called a great councill or parlement at London, in August: wherein (amongst other things) it was decreed, that priests, which liued vnchastlie, should be punished, and that by the kings permission, who hereby toke occasion to serue his owne turne: for he regarded not the reformation which the bishops trusted (by his plaine dealing) would haue followed, but put those priests to their fines that were accused, and suffered them to keepe their wines still in house with them, which offended the bishops greatlie, who would haue had them sequestred asunder.

After this parlement ended, the king kept his Christmasse at Worcester, and his Eastermasse following at Woodstocke, where a certeine Noble man named Geoffrey Clinton was accused to him of high treason. In this 31. yeare of king Henries reigne, great death and murren of cattell began in this land so vniuersallie in all places, that no towne nor village escaped free: and long it was before the same discontinued or ceased. King Henrie passing ouer into Normandie, was troubled with certeine strange dreames or visions in his sleepe.
For as he thought, he saw a multitude of ploughmen with such toles as belong to their trade and occupation; after whom came a sort of souldiers with warlike weapons: and last of all, bishops approaching towards him with their crozier staves ready to fall vpon him, as if they meant to kill him. Now when he awaked, he lept forth of his bed, got his sword in his hand, & called his seruants to come & helpe him.
Nevertheless, repressing those perturbations, and somewhat better aduising himselfe, parlie by his owne reason, and partly by the counsell of learned gentlemen, was perswaded to put such fantasies a waie, and was admonished withall, that whilste he had time and space here on earth, he should redeeme his passed offenses and sinnes committed against God, with repentance, almesdeeds, and abstinence. Wherefore being moued herewith, he began to practise an amendment of his former lewde life.

¶ Here it shall not be amisse to compare the two sonnes of William the Conquerour; namely William Rufus, and Henrie Beaulerke together; and to consider among other euents the supernaturall dreames wherewith they were admonished, to excellent god purpose (no doubt) if they could haue applied them to the end whereto they were directed. For William Rufus (as you shall read in pag. 26. col. 2.) neglecting to be admonished by a dreadfull dreame wherewith he was troubled, shortly after receiued his death wound by casualtie or chancemedlie, even in the prime of his pastime and disport. This other brother H. Beaulerke had the like warnings by the same means, and (to a good effect) as the learned do gather. Their rash opinion therefore is much to be checked, which contemne dreames as mere deuillorie, alledging by waie of disproofe an old erronious verse:

Speaking indefinitely of dreames without distinction: whereas in truth great value is in them in respect of their kind and nature. For though some sort of dreames (as those that be physicall) are not greatlie to be relied upon: yet those of the metaphysicall sort, hauing a speciall influence from aboue natures reach, are not lightlie to be ouerslipped. To determine this matter I remit the studious readers to that excellent chapter of Peter Martyr, in the first part of his common places, pag. 32. columnne 2. where dreames In genere are copiously handled.

About the same time, Maude daughter of this Henrie, being forsaken of her husband Geoffrey earle of Anjou, came to her father then being in Normandie. What the cause was why her husband put her from him, is not certainly knowen: but the matter (be like) was not verie great, sith shortly after he receiued her againe, and that of his owne accord. During the time also that king Henrie remained in Normandie, pope Innocent the 2. came into France, to auoid the danger of his enemies: and holding a counsell at Cleremont, he accursed one Peter Fitz Leo, who had usurped as pope, and named himselfe Anacletus. Afterward at breaking vp of the same counsell at Cleremont, he came to Orleans, and then to Chartres, meeting king Henrie by the waie, who offered vnto the pope to mainteine his cause against his enemies to the vitermost of his power, for the which the pope gaue the king great thanks: and seeming as though he had bene more carefull for the defense of the common cause of the christian common-wealth than for his owne, he exhorted king Henrie to make a iournie into the holie land, against the Saracens and enemies of the christian religion.

In this enterprise betwixt the pope and the king, the Romans were moued to maruell greatlie at the wisdom and sharpnesse of wit which they perceiued in the Normans. For king Henrie, to shew what learning remained amongst the people of the west parts of Europe, caused the sonnes of Robert earle of Melent to argue and dispute in the points and subtilt sophistries of Logike, with the cardinals and other learned chaplains of the pope there present, who were not ashamed to confesse, that there was more learning amongst them here in the west parts, than ever they heard or knew of in their

King Henrie after this returned into England, and vpon the sea was in danger to haue bene drowned by tempest: so that iudging the same to be as a warning for him to amend his life, he made manie boines, and after his landing went to S. Edmunds burie in Suffolke to do his deuotions vnto the sepulchre of that king. Now at his coming from thence, being well disposed, towards the reliefe of his people, he lessened the tributes and impositions, and did iustice as well in respect and fauour of the poore as of the rich.

Not long after, Geoffrey earle of Anjou had a son named Henrie by his wife the emperesse, who (as before is said) was after king of England: for his grandfather king Henrie hauing no issue male to succeed him, caused the emperesse and this Henrie his sonne to be established heires of the realme: all the Nobles and other estates taking an oth to be their true and loiall subiects. After this king Henrie kept his Christmasse at Dunstable, and his Easter at Woodstocke. In the same yeare, or (as some haue) in the beginning of the yeare precedent, or (as other haue) in the yeare following, king Henrie erected a bishops see at Carleil, in which one Arnulfe or rather Athelwolve, who before was abbat of S. Bothouls, and the kings confessor, was the first bishop that was instituted there. This man immediatlie after his consecration placed regular canons in that church.

Not long after, or rather before (as by Wil. Malmes. it should seeme) king Henrie passed ouer into Normandie, from whence (his being the last time of his going thither) he neuer returned aliue. And as it came to passe, he took ship to saile this last iournie thither, even the same daie in which he had afore time receiued the crowne. On which daie (falling vpon the Wednesdaye and being the second of August) a wonderfull and extraordinarie eclipse of the sunne and moone appeared, in somuch that Wil. Malmes. who then liued, writeth that he saw the starres plainlie about the sunne at the verie time of that eclipse. On the Fridaye after such an earthquake also happened in this realme, that manie houses and buildings were ouerthrowne. This earthquake was so sensible, or rather so visible, that the wall of the house wherein the king then sat, was lift vp with a double remoue, & at the third it seiled it selfe againe in his due place. Moreover at the verie same time also fire burst out of certeine riftes of the earth, in so huge flames, that neither by water nor otherwise it could be quenched.

In the 34. yeare of his reigne, his brother Robert Curthose departed this life in the castell of Cardiff. It is said that on a festiual daie king Henrie put on a robe of scarlet, the cape wherof being streit, he rent it in straining to put it ouer his head: and perceiving it would not serue him, he laid it aside, and said; Let my brother Robert haue this robe, who hath a sharper head than I haue. Which when it was brought to duke Robert, and the rent place not sewed vp, he perceiued it, and asked whether any man had woone it before. The messenger told the whole matter, how it happened. Wherevnto duke Robert took such a greefe for the scornfull mocke of his brother, that he wearied wearie of his life, and said: Now I perceiue I haue liued too long, that my brother shall clothe me like his almes man with his cast and rent garments. Thus cursing the time of his naturallie, he refused from thenceforth to eat or drinke, and so pined a waie, and was buried at Gloucester.

King Henrie remaining still in Normandie, rode round about a great part of the countrie, shewing no small loue and courtesie to the people, studieng by all means possible to win their fauours, and being merie amongst them. Nowbeit nothing reioised him

But whilst he thus passed the time in mirth and soiaice, he began soone after to be somewhat diseased, and neuer could perceiue any euident cause thereof. Wherefore to driue his griefe away, he went abroad to hunt, and being somewhat amended thereby (as he thought) at his comming home he would needs eat of a lamprey, though his physician counselled him to the contrarie: but he delighting most in that meat (though it be in qualitie verie hurtfull to health) would not be dissuaded from it, so that his stomack being amoiued therewith, he fell immediatlie into an ague, and so died shortly after, on the first day of December, being as then about 67. yeares of age, after he had reigned 35. yeres, & foure moneths lacking foure daies. His bodie was conueied into England, and buried at Reading within the abbey church which he had founded, and endowd in his life time with great and large possessions. It is written, that his bodie, to auoid the stench which had infected many men, was closed in a buls hide, and how he that clenched the head died of the sauer which issued out of the braine.

Thus we see that euen princes come to the like end by as base meanes as other inferiour persons; according to that of the poet:

Dant alios furia toruo spectacula Marti, Exiit et laudis mare nautis:
Mist sonum ac iuuenum densatur funera, nullum Saua caput Proserpina fugit.

And here we haue to note the neglect of the physicians counsell, and that same ill disposition in diet which the king chose rather to satisfie, than by restraining it to auoid the danger whereinto he fell. But this is the preposterous election of untoward patients, according to that:

Nitmur in vetitum semper cupimus, negata.

The issue of
the first.

Touching his issue, he had by his first wife a sonne named William, drowned (as ye haue heard) in the sea: also a daughter named Maude, whome with hir sonnes he appointed to inherit his crowne and other dominions. He had issue also by one of his concubins, euen a sonne named Richard, and a daughter named Marie, who were both drowned with their brother William. By an other concubine he had a sonne named Robert, who was created duke of Gloucester.

His stature.

He was strong of bodie, fleshie, and of an indifferant stature, blacke of haire, and in manner bald before, with great and large eyes, of face comelie, well countenanced, and pleasant to the beholders, speciallie when he was disposed to mirth.

His vertues.

He excelled in three vertues, wisdom, eloquence, and valiance, which notwithstanding were somewhat blemished with the like number of vices that reigned in him; as couetousnesse, crueltie, and fleshie lust of bodie. His couetousnesse appeared, in that he sore oppressed his subiects with tributes and impositions. His crueltie, in that he kept his brother Robert Curthose in perpetuall prison, and likewise in the hard using of his cousin Robert earle of Mortaigne, whome he not onelie detained in prison, but also caused his eyes to be put out: which act was kept secret till the kings death revealed it. And his fleshie lust was manifest, by keeping of sundrie women.

His wisdom.

But in his other affaires he was circumspect, in defending his owne berie earnest and diligent. Such wars as might be auoided, with honourable peace he euer sought to appease; but when such injuries were offered as he thought not meet to suffer, he was an impatient reuenger of the same, overcoming all perils with the force of vertue and manlie courage, shewing himselfe either a most louing friend, or an extreme enemy: for he would subdue his foes to the bittermost, and aduance his friends about measure.

courage.

With iustice he ruled the commons quietlie, and entertained the nobles honorable. Thence, counterfeiters of monie, and other transgressors he caused to be sought out with great diligence, and when they were found, to be punished with great severity. Neither did he neglect reformations of certeine naughty abuses. And (as one author hath written) he ordeined that thence should suffer death by hanging. When he heard that such peeces of monie as were cracked would not be receiued amongst the people, although the same were good and fine silver, he caused all the coine in the realme to be either broken or slit. He was sober of diet, using to eat rather for the quailing of hunger, than to pamper himselfe with manie daintie sorts of banquetting dishes. He neuer dranke but when thirst moued him, he would sleepe soundlie and snoze oftentimes till he awaked there-with. He pursued his warres rather by policie than by the sword, and overcame his enemies so nere as he could without bloodshed, which if it might not be, yet with as little slaughter as was possible. To conclude, he was not inferiour to any of the kings that reigned in those daies, in wisdom and policie, and so behaued himselfe, that he was honoured of the Nobles, and beloued of the commons. He builded diuerse abbeies both in England and Normandie, but Reading was the chiefe. He builded the manour of Woodstocke, with the parke there, wherein (beside the great store of deere) he appointed diuerse strange beasts to be kept and nourished, which were brought and sent unto him from forren countries, farre distant, as lions, leopards, lynxes, and porcupines. His estimation was such among outlandish princes, that few would willinglie offend him.

Whereouer the earle of Orkney, although he was the king of Norwaies subiect, yet did he what he could to procure king Henriess friendship, sending such strange beasts and other things to him oftentimes as presents, wherein he knew the king tooke great delight and pleasure. He had in singular fauour above all other of his counsell, Roger the bishop of Salisbury, a politike prelate, and one that knew how to order matters of great importance, unto whome he committed the gouernement of the realme most commonlie whilst he remained in Normandie.

60 As well in this kings daies, as in the time of his brother William Rufus, men forgetting their chonser and state, transformed themselves into the habit and forme of women, by suffering their haire to grow in length, the which they curled and trimmed verie curiously, after the maner of damocells and young gentlewomen: insomuch that they made such account of their long bushing perukes, that those which would be taken for courtiers, contended with women who should haue the longest tresses, and such as wanted, sought to amend it with art, and by knitting tyeathes about their heads of those their long and fine locks for a bauerie. Yet we read that king Henrie gaue commandement to all his people to cut their haire, about the 28. yeare of his reigne. Prea- chers indeed inuicied against such vnseemlie maners in men, as a thing moze agreable and seemlie for the contrarie ser.

Wil. Malm. reciteth a tale of a knight in those daies that toke no small liking of himselfe for his faire and long haire, who chanced to haue a verie terrible dreame. For it seemed to him in his sleepe that one was about to strangle him with his owne haire, which he wrapped about his throte and necke) the impression wherof sank so deepe into his mind, that when he awaked out of his sleepe, he straightwaies caused so much of his haire to be cut as might seeme superfluous. A great number of other in the realme followed his commendable example, but the remorse of conscience herein that thus caused them to cut their haire, continued not long, for they fell to the like abuse againe, so as within a twelue moneths space they excēded therein as farre beyond all the bounds of seemlie order as before.

In this Henrie ended the line of the Normans as touching the heires male, and then came in the Frenchmen by the title of the heires generall, after that the Normans had reigned about 69. yeares: for so manie are accounted from the comming of William Conquerour, vnto the beginning of the reigne of king Stephan, who succeeded the said Henrie.

Anno Regi.

Stephan earle of Bullongne, the sonne of Stephan erle of Blois, by his wife Adela, daughter to William Conquerour, came over with all speed after the death of his vnkle, and toke vpon him the gouernement of the realme of England, partlie through confidence which he had in the puissance and strength of his brother Theobald earle of Blois, and partlie by the aid of his brother Henrie bishop of Winchester and abbat of Gloucestre, although that he with other of the Nobles had sware afore to be true vnto the emperesse and hir issue as lawfull heires of king Henrie lately deceased.

3^o tempest.
Matth. West.

The same day that he arrived in England, there chanced a mightie great tempest of thunder horrible to heare, and lightning dreadfull to behold. For because this hapened in the winter time, it seemed against nature, and therefore it was the moze noted as a foreshewing of some trouble and calamitie to come.

Matth. Paris
Wil. Mal.
Simon Dun.

This Stephan began his reigne ouer the realme of England the second day of December, in the yere of our Lord 1135. in the eleuenth yere of the emperour Lothair, the first of pope Innocentius the second, and about the rebth. of Lewis the seventh, furnished Crassus king of France, Dauid the first of that name then reigning in Scotland, & entering into the twelue of his regiment. He was crowned at Westminster vpon S. Stephens day, by William archbishop of Canturburie, the most part of the Nobles of the realme being present, and swearing fealtie vnto him, as to their true and lawfull souereigne.

Howbeit, there were diuerse of the wisser sort of all estates, which regarding their former oth, could haue bene contented that the emperesse should haue gouerned till hir sonne had come to lawfull age; not withstanding they held their peace as yet, and consented vnto Stephan. But this breach of their othes was shortly punished afterward, insomuch that as well the bishops as the other Nobles either died an euill death, or were afflicted with diuerse kinds of calamities and mishances, and that euen here in this life, of which some of them as occasion serueth shall be remembred hereafter. Yet there were of them (and namelie the bishop of Salisburie) which protested that they were free from their oth of allegiance made to the said emperesse, because that without the content of the lords of the land the was married out of the realme, whereas they toke their oth to receiue hir for quene, vpon that condition, that without their assent they should not marrie with any person out of the realme.

Wil. Malm.
The bishop of Salisburie protestation.

Howeuer (as some writers thinke) the bishops toke it, that they should do God good seruice in providing for the wealth of the realme, and the advancement of the church by their perurie. For whereas the late deceased king vsed himselfe not altogether for their purpose, they thought that if they might set vp and creat a king chāsse by their especiall meanes and authoritie, he would follow their counsell better, and reforme such things as they iudged to be amisse. But a great cause that moued manie of the lords vnto the violating thus of their oth, was (as some authors rehearse) for that Hugh Bigot, sometime steward to king Henrie the first, immediatlie after the decease of king Henrie, came into England, and as well before the archbishop of Canturburie, as diuers other lords of the land, toke a voluntarie oth (although most men thinke that he was hired so to do because of great promotion) declaring vpon the same that he was present a little before king Henries death, when the same king adopted and chose his nephew Stephan to be his heire and successor, because his daughter the emperesse had grauouslie displeased him. But vnto this mans oth the archbishop and the other her lords were so haffie in giuing of credit. Now he said Hugh for his periurie, by the iust iudgement of God, came shortly after to a miserable end.

But to our purpose. King Stephan (by what title he obtained the crowne) immediatly after his coronation, went first to Reading to the buriall of the bodie of his uncle Henrie, the same being now brought ouer from Normandie, from whence after the buriall he repaired to Wrenford, and there calling a counsell of the lords & other estates of his realme; amongst other things he promised before the whole assemblie (to win the hearts of the people) that he would put downe and quite abolish that tribute which oftentimes was accustomed to be gathered after the rate of their acres of hides of land, commonly called Danegilt, which was two shillings of euery hide of land. Also, that he would so provide, that no bishops sees nor other benefices should remaine void, but immediatly after upon their first vacacion, they should be againe bestowed upon some convenient person meet to supplie the roime. Further he promised not to seise upon any mans woods as forfeit, though any priuate man had hunted and killed his deere in the same woods, as the maner of his predecessour was. For a kind of forfeiture was denied by king Henrie, that those should lose their right inheritance in their woods, that chanced to kill any of the kings deere within the same.

Moreover, he granted licence to all men, to build either castell, towre, or other hold for defense of themselves upon their owne grounds. All this did he chiefly in hope that the same might be a safegard for him in time to come, if the emperesse should invade the land, as he doubted she shortly would. Moreover he aduanced many young & lustie gentlemen to great linings. For such as were of any noble familie, and thereto through a certaine stoutnesse of stomack sought preferment, easily obtained of him the possession of castles and great lordships, diuerse of whom he honored with titles of dignitie, creating some of them earles and some lords. Now, such was their importunate sute in demanding, that when he had little more to bestow amongst them, hauing already giuen sundrie portions that belonged to the crowne, they ceased not to be in hand with him for more, and being denied with reasonable excuses on his behalfe, they thought themselves ill dealt withall, and so turning from him, fortified their castles and holds, making open warre against him: as hereafter shall appeare.

There came ouer vnto him also a great number of Flemings and Britons to serue him as souldiers, whom he retained, to be the stronger and better able to defend himselfe against the malice of the emperesse, by whom he looked to be molested he wist not how soon. Wherefore he shewed himselfe verie liberal, courteous, and gentle towards all maner of persons at the first, and (to saie truth) more liberal, familiar, and free hearted than stood with the maiestie of a king: which was afterward a cause that he grew into contempt. But to such meanes are princes diuened, that attaine to their estates more through fauour and support of others, than by any good right or title which they may pretend of themselves. Thus the gouernement of this prince at the beginning was nothing bitter or heauie to his subjects, but full of gentlenesse, lenitie, courtlesse, and mildnes.

Howbeit whilst these things were a doing, certaine of the English Nobilitie, abhorring both the king and the present state of his gouernment, went priuily out of the realme into Scotland to king Dauid, declaring vnto him what a detestable act was committed by the lords of England, in that (contrarie to their oath made vnto the emperesse Maund, hir issue) they had now crowned Stephan. Wherefore they besought the said king to take in hand to reuenge such a vile iniurie practised against hir, and to restore the kingdome vnto the said emperesse, which if he did, it should be a thing most acceptable both to God and man.

King Dauid hauing heard and well weighed the effect of their request, forthwith was so moued at their words, that in all possible haste he assembled an armie, and entering into England, first took the citie and castell of Carleil: afterward comming into Northumberland, he took Bewcastle, and many other places vpon the borders there. Whereof king Stephan being aduertised, straightwaies assembled a power, and forthwith hastened into Cumberland, meaning to recouer that againe by force of armes, which the enimie had stolen from him by craft and subtiltie. At his approach nere to Carleil, he pitched downe his field in the evening, thinking there to staie till the morning, that he might vnderstand of what power the enimie was, whom he knew to be at hand.

King Dauid also was of a fierce courage, and redie inough to haue giuen him battell, but yet when he beheld the English standards in the field, and diligentlie viewed their order and behauiour, he was at the last contented to giue care to such as intreated for peace on both sides. Whereupon comming to king Stephan, he entred a frendlie peace with him, wherein he made a surrender of Bewcastle, with condition that he should retaine Cumberland by the free grant of king Stephan, who hoped thereby to find king Dauid the more faithfull vnto him in time of need: but yet he was deceived, as afterwards manifestlie appeared. For when king Stephan required of him an oath of allegiance, he answered that he was once swozne already vnto Maund the emperesse. Howbeit to gratifie him, he commanded his son Henrie to receiue that oath, for the which the king gaue him the earldome of Huntingdon to hold of him for euer.

The Scottish chronicles set out the matter in other order, but yet all agree that Henrie swore fealtie to king Stephan, as in the said historie of Scotland you may see more at large. Now after that king Stephan had concluded a peace with king Dauid, he returned to London, and there kept his Easter with great top and triumphes: who whilst he was yet in the midst of all his pastime, about Rogation weeke, he chanced to fall sicke of a litargie, by reason wherof a rumoz was spred ouer all the realme that he was dead. Which though it was but a vaine tale, and of no importance at the first, yet was it after the occasion of much euill. For vpon that report great sedition was raised by the kings enemies amongst the people, the minds of his friends were alienated from him, & many of the Normans (which were well practised in periuries & treasons) thought they might boldly attempt all mischances that came to hand, and herupon some of them undertooke to defend one place, and some another. Hugh Bigot, erle of Norfolk a balliant chieftain entred into Northwich, Baldwin Reduers took Excester, & Robert Quisquere got certaine castles also into his hands.

King Stephan hearing what his enemies had done, though he was somewhat moued with this alteration of things, yet as one nothing afraid of the matter, he said merilie to those that stood about him: We are allue yet God be thanked, and that shall be knowne to our enemies per it be long. Neither doubted he any thing but some secret practise of treason, and therefore vsing all diligence, he made the more haste to go against his enemies, whose attempts though straightwaies for the more part he repelled, pet could he not recover the places (without much aid) that they had gotten, as Greceker, and others: which when he had obtained, he contented himselfe for a time, and followed not the victorie any further in pursuing of his enemies. Whereupon they became more bold afterward than before; in somuch that sone after they practised diverse things against him, whereof (God willing) some in places convenient shall appeare: howbeit they permitted him to re-maine in quiet for a time. But whilest he studied to take order in things at home (perceiving how no small number of his subjects did daily shew themselves to beare him no hartie good will) he began by little and little to take away those liberties from the people, which in the beginning of his reigne he had granted unto them, and to denie those promises which he had made, according to the saying, That which I have given, I would I had not given, and that which remaineth I will keepe still. This sudden alteration and new kind of rough dealing purchased him great enemie amongst all men in the end. About the same time great commotions were raised in Normandie by means of the lord Geffrey earle of Anjou, husband to Maude the emperesse, setting the whole countie in trouble: but per any newes thereof came into England, king Stephan went against Baldwin Medvers, who being latelic (though not without great and long siege) expelled out of Grece-ker got him into the Ile of Wight, and there began to bruisse a new conspiracie. Howbeit the king com-ming suddenly into the Ile, took it at the first assault, and expelled Baldwin out of the realme.

Having thus with good successe finished this enterprize, and being now advertised of the businesse in Normandie, he sailed thither with a great armie: and being come within two daies iourne of his enimie the earle of Anjou, he sent forth his whole power of horsemen, divided into three parts, which were not gone past a daies iourne forward, but they encountred the earle, finding him with no great force about him. Whereupon giving the charge upon him, they put him to flight, and slew manie of his people.
Which enterprize in this manner valiantlie achieved, even according to the mind of king Stephan, he joyned in friendship with Lewis the seventh king of France: and having latelic created his sonne Gustace duke of Normandie, he presentlie appointed him to do his homage unto the said Lewis for the same.

Now whereas his elder brother Theobald earle of Blois at that time in Normandie, found himselfe grieved, that Stephan the younger brother had usurped the lands that belonged to their uncle king Henric, rather than himselfe, Stephan to stop this ill complaint of his brother, and to allaie his mood, agreed with him, covenanting to paie him yearelie two thousand marks of such currant monie as was then in use. Furthermore, whereas Geffrey the earle of Anjou demanded in right of his wife the emperesse the whole kingdome of England, to be at an end with him, king Stephan was contented to satisfie him with a yearelie pension of five thousand marks, which composition he willingly received.

Thus when he had provided for the suertie of Normandie, he returned againe into England, where he was no longer arrived, but advertisement was given him of a warre newlie begun with the Scots, whose king under a colour of observing the oath to the emperesse, made daily insurrections and invasions into England, to the great disturbance of king Stephan and the annoiance of his people. Wherewith being somewhat mowed, he went straightwaies toward the north parts, and determined first to besiege Bedford by the waie, which appertained to the earle.

dome of Huntington, by gift made unto Henric the sonne of king David, and thereupon at that present kept with a garrison of Scottish men.

This place did the king besiege by the space of 30. daies together, giving thereto euerie daie an assault or alarme, in somuch that coming thither on Christ-masse daie, he spared not on the morrow to assaile them, and so at length won the towne from them by more force and strength. King David hearing those newes, and being already in armour in the field, entered into Northumberland, and licensed his men of warre to spoile and rob the countie thereabout at their pleasure. Whereupon followed such crueltie, that their rage stretched unto old and young, unto priest and cleark, yea women with child escaped not their hands, they hanged, headed, and slew all that came in their waie: houses were burnt, cattell driven awaie, and all put to fire and sword that served to any use for release, either of man or beast.

¶ Here we see what a band of calamities doe ac-companie and waite upon warre, wherein also we haue to consider what a traine of felicities doe attend upon peace, by an equall comparing of which twaine together, we may easilie perceiue in how brauentie an estate those people be that liue under the scepter of tranquillitie, and contrariwise what a hellish course of life they lead that haue swoodne their service to the sword. We may consider also the inordinat outrages of princes, & their frantike fieres-nes, who esteeme not the losse of their subjects liues, the effusion of innocent blood, the population of counties, the ruinating of ample regions, &c: so their will may be satisfied, there desire serued. And therefore it was aptlie spoken by a late poet, not beside this purpose:

*Reges atque duces dira impelluntur in arma, Imperiumque sibi miserorum cede lucrantur.
O caci, o miseri, quid? bellum pace putatis Dignius aut melius? nempe hoc nil turpius, & nil Quod magis humana procul à ratione recedat.*

Candida pax homines, trux decet ira ferat.

But to our storie, King Stephan hearing of this pitifull spoile, hasted forward with great iourne to the rescue of the countie. The Scots put in feare of speedie coming to encounter them, & flew backe into Scotland: but he pursued them, and entering into their countie, burned and destroyed the south parts of that realme in most miserable manner. Whilest king Stephan was thus about to beat backe the foren enemies, and reuenge himselfe on them, he was assailed by other at home, & not without the iust vengeance of almightie God, who meant to punish him for his perurie committed in taking upon him the crowne, contrarie to his oath made unto the emperesse and hir children. For Robert earle of Glocester, base brother unto the emperesse, and of hir priue councell, sought by all means how to bring king Stephan into hatred, both of the Nobles and commons, that by their helpe he might be expelled the realme, and the government restored to the emperesse and hir sonne.

Such earnest trauell was made by this earle of Glocester, that manie of his friends which fauoured his cause, now that king Stephan was occupied in the north parts, joined with him in conspiracie against their soueraigne. First the said earle himselfe tooke Bisshope: and after this diuerse other townes and castles there in that countie were taken by him and others, with full purpose to keepe the same to the behoofe of the emperesse and hir sonne. Amongst other William Talbot tooke upon him to the castell of Cary: Paganell or Painell kept the castell of Ludlow: William de Moun the castell of

When word herof came to king Stephan, he was marvellouslie bered: for being determined to haue pursued the Scots euen to the uttermost limits of their countrie, he was now diuinen to change his mind, and thought it god at the first to stop the proceedings of his enemies at home, least in giuing them space to increase their force, they might in process of time growe so strong, that it would be an hard matter to resist them at the last. Herevpon therefore he returned southward, and comming vpon his enemies, recovered out of their hands diuers of those places which they held, as Hereford, and the castle of Shrewsburie. About the same time one Malhelme yielded the castle of Douer vnto the queene, who had besieged him within the same.

Now king Stephan knowing that the Scots were not like long to continue in quiet, returned northwards againe; and comming to Thurstan the archbishop of Yorke, he committed the keeping of the countrie vnto his charge, commanding him to be in a readinesse to defend the borders vpon any sudden inuasion. Which thing the courageous archbishop willingly undertooke. By this meanes king Stephan being eased of a great part of his care, fell in hand to besiege the residue of those places which the rebels kept: but they fearing to abide the danger of an assault, fled away, some into one part, and some into another; whom the kings power of horsemen still pursuing and ouertaking by the way, slue, and toke no small number of them prisoners in the chase. Thus was the victorie in manner wholie achieved, and all those places recovered, which the enemies had fortified.

In like manner when king Dauid heard that the king was thus bered with ciuill warre at home, he entered England againe in most forceable wise; and sending his horsemen abroad into the countrie, commanded them to waste and spoile the same after their accustomed manner. But in the meane time he purposed with himselfe to besiege Yorke: which citie if he might haue wonne, he determined to haue made it the frontier hold against king Stephan, and the rest that toke part with him. Herevpon calling in his horsemen from straileing further abroad, he marched thitherwards, and comming nere to the citie, pitched downe his tents.

In this meane while the archbishop Thurstan, to whom the charge of defending the countrie chiefeioining, whom with so pittie and effectually words he exhorted to resist the attempts of the Scots (whose cruell doings could keepe no measure) that inconti-nently all the power of the northparts was raised, and (vnder the leading of William earle of Albemarle, Walter Espeke, William Beuerell of Pot-ther to driue them out of the countrie, or else to lose their liues in the quarell of their prince.

It chanced at this time, that archbishop Thur-stan was sicke, and therefore could not come into the field himselfe, but yet he sent Bise bishop of Durham to supplie his raime, who though he saw and perceined that euery man was readie enough to encounter with their enemies; yet he thought god to vse some exhortation vnto them, the better to encourage them, in manner as here ensueth.

Most noble Englishmen, and ye right valiant Normans, of whose courage the Frenchman is a fraid, by you England is kept vnder, by you Apulia doth flourish, and vnto you Ierusalem and Antioch haue yielded their subiection. We haue at this present the rebellious nation of Scotland (which of right ought to be subiect to the crowne of England) come into the field against vs, thinking for euermore to rid themselves of their submission, and to bring both vs and our countrie into their bondage and thraldome. Now albeit I see in you courage sufficient, to beat them backe from any further attempt; yet least when you shall come to the triall, by any manner of chance, you should lose any pece thereof, I lamenting the state of my countrie (whose grieuances I with you should redresse) doe meane to vse a few words vnto you, not for that I would exhort you to do any man wrong, but rather to beat them backe which offer to do you iniurie. Consider therefore that you shall here fight with that enimie, whom you haue oftentimes vanquished, and oftentimes offending in periuie, haue oftentimes most worthilie punished: whome also (to be brasse) raging after the maner of cruell robbers, wickedlie spoiling churches, and faking away our gods, you did lately constrain to lurke in desert places and corners out of sight. Against this enimie (I say) therefore worthie of reuengement for his so manifold outrages, shew your selues valiant, and with manlie stomaches driue him out of our confines. For as far as I can perceiue, the victorie is yours, God surely will aid you, who can not longer abide the sinnes of this people. Wherefore he that loseth his life in so iust a quarell (according to the saying of our saviour) shall find it. Let not their rash and presumptuous boldnesse make you afraid, sith so manie tokens of your approued valiancie cannot cause them to stand in doubt of you.

You are clad in armour, and so appointed with helmet, curase, greiues, and target, that the enimie knoweth not where to strike and hurt you. Then sith you shall haue to doe with naked men, and such as vse not to weare any armour at all, but more meet for brazlers and ale-house quarrellers than men of warbled to the field: what should you stand in doubt of?
Their huge number is not able to stand against your skillfull order and practised knowledge in all warlike seats and martiall discipline. A rude multitude is but a let, rather than a furtherance to achieve the victo-rie. A small number of your worthie elders haue oftentimes vanquished great multitudes of enemies.
As the bishop was thus speaking to the English armie, and before he grew to an end of his exhortation, the Scots approached with their battels, a first certaine of their bands of horsemen were sent afore, to take the higher ground: which when the Englishmen perceiued, they staied not till the enemies should begin the battell, but straightwaies caused their trumpets to sound, and so gaue the onset.

The Scots were as readie to encounter with them, so that the battell began to be verie hot, and euen at the first out flew the arrowes, and then the footmen joined, who fought most fiercelie on both sides. Herewith a wing of them of Lodian, which were in the Scottish bauntgard, brake in vpon the bauntgard of the English: but yet closing together againe, they kept out the enemies, and casting about with a wing, compassed the Scottish horsemen round about, and panning their horses, they slue a great number, and constrained the residue to retire. Which thing when their felowes in the other wing saw, their hearts began to faint, and by and by betooke them to their heeles.

The rumor of this sight being notified to the maine battell of the Scottish men, where king Dauid himselfe was fighting with his enemies, discomfited them also, in such wise, that they in like sort began to fly; inke

lynke backe: first by parts, and after by heaps togither. The king did what he could to saue them: but the English pressed so vpon them, that there was no recourse. Therefore he himselfe was glad in the end to beare his men companie, in seeking to saue himselfe by flight, and make such shift as he could amongst the residue.

Henric earle of Hunting-

aunt.

His sonne Henric the earle of Huntington more regarding his honour, than the danger of life, neither moued with the sight of his father, nor the ouerthrow of the other, came in amongst his men, being readie to turne their backs, and with bold countenance spake these or the like words vnto them, as the shortness of the time would permit. Whither go you good fellows: Here shall you find armour and force, neither shall you, whilst life remaineth in your capteine (whom ye ought to follow) depart without the victorie. Therefore chose whether ye had rather trie the matter with the enimies by battell, or to be put to a shamefull death at home after your returne thither. The Scots moued with these vehement words of their valiant capteine, recoiled vpon their enimies, and began to make hauocke of them: but being no great number, and beset with the English footmen before, and the horsemen behind, they were shortly brought to distresse, and for the more part either taken or slaine.

At length earle Henric perceiving how the matter went, and that there was no hope left of recovery, fled also with those that could escape, bitterlie cursing the frowardnesse of fortune, and mishap of that daies chance. The number of them that were killed at this battell was aboue ten thousand. In which number there were not manie of the English: but yet among other, Walter Lacie the brother of Gilbert Lacie, one of their chiefe capteines is remembered to be one. This battell was fought in the moneth of August, in the fourth of king Stephan, who hearing of this victorie, greatlie reioiced, and gaue infinite commendations to his subiects (the Englishmen and the Normans) but principallie praised archbishop Thurstan and the bishop of Durham for their faithfull and diligent seruice shewed in this behalfe.

On the other side he himselfe using the like good successe amongst the rebels at home, ouercame them, and chased them out of the land. For in this meane time he had taken the castles of Hereford, Gloucester, Webeley, Wyssowe, Dudley, and Shrewsburie. Likewise Robert earle of Gloucester not being able to resist the king thus preuailing against his aduersaries on ech hand, fled into France vnto his sister the emperesse. After this, about Advent, the popes legat one Alberike bishop of Hostia, held a synod at London, within Pauls church, where by the kings consent, Theobald abbat of Bechellonin was consecrated archbishop of Canturburie, being the 37. archbishop which had ruled that see, after Augustine the monke.

A peace concluded be-two kings of England and Scotland.

The king hauing now accomplished his purpose, taken the castell of Lides, and brought the state of the realme to a mætie good state, thought it expedient after the late ouerthrow giuen to the Scots, to pursue the victorie, and bitterlie to subdue them with all expedition. He brought his armie therefore into Scotland, first waiking and spoiling the countrie, and afterward preparing to fight with such Scots as came forth to defend their goods and houses. R. David perceiving himselfe to be too weake, made sute to the king for peace, which with much difficultie he obtained at length, by deliuering his sonne Henric vnto king Stephan in pledge for the sure performance of conenants concluded vpon betwixt them. Whereupon king Stephan hauing thus ended his businesse in Scotland, returned into England: and after directing his iourne towards Wales, he came to Ludlow: which towne (being held by his aduersaries) he wan yer long out of their hands.

After this he went to Drenford, where whilst he remained, a great bruite was spread abroad, that the emperesse was comming with hir brother the earle of Gloucester: which caused him to put the lesse trust in his people from thenceforth, in so much that he began to repent himselfe (although too late) for that he had granted licence to so manie of his subiects to build castles within their owne grounds. For he had them all in suspicion: and amongst other, he vehementlie suspected Roger bishop of Salisbury (who had done verie much for him) and Alexander bishop of Lincoln nephew to the said bishop of Salisbury, or (as some thought) more nere to him in kindred than his nephew, I meane, his sonne. For the said Roger had builded diuerse castles, as at Shierborne, at the Wiles, and at Galmesburie. The said Alexander likewise following his uncles example, bestowed his monie that way verie frælie, hauing builded one castell at Newmarke, and an other at Saleford.

The king therefore hauing committed both these bishops to prison, and furthermore sent Nigel or Piel the bishop of Ely into erile (which Nigel was nephew also to the foresaid bishop of Salisbury) he threatened to keepe them without either meate or drinke, if they would not cause these castles to be deliuered into his hands, whereby he obtained them, and moreover found in the bishop of Salisburies coffers 40. thousand marks, which he toke to his owne vse, by way of confiscation for his disloyall demeanour. This ingratitude of the king wounded the bishops hart, inso much that taking thought for the losse of his houses and monie, he pined awaie, and died within a while after.

In which fraie one of the dukes men was killed, his nephew almost slaine, and the residue of his folkes sore beaten and chased. Whereupon were the bishops first committed to ward, and afterward handled at the kings pleasure, as partlie ye haue heard.

For this Roger bishop of Salisbury, was in the daies of William Rufus a poore prest, seruing a cure in a village nere the cite of Caen in Normandie. Now it chanced, that the lord Henric the kings brother came thither on a time, and called for a prest to say masse before him. Whereupon this Roger comming to the altar, was by and by readie and quicke at it, and therewithall had so speedilie made an end thereof, that the men of warre then attendant on the said lord Henric, affirmed that this prest aboue all other, was a chapleine meet to say masse before men of warre, because he had made an end when manie thought he had but newlie begun. Whereupon the kings brother commanded the prest to follow him, inso much that when oportunitie serued, for his diligent seruice, and readie dispatch of matters, when Henric had attained the crowne, he was by him advanced advanced to great promotions: as first to be Chancellor of England, & after bishop of Salisburie, growing still into such estimation, that he might do more with the king than any other of the council.

But to returne to king Stephan, who after he had thus imprisoned the aforesaid bishops, manned those castles which he took from them with his owne soldiers, in like maner as he had done all the rest which he had taken from the rebels, that he might the better withstand the emperesse and hir sonne, whose coming he euer feared. He began also to shew himselfe cruell towards all men, and namelie against those that had chieflie furthered his title to the obtaining of the crowne. ¶ This (as manie took it) came to passe by the providence of almighty God, that those should suffer for their perfuries, which contrarie to law and right had consented to crowne him king.

In ded he wist not well whom he might trust, for he stood in doubt of all men, because he was advertised by credible report, that the emperesse sought for aid on all sides, meaning verie shortly to come into England. For this cause also he thought good to procure the friendship of Lewes king of France, which he brought to passe, by concluding a mariage betwene his sonne Eustace and the ladie Constance sister to the said Lewes. But within a few yeares after, this Eustace died, and then was Constance married to Raimond earle of Tholouse.

In the meane time, namelie on the first daie of September, a council was holden at Winchester, wherein earle Alberike de Cler pleaded with great eloquence the kings case, in excuse of his fault for imprisoning the bishops, which was fore laid to his charge by his owne brother the bishop of Winchester, being also the popes legat: who (together with the archbishop of Canturburie and other bishops) had called this council for that purpose. Howbeit they got nothing of the king but faire words, and promises of amendment in that which had bene done otherwise than equitie required, which promises were utterly unperformed, and so the council brake up.

In the moneth of Julie the emperesse Haud landed here in England at Portsmouth, & went straight to Arundell, which towne (together with the countie of Sussex) hir mother in law Adelicia king Henries second wife, wedded to William de Albenay, held in right of assignation for hir dowry. There came in with the emperesse hir brother Robert and Hugh Wigot, of whom ye have heard before.

Some write that the emperesse brought with hir a great armie, to the intent that joining with Ranulph earle of Chester (who took part with Robert erle of Gloucester, because the same Rob. had married his daughter) she might fight with king Stephan, and trie the battell with him. Other declare that she came to England now at the first, but with a small power (as fewen score horsemen or men of armes as we may call them) in hope of Gods assurance (who seldom faileth those that fight in a rightfull cause) and againe vpon trust of aid of friends, who for the benefits received at hir fathers hands, would be ready to go against king Stephan. Whereupon hir brother earle Robert leaving his sister in the castle of Arundell, rode with all speed unto Gloucester thorough his enemies countrie, not taking with him past 12. men of armes, and as manie archers on horsebacke, that vpon his coming thither he might leue an armie with so much speed as was possible.

Now when he came to Gloucester, found the citie to be kept with a garison of soldiours placed there by king Stephan, yet the townefmen, after they heard that their earle was approached to the gates, they drove out the garison, & received him into the towne, where he remained a time, partlie to assemble an armie, and partlie to practise with other towne and castles thereabouts, to reuolt unto his sister. Amongst all other, the earles sonne Brian, and Epiles of Gloucester were right full of the news of the emperesses arrivall, and gladlie prepared themselves to fight in defense of hir cause.

In the meane time king Stephan, having knowledge of the landing of the emperesse, and other circumstances, came straight to Arundell, where he besieged hir in the castle, and spent his labour certeine daies in vaine about the winning of it. Howbeit at that present he did not preuaile, for there were certeine with him, who in fauour of the emperesse bare him in hand, that it was not possible to win that fortreffe, and therefore advised him to raise his siege, and suffer the emperesse to be at libertie to go to some other place, where he might with more ease and lesse damage get hir into his hands. The king not perceiving the drift of those secret practisers, followed their counsell. Whereupon the emperesse being now at libertie, went from place to place to trie and solicit hir friends: and as a river increaseth in the passage, so the further the ladie went, the more hir power increased. About the midd of the next night after the siege was raised, she departed out of the castle, and with great sounes sped hir towards Wiltow, which was already resolved to hir side.

These things being thus hunted abroad, the Peeres of the realme resorted to hir, as they that well remembered how in time past by oth of allegiance they were sworne bound to hir and hir issue. The king in the meane time besieged the castle of Wallingford, but after he understood that the emperesse was gotten to Wiltow, repenting himselfe for his light credit given to euill counsell, he left off the siege of Wallingford, and drew towards Wiltow, that he might (if it were possible) inclose his aduersaries within that walled citie. But the emperesse, being advertised of his determination (by such of hir friends as were resident about him) first went to Gloucester, and after to Lincolne, where she provided vittails and all other things necessarie for hir armie and defense: purposing to remaine in that citie, till the matter were either tried by chance of warre betwixt hir and king Stephan, or that by the peoples helpe reuolting to hir side, he might be driven out of the realme, and she restored to the whole gouernement. The king followed hir verie earnestlie, and coming unto Lincolne besieged it, assailing on euerie side which waie he might best find means to win it, & enter into the same. At length the emperesse found shift to escape from thence, and within a little while the king got possession of the citie. But shortly after, Robert earle of Gloucester, and Ranulph earle of Chester, Hugh Wigot, and Robert of Hereford assembling their power, aswell of Welshmen as others, to come to the succour of those that were thus besieged, came to Lincolne, & pitching downe their tents nere to the enemies, they rested the first night without making any great attempt.

In the morning being the second daie of February, so soon as it was daie, they set their men in order of battell, and brought them forth in sight of the king and his host: who on the other side, not meaning to refuse the conflict, ordered his men ready to encounter them, whome he diuided into 3. severall battells. The chieft part of his armed men he appointed to remaine on foot, amongst whom he placed himselfe, with certeine noble men, as earle Babbwin, and others. The residue being horsemen, he disposed into two severall wings, in one of which were Alaine duke of Britaine, Hugh Wigot earle of Hereford, Simon earle of Hampton, and two other earles, Apellent and Waren: howbeit they were not furnished shed with such number of men as had bene requisite; for as it fell out, they brought no great retinues with them. The other wing was governed by the earle of Albemarle, and William de Pyres.

Now on the aduersaries side, the earle of Chester led the fore ward, and those whome king Stephan had disherited, were placed in the middle ward. In the reere ward the earle of Glocester with his compaignie had the rule. And besides those thre battels, the Welshmen were set as a wing at one of the sides.

Here the earle of Chester (to utter the god will which he had to fight) appointed in faire armour as he was, spake these words in effect as followeth, directing the same to the earle of Glocester, and other the capteines, saing: I giue you hartie thanks, most inuincible chieftaine, and you my fellows soldiers, which declare your hartie good wils towards me, euen to the jeoparding of your liues at this my request and instance. Sith then I am the occasion of your perill, it is conuenient that I make the first offence, and giue the onset of the battell vpon that most disofall king, who granting a truce, hath broken the peace; and swearing to be a subiect, is now proued a most wicked usurper: I therefore trusting both vpon reuenge of the vnjust dealings of this king, and also vpon mine owne force and courage, shall straitwaies breake in sunder the arraie of his armie, and make waie through the middell of the enimies with sword in hand. It shall be your parts then to follow me, who will lead you the waie: for euen now my mind giueth me, that I shall passe thorough the battels, tread the capteines under fot, and run the king through with this my sharpe sword.

When he had thus ended, the earle of Glocester answered in this wise: It is not against reason that you should require the honor of the first onset, both for the nobilitie of your house, and also in respect of the prouewelle wherein you excell: but yet if you stand vpon nobilitie, for my part, being the sonne and nephue of a king, ought not I to be preferred: If vpon valiancie, here are manie verie worthie men, afore whom there is not one alius that may chalenge any prerogative. But another reason moueth me most chieftie to be the formost. The king, who contrarie to his oth made to my sister, hath cruellie usurped the kingdome, and setting all in trouble, hath bene the cause of manie thousand mens deaths, and distributed lands and liuings to such as haue no right to the same, which he hath violentlie taken from the rightfull owners, who are quite disherited. This king (I saie) is first to be assailed with the assistance of the righteous iudge, who prepareth punishment for wicked doers. For almightie God, who iudgeth his people with equitie, will looke downe from his heauenly habitation, and will not leaue vs comfortlesse in this so great a necessitie. One thing there is, most valiant capteines, and all you right hardie souldiers, which I would haue you to consider, that through the fennes, which with much adoe you haue passed, there is no waie to escape by flight. Here must we either vanquish the enimies, or else die in the fielde: for no hope of safegard remaineth in fleeing awaie. This onelie relecth (I saie) that you make waie for you to enter the cite with force of your weapons. If I be not deceined in that which my mind giueth me to coniecture, the lacke of meanes to escape, otherwise than by the wing your selues valiant men, by Gods helpe will bring vs the victorie. For he must needs please the man, who hath not other succor to auoid the danger of destruction. The citizens of Lincoln, who shall fight so nere their houses as you shall see, will not staie long to get them thither for their refuge. And herewith consider and weie (I beseech you) against whom you shall match in this battell. There is Alanc duke of Britaine, who cometh armed against you, yea rather against God, a wicked person, and spotted with all kind of filthinesse; who in malice hath no piete, as one that neuer wanted desire to do mischief: and who to be comparable in crueltie, would iudge it a great reproch. There cometh also the earle of Spelcent, a man full of all guile and deceit, in whose hart iniquitie is rooted, and nothing sounding in his mouth but vnthankfulnesse; besides this, he is slothfull in dedes, presumptuous in words, not haultie to fight, but swift to run awaie. Then cometh earle Hugh, who hath not thought it sufficient to breake his oth to my sister the emperesse, but he must commit peritrie the second time, in aduouching (vpon a new oth) that king Henrie granted the kingdome to Stephan, and disabled his daughter. After him marcheth the earle of Albemarle, a man of singular constancie in euill, verie reddie to attempt and loth to giue ouer a mischief: whose wife, though ikelesomes of his filthie behauiour is gone from him; he that keepeth hit, cometh with him also against vs, an open adulterer, & one well esteemed of Bacchus, but nothing acquainted with spars. Then setteth forth Simon earle of Hampton, whose dedes consist in words, & whose gifts rest in promises. For when he hath said, he hath done; & when he hath promised, ye get no more. Finally there come together a knot of Peeres & Noble men, like to their king and maister, accustomed to robberies, enriched with rapines, embued with manslaughter, & defamed with peritrie. You therefore (most valiant capteines & hardie souldiers) whom king Henrie hath aduanced, and this man hath brought vnder fot; whom he made wealthie, and this man hath impouerished; vpon trust of your worthy valiancie, yea rather vpon trust of Gods iustice seeke your reuenge thus offered by God vpon these wicked wretches, & with manlie stomachs bote to go forward, & forswere stepping back. When the earle had made an end, all the armie (lifting vp their hands to God) abjured all intention to flee, and so made themselves reddie to set forward.

King Stephan hauing no pleasant voice of himselfe, appointed earle Baldwin to giue an exhortation to his armie, wherevpon gettingt himselfe to an high place where he might be seene & heard of them, he thus began. All such as shall giue battell, ought to foresee thre things: first, that their cause be righteous: secondlie, the number of their men to be equall at the least: and thirdlie, the godnesse and sufficiency of them. The righteousness of their cause ought to be regarded, least men runne in danger of the soule; the number of men is to be respected, least they should be oppressed with multitude of enimies; and the godnesse of the soldiers is to be considered, least trusting in the multitude, they should presume vpon the aid of feeble persons, & such as are of small valure. In all these points we see our selues sufficientlie furnished. The iustice of our cause is this: that obseruing the thing which we vowed to our king before God, we stand to the same against those that haue falsified their faith, euen to the perill of death. Our number is not much lesse in hoisemen, and in footmen we exceed them. As for the godnesse or sufficiency of our men, who is able to expresse the noble prouewelle of so manie earles, of so manie lords and soldiers, trained vpon euer in warres: The passing valiancie of our king may stand in place of innumerable souldiers. Sith then he being the lords annointed, is here amongst you, vnto whom ye haue vowed allegiance, performe your bote. For the more earnestly and faithfully ye serue your prince in this battell, which you are reddie to fight against peritured persons, the more shall your reward be at the hands of God and him. Therefore be of god comfort, & haue in remembrance against whom you do barraine the battell. The force of erle Robert is well knowne, his maner is to threaten much, & to worke little, furious in words, eloquent of speech, but cold or rather dead harted in deeds. The earle of Chester what is he?

The earle of Chester.

A man of unreasonable boldnesse, bent to conspiracie, inconstant to performe that which he rashly taketh in hand, ready to run into battell, vncircumspect in danger, practising things of great importance, seeking after things impossible, bringing with him few good soldiers, but gathering a vagarant rout of rascals. There is nothing in him that we ought to be afraid of, for loke whatsoeuer he attempteth manfully, the same he giueth ouer womanlike, in all his doings vnforsunate, in all encounters either he is overcome and slayd atwaite, or if he get the upper hand (which seldom times chanceth) he suffereth greater losse than they whom he doth vanquish.

The Welshmen, whom he bringeth with him are little esteemed of vs, who pretend a naked rashnesse without any vse of armes, so that as men without any knowledge of martiall policie, they fall as brute beasts vpon the hunters faulne. The other, as well the nobles as the common souldiers are but runnagates and vagabounds; of whom I would wish the number greater than it is: for the more they be, the worse in effect their seruice shall proue in time of need. You therefore (most worthy chesetaines) you men of honor, it standeth you vpon to haue in regard your vertue and dignities. This day aduance your renowne, and follow the footsteps of your famous ancestors, leave to your sonnes an ever lasting commendation. The continuall successe of victorie ought to be a prouocation vnto you to do manfully: the continuance of euill speed may be to ponder vpon an occasion to run away. For euene alre adie (I dare say) they repent them of their comming hither, and could be contented to be gone, if the nature of the place would suffer them to depart. Then sith it is not possible for them either to fight or to flee, what other thing can they do, but (as appointed by Gods ordinance) offer themselves and all they haue about them presently vnto vs. We see then their hordes, their armour, and their bodies ready here at your pleasure, lift vp your hearts therefore, and reach your hands to take that with great chearefulness of mind, which the Lord hath thus offered and freely presented vnto you.

So to per he had all made an end of his words, the batels were ready to ioine, they met with great noise of trumpets and other instruments, and the fight began with a verie foze and cruell slaughter. Hard it was in the beginning to gesse who should haue the better. The wing of the disherited men ouerthrew and bare downe their aduersaries, which were led by the duke of Britaine, and the forenamed earles. On the contrarie part, the earle of Albemarle and William de Pyres put the Welshmen to flight, but by the earle of Chester and his retinue, the same earle and William de Pyres were fiercelie assailed afresh, and put out of order. Thus was the kings side put to the worse, namelie his hordemen, who being placed in the forefront, and there ouermatched, fell to galoping. Which thing when the king beheld, he was not yet any whit therewith abashed, but like an hardie captein (as he was no lesse indeed) comforted his footmen whom he had about him, and rushing vpon his enemies, bare them downe, and ouerthrew so manie as stood before him, so that with the point of his weapon he made himselfe waie. His footmen, who were but a few in number to the multitude of his enemies, counteruailed in all points the prowes and manlike doings of their king and captein, in so much that few batels had bene better fought, nor with greater slaughter on both sides, if the kings foze ward (which in maner at the first shanke backe and was disordered, not without some suspicion of treason) had staied the hount of the enemies a while, as it had bene requisite. At length the king encountering with the earle of Chester, being overcharged with multitude, was taken prisoner by one William de Cahames.

Carle Baldwin, who had made the oration in the kings behalfe, was also taken, after he had fought valiantlie and receiued manie foze wounds: likewise Richard Fitzbryse, who on that daie had shewed good proue of his manhood, and had giuen and receiued manie a foze stripe. To conclude, all those that abode with the king, and namelie all the footmen were taken prisoners, those which were slaine in the place excepted. This battell was fought in the first yeare of king Stephans reigne, vpon Candlemas daie, being fundate, as Niger saith,

W. Paru.

The king being apprehended and brought to the empresse lieng at Glocester, was commanded by hir to be conueied in safetie vnto Wiltow, where he was kept as prisoner from that time of his taking, vntill the feast of All saints next ensuing. Not long after this field fought, as ye haue heard, Geoffrey earle of Anion husband to the emperesse, receiuing aduertisement of this victorie achieved in England, forthwith inuaded Normandie, inducing all the Nobles of the countrie to incline vnto him: for by publishing the captiuitie of king Stephan, it was easie for him to come by the possession of the same.

Howeouer, David king of Scotland entred into Northumberland, and by commandement of the emperesse toke the countrie into his hands, whilst she (like a woman of great wisdom, as she was no lesse indeed) iudging that it stood hir vpon to vse the victorie which fell to hir lot, slept not hir businesse, but went forward, and setting from Glocester, she came to Winchester, where she was honozable receiued of bishop Henrie, though he was king Stephans brother, and inwardlie lamented the misfortune of the king. Then came she backe againe to Wiltow, and so to Drenford, from thence to Reading, and then to S. Albons, into all which cities and towncs she was receiued with great triumph and honour.

Waning thus passed through all the south parts of the realme on that side, she finally came to London, where the citizens welcomed hir in most iollit and hartie maner. Now being come to London, and consulting with those of hir counsell for the quieting of the whole state of the realme, queene Dauid wife to king Stephan (for so she was also called) made humble suit vnto hir to haue hir husband set at libertie, promising that he should resigne his whole claime and title into hir hands, and content himselfe with a priuate life. But hir suit was so farre off from being granted, that she was reiected and cast off with reprochfull words. Wherevpon she conceived a most high displeasure, and understood well inough; that peace was to be purchased by force of armes onelie, and not by any other meanes: in so much that with all diligence she sent to hir sonne Eustace (then being in Kent) & willed him to prepare an armie, which he did most speedilie.

all the Kentishmen would helpe to strengthen them in their enterprise. But reckoning with his selfe that non parat prospera tutius esse fuga,

And being warned thereof, he fled by night out of the citie, and went to Drenford, determining to be revenged upon his adversaries when time should serve his turne. Here with he began to war more displeased both against those Nobles whom he kept in prison, & other also whom he troubled, but name-lie king Stephan, whom he commanded to be loden with prions, and served with verie slender diet.

Now when he had thus fled out of London, which was about the feast of the natiuitie of S. John Baptist, the towne of London was besieged, which Gesserey de Hantewile held, and valiantlie defended. The same Gessrey rushing out on a tyme, came to Ful-ham, where he took the bishop of London then lodging in his manor place, being one of the contrarie faction.

Henric bishop of Winchester perceiuing the wrath of the emperesse more and more to increase daile against his people, thinking it wise to serue the time, manned all the castels which he had builded within his dioces, as at Waltham, Farnham, and other places, and withdrew himselfe into the castell of Winchester, there to remaine, till he might see to what end the furie of the woman would grow. This being knowne, the emperesse took vnto hir Dauid king of Scotland that was hir vnckle, who immediatlie joining their armies together, went to Winchester and besieged the castell. In the meane time the quene and hir sonne Eustace, with the helpe of their frends, as the Kentishmen, the Londoners and other had assembled a great armie, and appointed the gouernement and generall conduct thereof vnto one William of Ypres a Fleming, who for his valiancie was by king Stephan created earle of Kent: he was sonne to Philip of Flanders, begotten of a concubine, his father also was sonne to Robert earle of Flanders, surnamed Frisus. This William was banished out of his countie by Theodorike Elfas earle of Flanders, because he attempted to bereaue him of his earledome.

The quenes armie thus committed to his guiding, came nere vnto Winchester, and kept the emperesse and hir people in maner besieged: at length perceiuing the aduantage after the coming of a great supplie of Londoners to their aid, they set vpon hir armie as the same was departing, with such violence, that straightwaies hir host was put to flight and discomfited. The emperesse was glad to saue hir selfe dead, and so to be conueied in a coche as a dead corps vnto Glocester. Hir brother Robert with manie other of the Nobles that staid behind, till she and other might get out of danger, were taken prisoners. And because the king was kept at Wistow vnder the custodie of the said Robert, the quene caused him to be hardlie handled, that he might proue the words of the gospell true: With what measure ye meat vnto other, with the same by other shall it be remeasured vnto you. He had deserved verie euill of the king heretofore, and therefore it was now re-membred. He was taken (in maner abovesaid) on the feast day of the exaltation of the crosse.

David king of Scotland was not at the battell himselfe, but hearing of the discomfiture, got him out of the countie, and by helpe of trustie guides returned into Scotland, whilest Alberike de Clere was slaine at London in a seditious tumult raised by the citizens. The kingdome being thus diuided into two seuerall factions, was by all similitudes like to come to utter ruine: for the people kindled in hatred one against another, sought nothing else but reuenge on both sides, and still the land was spoiled and waisted by the men of warre which lodged within the castels and fortresses, and would often issue out to harrie and spoil the countie. But now that the two chiefeheads were prisoners, there was good hope conceiued that God had so wrought it, whereby might grow some ouerture of talks, to quiet such troubles by friendlie peace and agreement.

Here vpon those lords that wished well to the common-wealth, began to intreate betwixt them, and articles were propounded for a concord to be had, and an exchange of prisoners on both sides. But the emperesse and hir brother would not hearken to any agreement, except that the realme might whole re-maine to the said emperesse. Whereby the enmities were rather increased than decreased by this treatie, so that at length the king and the earle (winded with tedious prisonment, and hard imprisonment, and putting all their hope in the chance of war) about the feast of All saints made exchange by de-liuering of the one for the other, without making mention of any peace at all: and so kindled with new displeasures, they renewed the warre.

King Stephan being deliuered in such wise as you haue heard, comming to London, and there being accompanied with his brother Henric bishop of Winchester (then the popes legat) Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and others, he called a parlement, wherein the king declared the present state, how the enemie was brought to this point, that if it would please the Nobles of the realme to mainteine him with men & monie, he trusted now so to worke, as they should not need to feare submission to the poe of a womans gouernment: which at the first they seemed much to dislike, and now listens (to their great graue) had proued to be intollerable. The summe of his talke tended to this end, that those which were able of themselves to aid him with their olone persons, should prepare them out of hand so to do; and the residue that were not meet (as bishops, and such like manner of men) should be contributos to aid him with hired souldiers, armour, and monie.

This was gladlie agreed vpon, with the generall consent of all the assemblie. And because the bishops shewed themselves verie liberall towards the ad-uancing of the kings purpose, there was a statute made at the same parlement, that who so euer did laie any violent hands on a sacred person, or else toke vpon him to apprehend any of them, for what fault soeuer, without the bishops licence, he should be accused, and not be absolved of any maner of person, except of the pope, as by a canon it was already decreed, but not obeyed among the Englishmen till that daie. The cause of making this statute was this:
lie, for that preests during the time of the ciuill wars, were daile either slaine, or taken prisoners, and so put to their ransoms, or charged with great penalties and grieuous fines.

The bishop of Winchester at this councill also began another bzail among the cleargie, for bringing brother to king Stephan, & armed with the popes au-thoritie as his legat in England, by reason of exercising his authoritie, fell at variance with the bishop of Canturburie, who toke himselfe for his superior, because he was his pimat. This quarrell grew so far in question, that they went both to Rome to haue the controuersie decided, and so bringing their suits thither, contented well the eares of them that had the hearing of the same: for the more weightie the cause seemed, the better it liked them.

A late writer, noting in clergiemens of his age & countie not onelie the aspiring vice of ambition, but other disorders also, and monstrous outrages, after a complaint made that gold (by which title he calloeth those of the ecclesiasticall order) is turned in-

The emperesse besieged in Drford.

As the king began (after his libertie obtained) to prouide for warres, so earle Robert (after he was discharged) sailed ouer into Normandie, taking with him the sonnes of diuerse Noble men who fauored the emperesse, whome he deliuered to his husband the earle of Aniou to be kept as pledges, & earnestlie besought him to passe ouer into England with an armie to aide the emperesse. Wholueit bicause he was newlie intred into the conquest of Normandie, and had already won the most part thereof, he thought good to make first an end of his warres there, hauing somewhat to do against certeine rebels of his owne countie of Aniou, which did not a little molest him. But he recovered (whilest the earle of Gloucester was there with him) Alney, Portaigne, Tencherbraz, and diuerse other places pertaineing chieflie to the earle of Portaigne: about the same time also they of Constances submitted themselves vnto him. Thus the earle of Aniou being occupied in those parties, could not well come into England.

Whereupon the earle of Gloucester came backe againe himselfe, and brynging with him somewhat lesse than foure hundred men of armes (imbarcked in 52 ships) landed with the same at Warrham, and besieged the castell there, which his enemies had won out of his hands whilest he was absent in Normandie. In the end they that were within it (vnder the gouernment of Herebert de Lucy) fell to agreement by composition, that if they were not succoured by a certeine time, they should deliuer the castell vnto the earle. King Stephan himselfe the same time held a siege before Drford, within the which he had inclosed the emperesse, as hereafter shalbe shewed: so that they within the castell of Warrham had no succour sent vnto them, and therefore (according to the articles of their composition) they yielded by the hold, after earle Robert had lien there weekes before it.

This castell being thus wonne, earle Robert subdued also such as kept the Ile of Portland, and had sented it after the maner of a fortreffe: afterwards he came to Cirecester, and there assembled all those that fauoured the part of the emperesse, meaning with all conuenient speed to go to Drford, & there to giue battell to king Stephan, if he would abide it. Who after his deliuerance from captiuitie, had assembled a great host of men, and comming to Drford, where the emperesse then laie, suddenly besieged hir, before she looked for him. And to the end also that he might compell the townsmen to yield, or else keepe them from entring (which would come to their succors, he ranged aboad into the countie with part of his armie, waiking all afoze him by fire & sword. This siege continued almost two monthes, in maner from his deliuerie in the beginning of Nouember, vntill Christmasse immediatlie following: in somuch that through lacke of vittells they within the towne began to raise mutinies. The emperesse therefore doubting the sequele, and seeing hir prouision to decaye, deuised a shift how to escape that present danger, which by force she was vnluckie to performe.

It was a verie hard winter that yeare, the Thames and other riuers thereabouts were frozen, so that both man and horse might safelie passe ouer vpon the yce, the fields were also couered with a thicke and deepe snow. Hereupon taking occasion, she clad hir selfe and all hir companie in white apparell, that a far off they might not be discerned from the snow; and so by negligence of the watch that kept ward but slenderlie, by reason of the exceeding cold weather, she and hir partakers secretlie in the night issued out of the towne, and passing ouer the Thames, came to Wallingford, where she was receiued into the castell by those that had the same in keeping to hir vse: of whom Brian the sonne to the earle of Gloucester was the chiefe.

¶ Here we may see the subtiltie of the emperesse, whereby she obtained free and safe passage out of hir enemies hands, who otherwise had taken hir in their net. So that it will be true, that hath neuer bene false, which Aeneas Syluius (and before him many more) driuing vpon the like argument) doth saie in this distichon:

Non audet Stygias Pluto tentare, quod audent Effreni monachibus pleneque fraudis illa,

Meaning Mulier, a woman. And therefore loke what they want in magnanimitie, in strength, in courage, the same is supplied by deceit, by circumuention, by craft, by fraud, by collusion; sometimes applied to a good intent, but most commonlie directed to an euill meaning and purpose, as the euents themselves do manie times declare. But let vs see what followed vpon this escape of the emperesse.

After hir departure from Drford, the townsmen yielded vnto the king, who hauing taken order for the keeping of them in obedience, marched toward Wallingford, minding to besiege the castell there: but being encountred in the way by his enemies, he was driuen backe, and so constrained to turne another waie. Earle Robert hearing that his sister was escaped and gotten to Wallingford, halted thither with all speed to visit hir: & (as some write) brought with him hir sonne the lord Henrie that was come with him from beyond the seas, to see his mother: so that the emperesse now beholding both hir sonne and brother, receiued them with all the ioy and honour that she could or might presentlie make them. Her son remaining vnder the gouernment of earle Robert, was then appointed by him to abide within the citie of Wiltow, & there continued for the space of 4. yeeres, being committed to one Mattheu his schoolmaster, to be instructed in knowledge, and trained vp in ciuill behaviour.

King Stephan (after the spoiling of sundrie churches, the robbing and burning of manie townes and villages by the hands of his hired souldiers, who for the more part were Flemings) came at length with his brother the bishop of Winchester stronglie armed vnto Wiltow, where he took in hand to fortifie the nurrie in stead of a castell, to resist the incurfions and inrodes of them of Salisburie, who in the behalfe of the emperesse had done manie displeasures vnto his friends: but earle Robert vnderstanding of his doings, got a power togither with all speed, and the first daie of Iulie about sunne setting came to Wiltow, and suddenly set the towne on fire.

The king being lodged within the nurrie, and fearing no such matter, after he heard of the sudden assembling of his enemies, was put in such feare, that he took himselfe dishonourable to flight, leauing his men, his plate, and other riches altogether behind him.

him. The earles souldiers egerlie assailed the kings people, killed and spoiled them at their pleasure, rifled the kings treasure without resistance, and satisfieth themselves with greedines. In this boile was William Marcell or Martell taken prisoner by earle Roberts men, & led to the castell of Wallingford, where Brian the earle of Glocesters sonne hauing charge of that castell, kept him in close prison, and vsed him hardlie, who by reason of the opinion which men had conceiued of his valiancie, could not be deliuered, till he had paid 300. marks for his ransome, and deliuered the castell of Shirborne into the earles hands. Within a few daies after, Spiles earle of Hereford departed this life, whose death was verie greivouslie taken of the emperesse, for he was one of hir chiefe frends and counsellors. His eldest sonne Roger succeeded him, a gentleman though young in yeares, yet valiant and forward in feats of armes. William Pandenile earle of Essex, an ancient capteine, & an expert warriour (who had serued the emperesse, was taken also at S. Albons) but not without great slaughter of the kings souldiers: in so much that among other, the erle of Arundell mounted on a courageous palfrie & a verie valiant man was overthrowen in the middell of a water called Haliwell, by a knight named Walkeline de Wraite, so that the same earle was sore bzuisied in his bodie, and almost bzowned. The king was present himselfe at the taking of the said Pandenile, whom he spoiled of all his goods, and constrained by way of redemption of his libertie, to deliuer into the kings hands the Tower of London, the castell of Walden, and Diephey. Hereupon the same earle being released was driven through pouertie to take some recouerie of his losses by sundrie spoiles and robberies. First of all therefore he spoiled the abbey of S. Albons, and then the abbey of Ramsey, which he fortified and defended as a fortreffe, casting the monks out of doores, and in euery place where soeuer he came, he robbed the countrie before him, till at length in the midst of his reuenge and malicious doings, he was shot thorough with an arrow amongst his men by a filie footman, and so ended his life with confusion, receiving worthie punishment for his vngodlie behaviour. For he was a man of high stomach & loslie courage, but verie obstinate against God, of great industry in worldly businesse, but passing negligent towards his maker, as writers report of him.

Likewise Robert Patmion, who had attempted the semblable robbrie & spoile in the abbey church of Couentrie, was slaine before the same abbey by a like mischance. For going forth to encounter with the earle of Chester (his mortall enimie, and being approached as then towards the citie) he fell with his horse into a ditch, which he caused to be couertlie made for the destruction of his enimies: and before he could be relieved, a souldier of the earles part slept to him, and stroke his head from his shoulders in sight of both armies. Crinulfus the sonne of earle Geoffrey Pandenile that kept the church of Ramsey as a fortreffe, after his fathers death, was taken at length and banished.

Thus we see how Gods iudgement hunteth and pursueth the wicked, in so much that they be overtaken in their owne imaginations: according to that of the scripture, The wicked and bloudy heartie man shall not liue halfe his daies. And true it is, that as men liue, so commonlie they die: for, as one saith verie well;

bona nulla sceleris

Et iustus mali nulla quidem contingere possunt.

About the same time advertisement was giuen, that the citie of Lincoln, which the earle of Chester had in keeping, was but slenderlie manned. Where upon the king conceiuing some hope to win the same, hasted forward: and comming thither in the night, laid siege thereunto, and began to cast a trench to stop them within fro making any sallies without.

The earle at the first being somewhat amazed with the sudden approach of the enimie, yet beholding from the walles the maner of them without, he perceiued the rankes to be verie thin: and thereby guessing their number to be but small, suddenly issued forth at the gates to encounter with them. The king abode not the giuing of the charge, because he was both weake and therefore feeb; neither could the earle follow the chace conuenientlie, for the like cause; but setting upon those that were about to make the trench, he slue 80. of the workemen, and then retired into the castell.

This yeare was an heinous act committed by the Jewes at Forwich, where they put a child to death, in crucifying him upon a crosse to the reproch of Christians religion.

In the yeare following, namely, in the 10. yeare of king Stephens reigne, Robert earle of Glocester and other capteins toke in hand to build a castell at Faringdon. But king Stephan assembling an armie of Londoners and other, came thither, and besieged them within. Now whilst earle Robert and others of the emperesses capteins remaining not far off, taried for a greater power to come to their aid, the king with sharpe assaults (but not without losse of his men) wan the fortreffe: whereby his side began to war the stronger, and to be more highlie aduanced. After this he came with a mightie armie vnto Wallingford, and there builded a strong castell ouer against the other castell which his aduersaries held against him.

Wither also came the earle of Chester with a great traine of knights and gentlemen vnto the king, and so at length they were not vnseignidie accorded and made friends, but in apperance on the kings behalfe. For shortly after, the earle was craftilie taken at a parlement holden at Northampton, by the practise of R. Stephan, and could not be deliuered, till he had surrendered the citie and castell of Lincoln, with other fortresses pertaining to the crowne into the kings hands. About that time did the Welshmen destroy the prouince of Chester, but at last they were distressed. This yeare also the lord Geoffrey earle of Antio sent three Noble men into England, accompanied with certaine men of warre, vnto earle Robert, requesting him to send ouer his sonne Henrie into France, that he might see him, and if need required, he promised to send him backe againe with all conuenient speed. Earle Robert was contented to satisfie his request: and so with a good power of armed men brought the lord Henrie vnto Warham, where he toke leaue of him, neuer after to see him in this world. For when the child was transported, earle Robert returned speedilie to the parties from whence he came, and there falling into an ague, departed this life about the beginning of Nouember, and was buried at Bistow. The lord Henrie comming to his father, was ioisfully receiued, and remained in those parties for the space of two yeares and foure moneths.

In the meane season, the busst proceedings of R. Stephan against the earle of Chester, purchased him new hatred of his old aduersaries, and like suspicion of such as were his frends, for it sounded not a little to his dishonor. Curie man therefore was in doubt of his dealing, and iudged that it stood them vpon to take heed to themselves. But he (as one that thought he had atchiued some high exploit) in triumphant wise shortly after entred into Lincoln in his roiall robes, and his crowne on his head, whereas it had not not bene heard that any king had done the like manie yeares before.

¶ It is reported by some writers, that he did this, to root out of mens minds a foolish superstitious conceit, which beleued that no king with his crowne upon his head might enter that citie, but some mischance should light upon him: whereupon he feared by this meanes to mocke their superstitious imagination.

About the same time manie of the Nobles of the realme (perceiving the kings authoritie to repress violent wrongs committed by euill doers to be defective) builded sundrie strong castles and fortresses upon their owne grounds, either to defend themselves, or to make force upon their enemies nere adjoining. After the departing of the king from Lincoln, the earle of Chester came thither with an armie, to assaie if he might recouer that citie. But his lieutenant that had the leading of his men, was slain at the entering of the northgate, and so the earle was beaten backe with the losse of manie of his men: and the citizens hauing got the upper hand, reioysed not a little for the victorie.

¶ But here (to stay a little with temporall affaires) it shall not be amisse to rehearse the effect of a contention, which fell about this time betwene that king, and the archbishop of Canturburie. For so it happened (as Geruasius Dorobernensis writeth) that pope Eugenius came this yeare into France, about the middell of Lent, and afterward held a synod or councell at Rheims: whereunto Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, with others of the English bishops were summoned. The archbishop thereupon asking licence of the king, and not obtaining it, found meanes to steale awaie in a small bote, not without danger of his person.

¶ Now therefore the case of this Theobald stood verie hard: for Henrie bishop of Winchester the kings brother through enuie had so wrought, that if the archbishop passed ouer without licence, he should be confined of the king. Again, he was sure, if he came not to the councell, that he should be suspended by the pope. Whereupon the archbishop meaning rather to offend the king than the pope, got ouer, as it were swimming, rather than sailing; the vessel where in he passed ouer being starke naught: for all the ports were kept by the kings seruants, so that he was glad to take such a bote as came next to hand. In consideration whereof he was highlie commended by the pope.

In this councell the prebendaries of Poike, together with Henrie Spordach then abbat of Fountney, presented themselves, exhibiting their complaint against William archbishop of Poike, for that (as they alledged) he was neither canonically chosen, nor lawfullie consecrated, but intruded by the kings authoritie. At length archbishop William was conuicted and deposed, Albert bishop of Hoya pronouncing sentence in this wise: Uile des deus by the apostolike authoritie, that William archbishop of Poike is to be deposed from his see, because Stephan king of England, before any canonically election, named him.

¶ Then, for that pope Eugenius had thus deposed archbishop William, although not with the consent of the more part of the cardinals, the chapter of the church of Poike, by his commandement conuining together, part of them chose Hilarie bishop of Chichester, and the other part elected Henrie Spordach abbat of Fountney. Now pope Eugenius, when both elections were shewed him at Auerre, confirmed the election of Henrie Spordach, and disanulled the other, and then consecrated the foresaid Henrie with his owne hands. The late nominated archbishop

William being thus deposed, returned into England, and remained at Winchester with king Henrie till the death of pope Eugenius, following the counsell of the same bishop in all things.

¶ Now when the councell at Rheims was ended, archbishop Theobald returned into England, and coming to Canturburie, was receiued with great honour of the couent and citizens there. But the king remaining then at London, when he heard of it, was sore displeased, and came with great speed vnto Canturburie, where much conference being had betwixt him and the archbishop (although to small purpose) for the bringing of them to an agreement, at length the king compelled the archbishop to depart the realme. Whereupon, after a few daies respite, he went to Douer, where he took ship and sailed into France. But within a while he was called backe by the queene and William of Pyres, vnto S. Omers, that they might the sooner aduertise him of the kings mind and pleasure. Here he consecrated Gilbert the elect bishop of Hereford, the first daie of September, Theodoise bishop of Amiens and Nicholas bishop of Cambze assisting him.

¶ After this, when by sending of messengers to and fro, aswell bishops, abbats, and other, both spirituall persons and temporall, there could no agreement be made, he directed his letter to certeine churches here in England, pronouncing by a certeine day, namelie the twelue day of September, a sentence of interdiction to be obserued through the realme. The monks of Canturburie sore offended herewith, before the prescribed day of this sentence to be put in execution, sent two monkes of their owne house, Sigell and Absolom, vnto the pope: whose errand when the pope had vnderstood, he commanded them to returne home, and to obeye their archbishops sentence in all things.

In the meane time the archbishops men and tenants were sore oppressed, and his rents and revenues seized to the kings vse, yea euen before the daies of payment. Which manner of proceeding sore grieved the archbishop: in so much that departing from S. Omers, he came to Graueling, and there taking the sea, crossed ouer to a towne called Goleford that belonged vnto Hugh Wigot erle of Northfolke: which earle receiued him with great honour, and sent him all necessarie prouision, so long as he remained in his countrie. At the terme appointed, he interdicted all the kings dominions, and would not reuoke the sentence, till Robert bishop of London, Hilarie bishop of Chichester, and William bishop of Norwich, with manie other Noblemen, came to him vnto Framelingham in Northfolke, a castell appertaining to the said earle, where at length an appointment was concluded betwixt him and the king: whereupon he was brought home vnto Canturburie with great ioy and honour.

¶ He accused the monkes of Canturburie, for disobeying the interdiction, trusting that the pope would not heare those two monkes whom they had sent, as he did not indeed. He excommunicated also all those that had receiued the sacraments amongst them, during the time of the interdiction. Now these monkes being at their wits end, dispatched with all speed other two monkes to the pope, to obtaine an absolution, before the archbishop should vnderstand it: but they were sent backe againe with checks, and commanded to obeye their archbishop in all things, as the other were, which had bene there with him before.

The monkes of Canturburie that were sent to Rome, returning, came from thence to Bullongne, where they found those that were first sent thither: and so they all foure came to Canturburie. The pope also had sent a priue commandement to the archbishop, shop, that he should duclie punish as well them as the other. Whereupon the archbishop taking counsell with his friends, deposed Syluester the prior, and suspended William the secretarie of the house from entreing the quere. It was decreed also, that the residue should cease so long a time from saying seruice, as they had said it before vnlawfullie, against the archbishops commandement. For it was thought reason, that whilste other sang and were merrie, they should keepe silence, which wilfullie took upon them to sing, whilste other held their peace and were still. They began therefore to cease from saying diuine seruice, and from ringing their bells in the second weeke of Lent: & so kept silence from the twelue day of March, untill the first day of August.

The queene wife to king Stephan in this meane while lay much at S. Augustines in Canturburie, because of hastening forward the building of Feuerham abbey, which she and hir husband had begonne from the verie foundation. And because the monkes of S. Augustine might not celebrate diuine seruice, she called thither commonlie the monkes of Christs church to say seruice before hir. Thus much for that purpose: and now to other matters.

The lord Henrie Fitzempresse after all these businesses returned into England, in the moneth of May, with a great companie of men of warre both horsemen and footmen: by reason whereof many revolted from king Stephan to take part with him: whereas before they sat still, and would not attempt any exploit against him. But now incouraged with the presence of the lord Henrie, they declared themselves frends to him, and enemies to the king. Immediately after his arriual, he took with him the earles of Chester and Hereford, Ranulfe and Roger, and diuers other noble men and knights of great fame, beside those whom he had brought with him out of Normandie, and went vnto Carleil, where he found his cousin Dauid king of Scotland, of whome he was most ioyfullie receiued: and vpon Whitsunday with great solemnitie, being not past fiftene yeares of age, was by the same king made knight, with diuerse other yong gentlemen that were much about the same age.

¶ Some write, that the king of Scots receiued an oth of him before he gaue him the hono^r of knight-hood, that if he chanced to attaine vnto the possession of the realme of England, he should restore to the Scots the towne of Newcastle, with the countrie of Northumberland, from the riuer of Tweed, to the riuer of Tyne. But whether it were so or not, I am not able to make warrantize.

Now king Stephan hearing that the king of Scots, and his aduersarie the lord Henrie with the chiefe lords of the west parts of England lay thus in Carleil, he raised an armie, and came to the citie of York, where he remained for the most part of the moneth of August, fearing least his enemies should attempt the winning of that citie. But after the one part had remained a time in Carleil, and the other in York, they departed from both those places without any further exploit for that season, sauing that Eustachius king Stephens sonne (hauing also lately receiued the order of knight-hood) did much hurt in the countreies which belonged to those noble men that were with the lord Henrie.

The great raine that fell in the summer season this yeare did much hurt vnto come standing on the ground, so that a great dearth folloved. In the winter also after, about the tenth day of December, it began to freeze extreame, and so continued till the nineteenth of Februarie: whereby the riuer of Thames was so frozen, that men might passe ouer it both on foot and horsebacke.

In the meane while Henrie Duke of Normandie, after he had returned from the king of the Scots, sailed backe into Normandie, about the beginning of August, leauing England full of all those calamities, which ciuill warre is accustomed to bring with it, as burning of houses, killing, robbing, and spoiling of people, so that the land was in danger of utter destruction, by reason of that pestilent disorder.

This yeare the 23. of Februarie, Galfridus Monumetensis, other wise called Galfridus Athurius, who turned the British historie into Latine, was consecrated bishop of S. Asaph, by Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, at Lambeth, William bishop of Norwich and Walter bishop of Rochester assisting him.

Howeuer, this yeare (as some writers haue recorded) Geoffrey earle of Anjou, husband to the emperesse Maude, departed this life, on the seventh day of September, leauing his sonne Henrie onelie heire and successor in the estates of the duchie of Normandie and countie of Anjou. The bodie of the said earle was buried at Spans, with a great funerall pompe: his three sonnes Henrie, Geoffrey, and William being present.

But king Stephan assaulting the faire citie of Worcester with a great power of men of warre, took it, and consumed it with fire, but the castell he could not win. This citie belonged to earle Walter de Mellest, at that season: for king Stephan to his owne hinderance had given it vnto him. Now after the men of warre had diuided the spoile amongst them, they came backe, and passing through the lands of their enemies, got great booties, which they also took away with them, finding none to resist them in their iourney.

In the yeare following Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and legat to the see apostolike, held a generall synod or counsell at London in the Lent season, where king Stephan himselfe with his sonne Eustachius, and other the peeres of the realme were present. This counsell was full of appeales, contrarie to that had bene vsed in this land, till the time that Henrie bishop of Winchester vnto his owne harme (whilste he was likewise the popes legat) had by vniu^{er}sall intrusion brought them in, and now at this counsell he was himselfe thise appealed to the hearing of the popes owne consistorie. After this king Stephan in the same yeare brake into the citie of Worcester, and whereas he could not the last time win the castell, he now endeouored with all his force to take it. But when those within made valiant resistance, he raised two castels against it, and leaning in the same certeine of his nobles to continue the siege, he himselfe returned home. ¶ Thus (as ye see) the kings proprietie was to attempt manie things valiantlie, but he proceeded in them oftentimes verie foolishlie: howbeit, now by the policie of the earle of Leicester, those two castels which the king had raised to besiege the other castell, were shortly after destroyed: and so the besieged were deliuered from danger. This earle of Leicester was brother to the earle of Mellest. Thus the kings purposed intention and painefull trauell on that behalfe came to none effect.

In the meane while Henrie duke of Normandie married Elianor duchesse of Guien or Aquitaine, lately diuorced from the French king, and so in right of hir he became duke of Aquitaine, and earle of Poitou: for he was the onelie daughter to William duke of Guien, and earle of Poitou, and by hir father created his sole and lawfull heire.

The French king was nothing pleased with this marriage, in so much that he made force warre vpon duke Henrie, joining himselfe in leaguer with king Stephan, with his sonne Eustace, and with the lord Geoffrey Geffrey brother to duke Henrie, so that the said Henrie was constrained to defer his iourne into England, and applie his power to defend his countreies and subiects on that side of the sea. For where as he was readie at the mouth of the riuer of Barbe to passe ouer into England, not long after midsummer, the French king, with Eustace king Stephens sonne, Robert earle of Berch, Henrie erle of Champagne, and Geffrey brother to duke Henrie, hauing assembled a mightie armie, came and besieged the castell of Newmarch, and sent forth the lord Geffrey with a strong power to win the castell of Angers. Duke Henrie aduertised hereof, departing from the place where he sojourned, halted forth to succour his people that were besieged, but the castell of Newmarch was deliuered to the French king, through treason of those that had it in keeping, before the duke could come to their rescue.

The castell of Newmarch deliuered to the French king.

Whereupon the said duke hauing knowledge by the waie that he should come too late thither, he encamped first vpon the side of the riuer of Andell, and waisted a great part of the countreie of Neuen oꝝ Neulquesne, surnamed Le Rozmant, which lieth betwixt the riuer of Epte and Andell. This countreie belonged sometime to Rozmandie, but Geffrey earle of Anion the dukes father had resigned it to the French king, to the end he should not aid king Stephan. The duke also burned the castells of Bascheruile, Chitrey, Stirpiney, and the castell of Fort, that belonged to Hugh de Courney, with diuerse other. About the end of August he left his towne in Rozmandie sufficientlie furnished with garisons of soldiers, and went into Anion, where he besieged the castell de mount Sotelli, till he had taken it, and all those that were within it, amongst whom was the lord thereof named William. The French king on the other side entring into Rozmandie, burnt part of the borough of Kienle, and either then oꝝ shortly after that duke Henrie was gone ouer into England, he took the towne and castell of Clernon.

Whilist these things were thus a doing in France, R. Stephan would haue caused the archbishop of Canturburie & diuerse other bishops, whom for that purpose he had assembled, to crowne, anoint, and confirme his sonne Eustace king ouer the realme of England. But the archbishops and bishops refused to do so, because the pope by his letters sent to the archbishop, had commanded to the contrary; namely, that he should in no wise crowne the kings son, because his father king Stephan had got the possession of the land against his oth receiued in behalfe of the emperesse. The father and sonne being not a litle offended herewith, committed most of his bishops to ward, seeking by threats and menacings to bring them to his purpose. The bishops also were in no small perplexitie: for according to the truth, the king neuer seemed greatlie to fauor churchmen, because of their strength (as in former times by his rigour used against the bishops of Salisburie and Lincoln it plainlie appeared) and yet would not these men yield to his pleasure: whereupon although they were set at libertie, they were neuertheless deprived of their temporal possessions, which notwithstanding afterwaies vpon the kings owne motion were restored vnto them.

The pope is against it.

The bishops are thus carned.

The archbishop of Canturburie fled out of the realme.

Whombeit the archbishop of Canturburie persisting still in his opinion, was forsaken of diuerse of the bishops, who though feare durst not stand against their princes pleasure. But the archbishop, when he perceived how the matter went, & that all the blame was like to light and rest on his shoulders, he got himselfe by a marvellous hap ouer the Thames, and with speed riding to Dover, passed the sea, to auoid both the fathers and sonnes reuergefull displeasure.

Hereupon the king seized into his hands all the lands & possessions that belonged to the archbishop.

This yeare quene Maude wife to king Stephan departed this life at Hangey castell, that belonged to earle Alberike de War, about the third daie of Maie, and was buried in the abbey of Feuerham, which she with hir husband king Stephan had lately founded.

Moreover one John, a monk of Sagium, was made the second bishop of the Ile of Man: the first bishop that was there instituted hight Winmond a monk of Sauinie, who for his importunate murther menour in some respects, had his eyes put out, and was displaced.

As this cardinall passed through England, he receiued an oth of fealtie vnto king Stephan.

The same yeare also king Stephan by siege and force of assault did win the castell of Newberie not far from Winchester. This done he went to Malinsford, and besieging the castell, he builded at the entring of the bridge a fortresse to stop them within from issuing out, and likewise from receiuing any reliefe oꝝ succour by their friends abroad. The defendants perceiuing themselves so hardlie laid at, sent to the duke of Rozmandie (in whose name they kept that castell) desiring him either to succour them, oꝝ else giue them licence to yield vpon the castell to the king. Whereupon duke Henrie hauing dispatched his businesse on the further side of the sea, began to be kindled with a feruent desire once againe to attempt his fortune here in England for reuenerie of that kingdom, and so with three thousand footmen, & 7. score horsemen, with all speed possible sailed ouer into England, where he landed about the 12. daie in Christmasse. He was no sooner arrived, but a great number of such as took part with his mother came flocking in vnto him: whereupon being now furnished with a great and puissant armie, he marched forth to Palmesburie, where in the castell was a great garison of soldiers placed by king Stephan. Duke Henrie planted his siege about this castell the thirteenth daie of Januarie, and enforced himselfe to the uttermost of his power to win it.

Now king Stephan hearing of his enemies arrival, with all hast possible got his armie on foot, and coming suddenlie towards the place where his enemies were pitched, he caused duke Henrie to raise his siege, and following after, offered him battell. But duke Henrie, knowing that his enemies were far more in number than he was at that present, and also conceiuing with himselfe that by prolonging of time his owne power would increase, abstained from fighting, and kept him within the closure of his campe. Thus haue some written, but other authors write, that Henrie kept himselfe indeed within his campe, and refused to giue battell, but yet remoued not his siege, till the king departed from thence, after he saw he could not haue his purpose, and then did duke Henrie win the castell of Palmesburie, oꝝ rather the maister tower oꝝ chefe dungeon of that castell. For as (Simon of Durham writeth) he had won by assault the other parts and lims of the castell before king Stephan came to remoue him.

This tower that thus held out, was in the keeping of one capteine Jordan, who escaping forth came to the king, informing him in what state he had left his men within the towre: whereupon the king (making all the power that he was able, set forward, and coming to Cireiter, lodged there one night, and in the morning purposing to raise the siege, or to fight with his enemies (if they would abide battell) marched forth towards Walmesburie. But upon his approach to the dukes campe, the daie following his coming thither, there rose such a hideous tempest of wind and raine, beating full in the faces of king Stephens people, that God seemed to fight for the duke, who in respect of the number of people was thought to weake to deale with the strong and puissant armie of the king: notwithstanding the storme being on his backe, and beating extremelie in king Stephens mens faces, they were not able to hold their weapons in their hands, in somuch that he perceived he could not passe the river that ran betwixt the armies: whereupon constrained in that sort through the violent rage of that cold and wet weather, he returned to London full euill appaied, in that he could not satisfie his expectation at that present.

The tower that duke Henrie had hardlie besieged immediatlie herewith was surrendered unto him, & then making provision for vittels and other things, to the reliefe of them that kept the castell of Wallingford, he hasted thither, and finding no resistance by the way, easily accomplished his enterprise. There were diuerse castles thereabouts in the countrie furnished with garisons of the kings souldiers, but they kept themselves close, and durst not come abroad to stop his passage. Shortly after he besieged the castell of Cranemers, and cast a trench about it, so as his people within Wallingford castell might haue free libertie to come forth at their pleasure: but as for those within the castell of Cranemers, they were so hardlie holden in, that there was no waie for them to start out.

The king aduertised hereof, got all his host together, and marched forward verie terrible toward duke Henries campe. But shewing no token of feare, he caused the trench wherewith he had inclosed his campe forthwith to be cast downe, and leaving the siege, came into the fields with his armie set in order of battell, meaning to trie the matter by dint of sword, although he had not the like number of men as the king had: whose armie perceiuing their enemies to come in the face of them, were stricken with a sudden feare: neuertheless, he himselfe being of a good courage, commanded his people to march forward. But herewith certaine noble men, that loued not the aduancement of either part, vnder a colour of good meaning sought to treat an agreement betwixt them, so that an intermission or celsing from war was granted, and by composition the castell which the king had built, and the duke besieged, was razed to the ground. The king and the duke also came to an enteruew and communication together, a river running betwixt them. Some write that they fell to agreement, king Stephan undertaking to raze the castell of Cranemers himselfe, and so leaueing armour asse for that time, they parted asunder.

But Eustace H. Stephens son was sore offended herewith, and repprouing his father for concluding such an agreement, in a great rage departed from the court, & taking his waie toward Cambridgeshire (which countrie he meant to ouerrun) he came to the abbey of Eurie, and vpon S. Laurence daie caused all the coine in the countrie about, and namelie that which belonged to the said abbey, to be spoiled and brought into a castell which he had in keeping not far from thence. But as he sat downe to meate at the same daie vpon receiuing the first messell he fell mad (as writers haue reported) and miserable ended his life. The same weeke Simon earle of Northampton departed this world of a like disease, and so two of the chiefest aduersaries which duke Henrie had, were rid out of the waie. Eustace was buried at Fleueham in Kent, and earle Simon at Northampton.

About the same time also that noble and valiant earle of Chester called Ranulfe departed this life, a man of such stoutnesse of stomack, that death could scarcely make him to yeld, or shew any token of feare: he was poisoned (as was thought) by William Peuerell. After him succeeded his sonne Hugh, a man likewise of passing strength and vertue. Now although earle Ranulfe fauoured the part of duke Henrie, yet in these later yeares he did but little for him: wherefore it was thought that the death of this earle was not so great a losse to the duke, as the deaths of Eustace, earle Simon, and other the kings friends deceasing about the same time seemed to further him: so that his part became daile stronger, and the kings weaker.

About the same time the castles of Reading and Birtwell were deliuered to duke Henrie, and the lady Gundreda countesse of Warwike drave out the souldiers that held it for king Stephan, and deliuered the towne to duke Henrie. In this yeare duchesse Glenor, wife to Henrie Fitzempresse, was brought to bed of hir first boine son, whom they named William, after the maner of the ancient dukes of Aquitaine.

Thus came things to passe in sundrie places with so good successe as duke Henrie could wish, whereupon meaning to follow the steps of prosperous fortune, he marched forth to Stamford, and taking the towne at his first coming laid siege to the castell. Now they that had it in keeping sent messengers to king Stephan, requiring rescue, but the same time he had laid siege to the castell of Gipswich, which Hugh Bigot kept against him: and because he would not depart from that siege till he had the castell giuen by into his hands (which came at last to passe) in the meane time the castell of Stamford was yielded up to duke Henrie, who immediatlie thereupon departed from Stamford eastward, meaning to come to the succour of his friends besieged at Gipswich or Ipswich (as it is commonlie called) not understanding as yet that they had surrendered the hold: but having knowledge by the way what was happened, he returned and marched straight to Spotingham, and got the towne easilie; for they within the castell had set it on fire, therefore he besieged the castell standing vpon the point of a stepe craggie rocke, and was furnished with a strong garison of men, and all things necessarie for defense, so that it could not easilie be wone.

Spotingham.

When duke Henrie had assailed all the waies betwixt to take it, and saw that he could not preuaile, he minded to lose no more time: but raising his siege from thence, he ranged abroad to get other places into his possession, and finally came to his mother, and laie at Wallingford. King Stephan in the meane time being strong in the field, sought time and place to haue Henrie at some aduantage, who in his young yeares (as yet not hauing tasted any misfortune) he thought would rashlie attempt some vnadvised enterprise. But whereas the realm of England had bene now manie yeares miserable turmoiled with ciuill warre (which the verie heathen haue so detested, that they haue exclaimed against it with a kind of irksomnesse; as:

Wherein (besides millions of extremities) honest mairons and mens wiues were violated, maids and birgins rauished, churches spoiled, towines and villages robbed, whole flocks and herds of sheepe and beaſts deſtroyed (wherein the ſubſtance of the realme cheſelie conſiſted) and men without number ſlaine and murdered, it pleaſed the goodneſſe of almighty God at length to deliuer the land of theſe miſeries, which were notified to all countries round about that ſore lamented the ſame.

Now whereas king Stephan was the cauſe of all the troubles, in hauing vſurped an other mans right full inheritance, it pleaſed God to moue his hart at length to deſire peace which he had euer before abhorred. The cauſe that moued him cheſelie to change his former purpoſe, was for that his ſonne Cuſſace by ſpeedie death was taken out of this world (as before you haue heard) which loſſe ſeemed great not on-lie to the father, but alſo to all thoſe lords and others which had alwaies taken his part, becauſe he was a young man ſo well liked of all men, that he was iudged to be bozne to much honour. But his wiſe Conſtance toke his death verie ſorrowfullie, and the more indeed, for that ſhe had no iſſue by him, whereupon ſhortlie after he was ſent honourable home to his father king Lewes with his dower, and other rich and princelie gifts.

King Stephan ſeeing himſelfe thus deſtroyed of his onlie ſonne, vnto whom he minded to leaue the kingdome which he ſo earneſtly ſought to confirme and aſſure vnto him by warlike endeuor, and that againe the French kings aid would not be ſo readie as heretofore it had bene (whereupon he much ſtaired, now that the bonds of affinitie were abolithed) he began at length (though not immediatlie vpon his ſonnes deſtruction) to withdraw his mind from war, and bequeathed it wholie to peace. Which alteration being perceiued, thoſe Nobles that were glad to ſee the ſtate of their countrie quieted, did their beſt to further it; & cheſelie Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie travelled earneſtly to bring the princes to ſome agreement, now talking with the king, now ſending to the duke, and vſing all means poſſible to ſet them at unitie. The biſhop of Wincheſter alſo, who had cauſed all the trouble, vpon conſideration of the great calamities therewith the land was moſt miſerable afflicted, began to wiſh an end thereof. Whereupon the lords ſpirituall and temporall were called together at Wincheſter about the latter end of Nouember, that they with their conſents alſo might confirme whatſoever the king and the duke ſhould conclude vpon.

Thus was a publicke aſſembly made in the citie of Wincheſter, whither alſo duke Henrie came, who being iſſuallie receiued of the king in the biſhops palace, they were made friends, the king admitting the duke for his ſonne, and the duke the king for his father, inſomuch that the agreement, which (through the carefull ſtate of the archbiſhop of Canturburie) had bene laboured with ſuch diligence to good effect, was now confirmed: the cheſe articles whereof were theſe.

1 That king Stephan, during his naturall life, ſhould remaine king of England, and Henrie the empreſſes ſonne ſhould enioy the dukedome of Normandie, and be proclaimed heire apparent to ſucceed in and haue the regiment of England, after the deſtruction of Stephan.

2 That ſuch noble men, and other, which had held either with the one partie or the other, during the time of the ciuill warres, ſhould be in no danger for the ſame, but enioy their lands, poſſeſſions and liuinges, according to their ancient rights and titles.

3 That the king ſhould reſume and take into his hands againe, all ſuch poſſions and parcels of inheritance belonging to the crowne, as he had giuen away, or were otherwiſe vſurped by any maner of perſon, and that all thoſe poſſeſſions which by any intruſion had bene violentlie taken from the right owners, ſince the daies of king Henrie, ſhould be re-ſtozed to them that were rightlie poſſeſſed in the ſame by the daies of the ſaid king.

4 That all thoſe caſtles, which contrarie to all reaſon and good order had bene made and buildd by any maner of perſon in the daies of king Stephan, ſhould be ouerthrowne and caſt downe, which were found to be eleuen hundred and ſixtene.

5 That the king ſhould reforme all ſuch diſorders as warre had brought in; to reſtoze farmers to their holdings, to repaire decayed buildings, to ſtoze paſtures and leaſures with cattell, hils with ſheep, &c.

6 That by his meanes the cleargie might enioy their due quietneſſe, and not be oppreſſed with any vnreaſonable exactions.

7 That he ſhould place ſhirifes where they had bene accuſtomed to beare rule, with inſtructions gi-uen them to deale by rightlie in cauſes, ſo as offenders might not eſcape through byſes, or any other reſpect of frendſhip; but that euerie man might receiue according to right and equitie.

8 That ſoldiours ſhould conuert their ſwords (as Eſaie ſaith) into culters & plough ſhares, their ſpeares into mattocks, and ſo returne from the campe to the plough: and that ſuch as were wont to keepe watch in the night ſeaſon, might now ſleepe and take their reſt without any danger.

9 That the huſbandman might be ſet free from all trouble and vexation, by meanes whereof he might follow his tilth, and plie his culture.

10 That merchant men and occupiers might enioy their trades and occupations to their aduancement.

11 That one kind and manner of ſiluer coine ſhould run through the land, &c.

12 There was alſo conſideration had of a ſonne which king Stephan had, named William, who though he were verie young, was yet appointed to ſwear fealtie vnto duke Henrie as lawfull heire to the crowne. The ſame William had the citie of Norwich, and diuerſe other lands aſſigned him for the maintenance of his eſtate, and that by the conſent and agrément of duke Henrie his adopted brother.

Theſe things being thus concluded at Wincheſter, and the warre that had continued for the ſpace of 17. yeares now ended and fullie pacified: the king toke the duke with him to London, doing to him all the honour he could deſire. The newes whereof being ſped abrode, euerie good man reioiced thereat.
Thus through the great mercie of God, peace was reſtozed vnto the decayed ſtate of this realme of England. Which things being thus accompliſhed with great ioy and tokens of loue, king Stephan and his new adopted ſonne duke Henrie toke leaue either of other, appointing ſhortlie after to meet againe at Drenford, there to perfect euerie article of their a-grément, which was thus accorded a little before Chriſtmas.

¶ But by the way, for the better vnderſtanding of the ſaid agreement, I haue thought good to ſet downe

The charter of king Stephan, of the pacification of the troubles betwixt him and Henrie duke of Normandie.

Stephan king of England, to all archbishops, bishops, abbats, earles, iusticers, sherifes, barons, and all his faithfull subiects of England sendeth greeting. Know ye that I king Stephan, haue ordeined Henrie duke of Normandie after me by right of inheritance to be my succellour, and heire of the kingdome of England, and so haue I giuen and granted to him and his heires the kingdome of England. For the which honour, gift, and confirmation to him by me made, he hath done homage to me, and with a corporall oth hath assured me, that he shall be faithfull and loiall to me, and shall to his power preserue my life and honour: and I on the other side shall maineteine and preserue him as my sonne and heire in all things to my power, and so far as by any waies or meanes I may.

The castles of ber and Wor-

The earldome of Mortaigne.

And William my sonne hath done his lawfull homage, and assured his fealtie vnto the said duke of Normandie, and the duke hath granted to him to hold of him all those tenements and holdings which I held before I attained to the possession of the realme of England, wheresoeuer the same be in England, Normandie, or elsewhere, and whatsoeuer he receiued with the daughter of earle Warren, either in England or Normandie, & likewise whatsoeuer apperteineth to those honours. And the duke shall put my sonne William and his men that are of that honour in full possession and seizine of all the lands, boroughs and rents, which the duke thereof now hath in his demaine, and namelie of those that belong to the honour of the earle Warren, and namelie of the castles of Wellencumber and Wortiner, so that Reginald de Warren shall haue the keeping of the same castles of Wellencumber, and of Wortiner, if he will; and thereupon shall giue pledges to the duke: and if he will not haue the keeping of those castles, then other liege men of the said earle Warren, whome it shall please the duke to appoint, shall by sure pledges and good suertie keepe the said castles.

Moreouer, the duke shall deliuer vnto him according to my will and pleasure the other castles, which belong vnto the earldome of Mortaigne by safe custodie and pledges, so soone as he conuenientlie may, so as all the pledges are to be restored vnto my sonne free, so soone as the duke shall haue the realme of England in possession. The augmentation also which I haue gi-uen vnto my sonne William, he hath likewise granted the same to him; to wit, the castell and towne of Norwich, with seauen hundred pounds in lands, so as the rents of Norwich be accounted as parcell of the same seauen hundred pounds in lands, and all the countie of Norfolk; the profits and rents which belong to churches, bishops, abbats & earles excepted; and the third pennie whereof Hugh Bigot is earle, also excepted: sauing also and reseruing the kings roiall iurisdiction for administration of iustice. Also the more to strengthen my fauour and loue to himwards, the duke hath giuen and granted vnto my said sonne whatsoeuer Richer de Aquila hath of the honour of Beuensey. And moreouer the castell and towne of Beuensey, and the seruice of Farnmouth, beside the castell and towne of Douer, and whatsoeuer apperteineth to the honour of Douer.

The duke hath also confirmed the church of Feuertham with the appurtenances; and all other things giuen or restored by me vnto other churches, he shall confirme by the counsell and aduice of holie church and of me. The earles and barons that belong to the duke, which were neuer my leges, for the honour which I haue done to their maister, they haue now done homage and swozne fealtie to me, the covenants betwixt me & the said duke alwaies saued. The other which had before done homage to me, haue swozne fealtie to me as to their souereigne lord. And if the duke should breake and go from the premises, then are they altogether to cease from doing him any seruice, till he reforme his misdoings. And my sonne also is to constreine him thereto, according to the aduice of holie church, if the duke shall chance to go from the covenants afore mentioned. My earles and barons also haue done their large and homage vnto the duke, sauing their faith to me so long as I liue, and shall hold the kingdome with like condition, that if I do breake and go from the premittid covenants, that then they may cease from doing me any seruice, till the time I haue reformed that which I haue done amisse.

The citizens also of cities, and those persons that dwell in castles, which I haue in my demaine, by my commandement haue done homage, and made assurance to the duke, sauing the fealtie which they owe to me during my life time, and so long as I shall hold the kingdome. They which keepe the castle of Wallingford haue done their homage to me, and haue giuen to me pledges for the obseruing of their fealtie. And I haue made vnto the duke such assurance of the castles and strengths which I hold by the counsell and aduice of holie church, that when I shall depart this life, the duke thereby may not run into any losse or impeachment, wherby to be debarred from the kingdome. are delivered unto the lord Richard de Lucie, safelie to be kept, which Richard hath taken an oth, and hath delivered his sonne in pledge to remaine in the hands and custodie of the archbishop of Canturburie, that after my decease he shall deliver the same castels unto the duke. Likewise by the counsell and aduise of holie church, Roger de Bulsey keepeth the castell of Oxford, and Jordaine de Bulsey the castell of Lincoln, which Roger & Jordaine haue sworne, and thereof haue delivered pledges into the hands of the archbishop, that if I shall chance to leaue this life, they shall render the same castels to the duke without impeachment. The bishop of Winchester hath also given his faith in the hands of the archbishop of Canturburie, that if I chance to depart this life, he shall render up unto the duke the castels of Winchester, and the fortreffe of Hampton.

And if any of them, unto whom the custodie of these fortresses shall be committed, fortune to die, or otherwise to depart from his charge, an other shall be appointed to the keeping of the same fortreffe, before he shall depart forth thereof, by the counsell and aduise of holie church. And if any of those persons that haue any castels or fortresses belonging to me in their custodie shall be found disobedient and rebell, I and the duke shall constrain him to satisfie our will & pleasure, not leauing him in rest till he be so constrained. The archbishops and bishops of the realme of England, and the abbats also, haue by my commandement sworne fealtie unto the duke, and the bishops and abbats that hereafter shall be made and aduanced here within the realme of England shall likewise sweare fealtie to him. The archbishops also and bishops on either part, haue undertaken, that if either of vs shall go from the foresaid couenants, they shall so long chastise the partie offending with the ecclesiasticall censures, till he reforme his fault, and returne to fulfill and obserue the said couenants. The mother also of the duke, and his wife, and his brethren, & subiects whom he may procure, shall likewise assure the premisses.

In matters belonging to the state of the realme, I shall worke by the dukes aduise. And through all the realme of England, as well in that part which belongeth to the duke, as in that which belongeth to me, I shall see that roiall iustice be executed. These being witnesses, Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, Hen. of Winchester, Robert of Exeter, Rob. of Bath, Goceline of Salisburie, Robert of Lincoln, Hilarie of Cicester, William of Norwich, Richard of London, Rigell of Ely, Gilbert of Hereford, John of Worcester, Walter of Chester, Walter of Rochester, Geoffrey of S. of Glocester, Renold of Cornewall, Baldwin de Coning, Roger de Hereford, Hugh Bigot, Patrike de Salisburie, William de Albemarle, Earle Alberike, Roger Clare, Richard erle of Pembroke, Richard de Lucie, William Martell, Richard de Humer, Reginald de Warren, Mahaser Biset, John de Doxt, Richard de Camewille, Henrie de Essex. Peuen at Westminster.

Thus far the Charter: and now to proceed with the historie. Immediatlie after Christmasse, euen in the Octaues of the Epiphanie, the king and duke Henrie met againe at Orenford, where all the earls and barons of the land being assembled, sware fealtie unto duke Henrie, their allegiance due unto king Stephan, as to their soueraigne lord and supreme gouernour so long as he liued, alwaies reserved. The forme of the peace was now also ingrossed and registred for a perpetuall witness of the thing, in this yeare 1154. after their account that began the yeare at Christmasse, as about the feast of S. Hilarie in Januarie commonlie called the twentieth daie. Thus was Henrie the sonne of the emperesse made the adopted sonne of king Stephan, and thereupon the said Henrie saluted him as king, and named him father. After conclusion of this peace, by the power of almightie God, all debate ceased, in such wise, that the state of the realme of England did maruelouslie for a time flourish, concord being maintained on ech hand. ¶ There be which affirme, that an other cause bound king Stephan to agree to this attonement chieflie, namelie for that the emperesse (as they saie) was rather king Stephens paramour than his enimie: and therefore (when she saw the matter growne to this point, that they were ready to trie battell with their armies readie ranged on a plaine in the westerne parts called Egglaw heath) she came secretlie unto king Stephan, & spake unto him on this wise: What a mischicuous and unnatural thing goe about? Is it met that the father should destroe the sonne? Is it lawfull for the sonne to kill the father? For the loue of God (man) refraine thy displeasure, and cast thy weapons out of thy hand, sith that (as thou thy selfe knowest full well) Henrie is thine owne sonne. With these and the like words she put him in mind, and couertlie told him, that he had to doe with hir a little before she was married unto earle Geoffrey.

The king by such tokens as the emperesse gaue him, took hir words to be true, and thereupon all his malice was straightwaies quenched: so that calling forth the archbishop of Canturburie, he vitered to him the whole matter, and took therewith such direction, in sending to his aduersaries for auoiding battell at that present, that immediatlie the armies on both sides wrapped up their enignes, and euery man was commanded to keepe the peace, that a communication might be had about the conclusion of some pacification, which afterwards ensued in maner as before mentioned.

¶ But whether this or some other cause moued the king to this peace, it is to be thought that God was the worker of it. And surely a man may thinke it good reason, that the report of such secret companies keeping betwixt the king and the emperesse, was but a tale made among the common people upon no ground of truth, but upon some slanderous deuise of a malicious head. And admit that king Stephan had to doe with hir, yet is it like that both of them would doe for best to keepe it secret, that no such reproch might be imputed either to Henrie, who was taken to be legitimate, or to his mother, whose honour thereby by should not a little be stained.

But now to the purpose. Shortly after that the king and duke Henrie had bene together at Oxford, where they ended all things touching the peace & concord betwixt them concluded, they met againe at Dunstable, where some cloud of displeasure seemed to darken the bright sunshine of the late begun loue and amitie betwixt those two mightie princes the king and the duke. For where it was accorded (among other articles) that all the castels which had bene built since the daies of the late king Henrie for euil intents and purposes, should be razed and thowne downe: contrarie thereto (notwithstanding manie of them were ouerthowne and destroyed to the accomplishment of that article) diuers through the kings permission were suffered to stand. And when the duke complained to the king thereof, he could not get at that time any redresse, which some that troubled him: but yet because he would not giue occasion of any new trouble, nor offend the king, to whom (as to his reputed father) he would seeme to yeld all honour and due reuerence, he passed it ouer.

Within a while after, the king and he came to Canturburie, where they were solemnly receiued of the couent of Wykes church with procession. After this, in the Lent season they went to Douer, where they talked with Theobald the earle of Flanders, and with the countesse his wife who was aunt to duke Henrie. At their comming towards Canturburie (as it was huted) the duke should haue bene murdered, through treason of the Flemings that enuied both the dukes person, and also that peace which he had concluded with the king. But see the hap. As this feat should haue bene wrought on Berhamdoutone, William earle of Northfolke king Stephan his sonne, who was one of the chiefe conspirators, fell beside his horse, and brake his leg, so that euery man by that sudden chance was in a maze, & came wondering about him. ¶ This no doubt came to passe by the prouidence of God, though such accidents are commonlie imputed to casualtie or chance medlie. For it is the worke of God either to preuent, or to intercept, or to recompense the unnaturall conspiracies of traitors and rebels with some notable plague: according to that of the poet;

Οἱ αὐτῶ καὶ τὸ τεύχεον ἐν ἑλῷ καὶ τὸ τεύχεον, ἢ ὅ καὶ βδελύτῃ τῶ βδελύσσοντι καὶ ὀνείδι, Necius ipse sibi est alij qui querit obesse, Consiliūq; malum danti fert maxima damna.

Duke Henrie herewith getting knowledge of the treason intended against him, or at the least suspecting somewhat, got him backe againe to Canturburie, and so auoided the danger. After this, taking his way to Rochester, and so to London, he got him a shipboard, and sailed by long seas into Normandie, where he arriued in safetie.

After his departure, king Stephan spent the summer season of this yeare, in going about the most part of the realme, shewing all the courtesie he could deuise to the people in all places where he came; except where he found any rebellious persons, as in Dorsetshire, where Philip de Coleuille (in trust of his castell which he had strongly fortified at a certaine place called Dix) shewed himselfe disobedient to the king, who assembling a power in the countrie, besieged that castell, and shortly wanne it, without any great adoe.

When duke Henrie was departed (as ye haue heard) and gone ouer into Normandie, now that he had concluded a peace with king Stephan, his puillance was thought to be such, that he was able to mainteine warres with the mightiest prince that then reigned. For in right of his wife, he had gotten possession of the duchie of Aquitaine, and the earldome of Poitou; and further by his mother, he enioied the duchie of Normandie, and looked to succeed in the kingdome of England: and in right of his father he was earle of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine. He also reuoked into his hands certaine parcels of his demaine lands, which his father had giuen away, and passing from thence into Aquitaine, mightilie subdued certaine lords and barons there, that had rebelled against him.

About the same time a peace was concluded betwixt the French king, and this duke Henrie: the king restoring unto the duke the townes of Perwez and Cleron, which he had before taken from him, and the duke giuing to the king 20000. markes of silver, for the harmes done by him, within the realme of France.

But now to returne vnto king Stephan. We shall vnderstand, that within a while after he had made his foresaid progresse almost about the whole realme, he returned vnto London, where he called a parlement as well to consult of matters touching the state of the commonwealth, as to furnish the see of Yorke with a sufficient archbishop. Whereupon one Roger that was before archdeacon of Canturburie, was chosen to that dignitie, and consecrated the tenth day of October, by archbishop Theobald, as legat to the pope, and not as archbishop of Canturburie. Then also was Thomas Becket made archdeacon of Canturburie by the said Theobald. The new archbishop Roger first went to his see at Yorke, where after he had receiued his inthronization, and set his businesse there in order, he took his iourne towards Rome to fetch his pall in his owne person.

King Stephan also after the end of the parlement went to Douer, there to meet the earle of Flanders, who came thither to talke with him of certaine businesse. The earle was no sooner returned backe, but the king fell sicke, and was so grieuouly tormented with a paine in his bellic, and with an old distease also, wherewith (as should appeare) he had bene often troubled, namelie, the emrods, that finally he died in the abbey on the five and twentieth day of October, in the nine and fortieth yeare of his age, and after he had reigned eightene yeares, ten moneths, and od daies, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauour 1154. His bodie was interred in the abbey of Feuertham in Kent, which he had builded, where his wife also, and his sonne Eustace were buried before. ¶ Thus farre of the acts and daeds of Stephan; now a little of other breefe remembrances, and first touching the prosopographie or description of his person.

He was comelie of stature, of a verie good complexion and disposition, of great strength, in qualities of mind verie excellent, expert in warre, gentle, courteous, and verie liberrall. For though he continued all his time in a manner in the maintenance of wars, yet he leuied but few tributs, or almost none at all. Indeed he put diuers bishops to greuous fines, and that not without the iust iudgement of Almighty God, that they might so be punished due to their perurie committed in helping him to the crowne. Vices wherewith he should be noted I find none, but that vpon an ambitious desire to reigne, he brake his oath which he made vnto the emperesse Maad.

In his daies, the abbeies of Tiltey, Fontreys, Rieuale, Coggeshall in Essex, Newbrough and Wobland, Periuale in Warwichehire, Caredon in Leicestershire, Kirkstead in Dorsetshire, with diuerse other in other parts of the realme, were founded, in so much that more abbeies were erected in his daies, than had bene within the space of an hundred yeares before, Henrie the second of that name, a French man borne, the second sonne of Geffrey Plantagenet earle of An-10 ion, begotten of Maude the emperesse, daughter to Henrie the first, began his reigne ouer England the five and twentieth of October, in the yeare after the creation of the world 5121. and in the yeare after the incarnation of our sauour 1154. about the beginning of the third yeare of the emperour Frederike the first, the second of pope Anastasius the fourth, the seuentieth yeare of Lewis the senenth king of France, and second of Balcolme then king of Scotland. Immediatlie after he was aduertised of the death of king Stephan, he came ouer into England, landing at Otreham about the seuenth day of December. After he had got his companies together, which by tempest were scattered in his passage, he came first to Winchester, where he receiued homage and fealtie of the pables of the realme resorting vnto him. This done he set forth to wards London, where he was crowned king by Theobald archbishop of Canturburie the twentieth daie of December.

The archbishop of Rouen, with thre of his suffragans, the archbishop of Exeter, and manie other bishops of England: Theodorius the earle of Flanders, with a great number of other earles, lords and barons were present there at his coronation. He was at that time about the age of thre and twentie yeares, and to win the peoples loue, he spake manie comfortable words vnto them, to put them in hope (as the manner is) that they should find him a louing prince. He used the lords also verie courteously. And first of all, after his attaining to the crowne, he chose to him counsellors of the grauest perfonages, and best learned in the lawes of the realme, with whose prudent advice he perused those lawes, and amended them where he thought necessarie, commending chiefly, that the lawes established by his grandfather Henrie the first should be obserued: and in manie things he relied vpon the advice of Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, at whose suite he admitted Thomas Becket to be his chancellor, which Becket the said archbishop had made archdeacon of Canturburie the yeare before.

Moreouer, by the sentence and doome of his coun-cellers, to the intent that peace and quiet order might take place, and be the better maintained, he commanded by wate of publishing a proclamation, that all strangers (which to get somewhat by the wars had flocked into the realme, during the time of the ciuill discord betwene him and king Stephan) should depart home without further delate: wherefore he appointed them a daie, before the which they should auoid vpon perill that might insue. It was a worlds wonder to see and marke how suddenlie these al-10 lens were quite banished, as though they had bene phantasmes. Their abiding here was nothing profitable to the subiects of the realme, as they that were accustomed to attempt one thyng turne vpon an others necke, and thought it lawfull for them so to do. Amongst them was a great number of Flemings, whom the king hated more than the residue.

By vertue also of this edict, William of Wyres, whom king Stephan (as ye haue heard) had made earle of Kent, was constrained with others to depart the realme, king Henrie seizing all his possessions into his owne hands. Diuerse castles were throwne downe and made plaine with the ground at the kings commandement, which priuate men by king Stephens permission had builded, or else for that they stood not in such places as was thought meet and expedient; yet some he caused to be fortified: and furthermore, toke into his hands againe such 20 lands and possessions as appertained to the crowne, and were alienated vnto any manner of person, of what degree so euer he was. This wounded the minds of many with an inward grudge, as well enough perceiuing that the king would loke so nere to his owne commoditie, that nothing should be left for them that might any way be recouered and gotten to his vse.

In this vere quiete Cilanoz being then in the citie of London, on the last of Februarie was deliuered of his second sonne named Henrie. About the same time also, William Beuerell of Nottingham a noble man and of great possessions was disherited by the king for forterie and witchcraft, which he had practised to kill Ranulfe earle of Chester, as it was revealed openly, and brought to light. In accomplishing of which hainous crime and detestable act, many others were of counsell, and found gilty with him, which escaped not unpunished.

On the tenth of Aprill, king Henrie assembled the peeres & great lords of his realme together at Wallingford, and caused them to sweare allegiance unto his eldest sonne William: providing, that if he chanced to die, then they should do the like unto his brother Henrie. Also whereas Hugh de Spottimer had fenced his castles against king Henrie, he besieged the same, and taking the castell of Cleberie, he destroyed it. Whereupon, the foresaid Hugh shortly after was at peace with the king, and surrendered to him the two castles of Elmigmore and Bridgenoth, 10 which hitherto he had holden. Moreover, whereas there was variance kindled betwixt the king, and Roger Fitz Miles of Gloucester (who was earle of Hereford) for the lands of Gloucester, that variance was also quenched: for after the same Roger was dead, his brother Walter succeeding him in the earl-dome of Hereford, was constrained to depart with the citie of Gloucester, which the king held and reteined in his owne hands.

In the second yeare of his reigne, king Henrie 20 went to Poike, and in that countrie toke into his hands divers castles which had bene long in possession of private men; namely, the castell of Scarborrough, which William earle of Albemarle held, and now was constrained to resigne it up, full fore against his will. This yeare William the kings eldest sonne departed this life, and was buried at Reading. The realme of England was brought on all sides into verie god quiet; but per long word came 30 to k. Henrie, that his brother Geffrey had begun a rebellion on the other side of the sea. For their father Geffrey (when he died) left three sonnes behind him, Henrie, Geffrey, and William, ordaining by his testament, when Henrie should have gotten possession of England and Normandie, that then the countrie of Anion should remaine unto Geffrey, and in the meane time, he to haue these three townes, Chinon, Lodun, and Mirabell, to mainteine his estate; and when the time came that the whole heritage should fall unto him, he might by possession of these three 40 haue a readier meane to come by all the rest. Furthermore, fearing least his eldest sonne Henrie (who as then was absent) would not consent to the performance of this his will, he caused certaine bishops and other of the Nobles to sweare, that they should not suffer his bodie to be committed to buriall, till his sonnes had sworn to fulfill his last will and testament in all other things, but especiallie in this behalfe, wherein he iudged not amiss. For though Henrie was loth to take his oth, yet because his fathers bodie should not remaine vnburied, he was contented to sweare.

But after he had obtained the kingdome of England, his cometous desire, increasing still with abundant already obtained, found meanes to procure of pope Adrian the fourth (who was an Englishman borne) a dispensation for that oth: whereupon (hauing got licence to depart from the office both of right, law and equitie) neglecting his fathers ordinance, he passed ouer into Normandie, and making war against his brother the said Geffrey, easilie expelled him out of those places, which were assigned him by bequest in his fathers testament, and so toke the earldome of Anion into his owne possession. Wherebeit, he gaue unto his said brother a pension of a thousand pounds English, & two thousand pounds of the monie of Anion, with the towne of Lodun, and certaine other layes to liue vpon; who neuerthelesse thinking himselfe euill used at the kings hands, rebelled and died.

¶ Here we haue to note the lacke of conscience and religion, not onlie in the pretended successor of Peter in giuing a dispensation for an oth, but also in his god ghostlie sonne, who was no lesse forward in reuolting from his oth, than the other was willing to acquite him from the force thereof. But if these men had bene profiting scholars in the vniuersitie of the pagans, as they were arrant truants and ranke dullards in the schoole of christians, they might haue learned by profane examples, that as oths are not to be rashlie taken, so they are not to be vnadvisedlie broken. Whereunto alludeth Aristotle in his Metaphysikes, shewing the cause why poetrie hath feigned that the gods in old time used to sweare by water, as Jupiter is reported to haue done in this manner;

per flumina iuro

Infera sub terra stygio labentia laco.

To signifie vnto vs, that as water is a verie ancient and excellent element, and so necessarie that without it the life of man cannot consist; euen so we ought to esteeme of an oth, than the which we should thinke nothing more religious, nothing more holie, nothing more christian. Whereunto also tendeth the fable of the transmutation of mariners into dolphins for perurie: importing thus much for our instruction, that the breaking of an oth, in a case that may pre-iudice, procureth greuous punishments from God against them that so lewdlie do offend. But such is the impudencie of the pope, that he will not grant di-spensations onlie for oths, but for incest, for treason, and for any other sinne: which he may do (as he boasteth) by vertue of his absolute and vniuersall iurisdiction: as we haue lately in most lamentable sort sene exemplified. But to the course of our storie.

Shortly after, when king Henrie had dispatched his businesse in Normandie, and made an end of troubles there betwixt him and his brother Geffrey, he returned into England, because he receiued ad-uertisement, that Malcolme king of Scotland began to make war against his subiects that bordered next vnto him, whereupon he hastned northwards: and coming first into Cumberland, he toke the ci-tie of Carlisle, seizing all that countrie into his hands; and going after into Northumberland, he toke the towne of Newcastle, with the castell of Wamburg, and toke into his possession all that coun-trie which his mother the emperesse had sometimes granted vnto king David, as before ye haue heard: howbeit, because he would not seeme to offer too much troubling, and be esteemed vniuersall of former bene-fices receiued, he suffered king Malcolme to enioy the earldome of Huntingdon, which king Stephan had giuen vnto his father earle Henrie, sonne to 50 king David, as before is partly touched.

William also the earle of Poitouaigne, and Marren sonne of king Stephan, were compelled to surrender to king Henrie, the castell of Poemsey, the ci-tie of Norwich, and other townes and castles which he held, appertaining to the demeane of the crowne: to whom the king in recompense restored those lands which his father king Stephan held in the daies of king Henrie the first.

About this time Theodozike earle of Flanders 60 (going with his wiife vnto Jerusalem) committed his sonne Philip with all his lands, to the custodie of the king of England. Hugh Bigot also resigned his castles into the kings hands.

But whilst king Henrie was about (as before ye haue heard) to recover and get backe the portions of his kingdome made away and dismembred by his predecessors, he was informed, that the Welshmen raised a rebellion against him; so to repress those attempts, he hastned south with all diligence. Now at his first approach to their countrie, his souldiers being set vpon in the straits, were verie fiercelie put back by the enemies, in so much that a rumor ran that king Henrie was slaine, which putted by the Welshmen men with no small hope, and daunted the Englishmen with great feare. At deed, diuerse of the English nobilitie were slain, and (amongst others) Custace Fitz John, and Robert de Curcy, men of great honor and reputation.

Those which escaped in returning backe, not knowing that the king passed through the straits without danger, declared to their fellows that followed and were approaching to the said straits, that (so farre as they knew) the king and all the residue were lost. These newes so discomfited the companies, that Henrie de Cler, which bare the kings standard by right of inheritance, threwe downe the same, and fled: which dishonorable deed was afterward laid to his charge by one Robert de Mounifort, with whom (by order taken of the king) he fought a combat in triall of the quarrell, and was overcome: but yet the king qualifying the rigor of the iudgement by mercie pardoned his life, and appointed him to be a thorne monke, and put into the abbey of Reading, taking his lands and possessions into his hands as forfeited: notwithstanding this combat was not tried till about the 9. yeare of this kings reigne.

Now the king, hearing that his armie was discomfited, came to his men, and shewing himselfe to them with open visage, greatly reuiued the whole multitude, and then proceeding against the enemies; his people were afterwards more warie in looking to themselves, inso much that at length (when he prepared to invade the Welshmen both by water & land) they fought to him for peace, and whole submitted themselves vnto his grace and mercie.

About the same time, king Henrie builded the castell of Rutland, the castell of Basingwerke, and one house also of Templers. In the moneth of September also this yeare, the kings third sonne was bozne at Drenford, & named Richard. This yeare was Thomas Becket preferred to be the kings Chancelor. The king holding his Christmas at Worcester in great royaltie, sat in the church at seruice, with his crowne on his head, as the kings vsed in those daies to do on solemne feasts: but as sone as masse was ended, he took his crowne from his head, and set it downe vpon the altar in signe of humblenes, so that he neuer after passed for the wearing of a crowne. The same yeare also the king altered his coine, abrogating certeine peeces called basels.

In the moneth of August he went ouer into Normandie, and came to an enteruiew with the French king nere to the riuer of Cata, where they intreated of a league, and of a marriage, which was after agreed vpon, betwixt Henrie the sonne of king Henrie; and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the French king: at which time Thomas Becket (then being the kings chancelor) was sent to Paris in great arais to fetch hir: who among other furnitures had nine long charrets (as Matthew Paris writeth.) Now when this ladie was deliuered to Thomas Becket the lord chancelor, and brought from Paris, she was appointed from thenceforth to remaine in the house of Robert de Beurburge, a noble man of great honor, untill such time as the marriage should be solemnized.

After the two kings were departed in sunder, Richard Henrie prepared an armie against Conan duke of Britaine, who had seized the citie of Psaunts into his hands, after the decaise of Gesteire the kings brother, who was earle of Psaunts. At length, the same Conan perceiving himselfe not able to resist the king of England, vpon the daie of the feast of saint Michael the archangel came to king Henrie, and surrendered the citie of Psaunts into his hands, with all the whole countrie therevnto belonging. Some after which resignation, and vpon the 24. of August, Gesteire the kings fourth sonne was bozne.

In December following, Throbalde earle of Blois was accorded with king Henrie, to deliuer to him two of his castels. Likewise Petroke earle of Berch surrendered two castels vnto king Henrie, which he had usurped of the demerues of Normandie in the daies of king Stephan: one of which castels the king gaue him againe, receiuing homage of him for the same.

After ouer king Henrie and Raimond earle of Barzelone met together at Blaine, where they concluded a league by waie of allegiance, so that Richard the sonne of king Henrie should take to wife the daughter of the said Raimond in time convenient; and that the king of England should giue vnto the said Richard the duchie of Aquitaine, & the countie of Poitou. This earle Raimond had married the daughter and heire of the king of Aragon.

In the meane time, a secret grudge that had long depended betwene king Henrie and king Lewes of France did still continue, and though there was a friendship agreed betwene them (as ye haue heard) to haue extinguished the same; yet was it but a fained friendship: for vpon euerie new occasion they were readie to breake againe, as it came to passe shortly after.

William duke of Aquitaine, grandfather to quene Eliano, married the daughter and heire of the earle of Tholouze, and going vnto the warres of the holie land, he engaged that earldome vnto Raimond the earle of saint Giles, and died before he could returne. His sonne William, father to quene Eliano, suffered his earldome to remaine still unredeemed, either for want of sufficiencie, or through negligence and carelesnesse: so that the earle of saint Giles keeping possession thereof vnto his dieng daie, left it to his sonne Raimond, who inioyed it likewise. Now when king Lewes (having married the foresaid Eliano) demanded restitution as in the right of his wife, earle Raimond flatlie at the first denied to restore it, but after considering his lacke of power to resist the kings puissance, he plied the king with humble petitions, and so preuailed by faire words, that in the end king Lewes granted him his sister Constance in marriage (which Constance, as ye haue heard, was married before vnto Custace the sonne of king Stephan) & with hir granted him libertie to retein the earldome of Tholouze as it were by waie of endowment: whereto the other accorded. Notwithstanding Henrie hauing married the foresaid quene Eliano, after the diuorfe had betwixt hir and king Lewes, made claime to the said countie of Tholouze in the right of his wife. Herevpon earle Raimond, trusting now to the aid of his brother in law king Lewes, denied to restore it; so that king Henrie determined to recover it by force, and entring by and by into Gascoine with an armie, he drew towards the countrie of Tholouze, & began to invade the same with great force and courage.

Diuerse great lords of those parties toynd with king Henrie in his war which he attempted against the earle of saint Giles, as the earle of Barzelone, and the lord William Trenchenille, a man of great power in those quarters, hauing vnder his rule manie cities, castels and towne, notwithstanding that he had of late lost many of them by violence of the foresaid earle of Tholouze, but now by the aide of king Henrie he recovered them all. Galcolme also king of Scotland came vnto king Henrie, whilst he was forth in this iourne, to associate him in this businesse.

The earle hearing of king Henries coming with an armie, was put in great feare, and therevpon on wrote letters to his brother in law king Lewes, requiring him with all speed possible to come unto his aid. King Lewes upon receipt of the letters, & considering the present danger of the earle, made such hast in continuing his iourne both daie and night, that he came to Thelouze, before king Henrie could arrive there. Which when king Henrie understood, and perceived how he was prevented, he changed his purpose of besieging the cite, and fell to spoiling of the countie thereabouts: at which time he reconquered certaine places that latelie before had revolted from his government, & amongst the rest the cite of Cahors, which he furnished with men, munition and vittels, appointing his chancellor Thomas Becket to the custodie and keeping thereof: he fortified other places also which he had gotten, placing capteines and men of warre to looke unto the defence of the same. Whilest the king was thus abroad on his iourne in the parties of Aquitaine, William earle of Bullongne and Normaine the sonne of king Stephen, and Hamon earle of Gloucester departed this life, which two earles went thither with him.

Finallie, when he had set things at a stea in those parties, he returned towards Normandie, and coming to the cite of Toures, he gave the order of knighthood unto Malcolm king of Scotland, and so in the moneth of October he came backe into Normandie, and there augmenting his armie with new supplies, entered into the countie of Beaunois, burned manie villages in the same, and destroyed the strong castell of Cerberie, except one turret, which his souldiers could not take, by reason of the fire and smoke which staied and kept them from it. Moreover, Simon earle of Auranches deliuered unto king Henrie such fortresses as he held in France, as Rochfort, Montfort, and such like, which was no small discomfort and inconvenience to the French king, because the garisons placed in those fortresses impeached the passage betwixt Paris and Orleans. But shortly after, a truce was taken to last from the moneth of December, unto the feast of the holic Trinitie in the yeare next following.

In the moneth of Maie also ensuing, a peace was concluded upon the former articles and conditions: for further confirmation whereof, the marriage was solemnized betwixt Henrie the kings sonne being seven yeares of age, and the ladie Margaret daughter to the French king, being not past three yeares old: as writers doe report. The marriage was celebrated at Peterborough on the second daie of November, by the authoritie of two legats of the apostolicke see, Henrie bishop of Pisa, and William bishop of Parma, both prelates and cardinals.

About the same time came certaine Dutchmen of the foxe called Alidoies ouer into this realme, to the number of thirtie or more, who held opinions in religion contrarie to the faith of the Romane church, for (as one author affirmeth) they which first spied the opinions which these men held, came from Gascoigne, and preuailed so greatly in setting forth their doctrine, that they mightilie increased through the large regions of Spaine, France, Italie, and Germanie: simple men (God wote) they were for the most part, as is written of them, and of no quickie capacitie. Howbeit, those which at this time came ouer into England, were indifferentlie well learned, and their principall or ringleader was named Gerard. Now also was a counsell assembled at Orford, whereto these dogmatists were examined upon certaine points of their profession. The said Gerard undertaking to answer for them all, protested that they were good christians, and had the doctrine of the apostles in all reverence. Moreover, being examined what they thought of the substance of the godhead and the merits of Christ, they answered rightlie, and to the point; but being further examined upon other articles of the religion then received, they swayed from the church and wayes, in the use of the diuine sacraments, derogating such grace from the same, as the church by her authoritie had then ascribed thereto. To conclude, they would in no wise renounce their opinions, in so much that they were condemned, burned in the forehead with an hot iron, and in the cold season of winter striped naked from the girdle heere upward, and so whipped out of the towne, with proclamation made, that no man should be so hardie as to receive them into any house, yet helpe them with meat, drinke, or any other kind of meanes: whereupon it fell out in fine that they were starued to death through cold and hunger: howbeit in this their affliction they seemed to reioice, in that they suffered for Gods cause, as they made account.

The same yeare, Mathew sonne to the earle of Flanders married the ladie Marie the abbess of Hamie, daughter to king Stephen, and with hir had the countie of Bullongne. About this marriage grew the first falling out betwixt the king and his chancellor Thomas Becket (as some haue written) but none more than the said Mathew was offended with the said chancellor, because he was so fore against the said contract.

King Henrie, shortly after the marriage, was consummated betwixt his sonne & the French kings daughter, got into his hands, the castell of Gisors, with two other castels, situate upon the riuers of Cata in the confines of Normandie and France. For it was accorded betwixt the two kings, that when the marriage should be finished, king Henrie should haue those three castels, because they appertained to Normandie; in the meane time, the same castels were deliuered into the hands of Robert de Poiron, Cosse de Saint Omer, and Robert Hastings, three knights templers, who upon the consummation of the marriages before said, and according to the trust committed to them, surrendered the possession of the said castels into the hands of king Henrie.

But the French king was not a little moued, for that king Henrie had seized upon them without his licence, in so much that he raised a powder of armed men, and sent them into Normandie, where they had one cruell conflict about the rest with the Normans, till the night parted them in sunder, by meane whereof the Frenchmen withdrew to Chaumont, and the Normans to Gisors. The next daie, as the Frenchmen came forth againe, purposing to haue won Gisors, they were beaten backe by the Normans, who issued out of the towne to skirmish with them. Thus was the warre renewed betwixt these two princes, and by setting on of Theobald earle of Blois, the matter grew to that point, that the English and French powers coming forthwith into the field, and marching one against an other, they approached so nere together, that battell was presently looked for, first in Aungelme, and after in the territorie of Dunc; but yet in the end such order was taken betwixt them, that their armies brake vp.

The three Templers also ran in displeasure of the French king, for the deliuerie of the castels before they knew his mind, so that he banished them the realme of France for euermore: but king Henrie received them, and gaue them honorable entertainment. Some write that there were but two castels, Gisors and Beall, which were thus put into their hands, and by them deliuered as before is mentioned.

About this time Theobald archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, after he had gouerned that king, and might do so much in England, that he seem-king sent him ouer into England (Richard Lucie be-was brought to passe according to the kings desire at Westminster. Afterward he was ordeined at Toward the end of the same yeare, Henrie the kings sonne receiued homage of the barons, first in Normandie, and after in England. In the yeare ensuing, the king his father committed him to archbishop Becket, that he might see him brought vp and trained in maners and courtlie behauiour, as apper-teined to his estate: whereupon the archbishop in iest called him his sonne.

This yeare Quene Elianor was brought to bed at Roohan of a daughter named Elianor.

In like maner the kings of England and France receiued pope Alexander the third at Cocie vpon Loire with all honor and reuerence, inasmuch that they attended vpon his stirrup on foot like pages or lackies, the one vpon his right side, and the other on his left.

Note here the intollerable pride of this antichristian pope in assuming, and the basemindednesse of these two kings in ascribing vnto that man of sume such dignitie as is vtterlie vnfit for his indignitie.

In Januarie ensuing, the king returned into England, and the same yeare the king of Scots did homage vnto Henrie the ponger, and deliuered his ponger brother David to the king his father, with di-uerse other the sonnes of his lords and barons in pledge, for assurance of a perpetuall peace to be kept betwene them, with some such castles as he required.

The counsell at Tours.

In the meane time archbishop Thomas went to the counsell holden by pope Alexander at Tours in the Octaues of Pentecost, where he resigned his bi-shoplike into the popes hands (as the same went) being troubled in conscience for that he had receiued it by the kings preferment. The pope allowing his purpose, committed the same pastorlike dignitie to him againe by his ecclesiasticall power, whereby the archbishop was eased verie well of his graue, and shortlie after his returne from his counsell, seemed desirous to reduce a cause to be restored such rights as he pretended to belong vnto the church of Canturburie, whereby he ran into the displeasure of manie, and namelie of the mightiest.

Howeuer he required of the king the keeping of Rochester castell, & the custodie of the tower of London. He alledged also that Saltwood & With belong peculiarlie to the seigniozie of his see. He called Roger earle of Clare vnto Westminster, to do his homage vnto him for the castell of Tunbridge; but the earle denied it through the setting on of the king, allegging all the see thereof to appertene rather to the king than to the archbishop. Thus was the archbishop troubled, and he grew daillie more and more out of the kings fauour. For ye must vnderstand, that this was not the first nor the second, but the eight-time that the king had shewed tokens of his displeasure against him.

Anno Reg. 10
Homage of the Welshmen.

N. Truick.

After this, vpon the first day of Iulie, Rice prince of Southwales, with diuerse other lords and nobles of Wales, did homage both to the king and to his sonne Henrie at Woodstocke. Hamline the kings barkar brother married the countesse of Warren, the widow of William earle of Poitaigne barkar sonne to king Stephan. This countesse was the sole daughter and heire of William the third earle of Warren, which went with Letoes king of France into the holie land, and there died. Some after, the Welshmen rebelling with their prince Rice and his uncle Owen, did many mischeues on the marches: and by the death of Walter Gifford earle of Buckingham (who deceased this yeare without heire) that earledome came to the kings hands.

On the 20. daie of September were three circles seene to compasse the sun, and so continued the space of thre houres together: which when they vanished awaie, two sunnes appeared and shined forth after a maruellous maner. Which strange sight the common people imagined to be a signe or token of the controuersie then kindling betwixt the king and the archbishop.

Matth. Paris.

About this time the king called a parlement at Westminster, to treat of matters concerning the commonwealth, wherein great discord arose betwixt the king & archbishop Becket, about certeine points touching the liberties of the church. For the king hauing an earnest zeale vnto iustice, and commanding the iudges to punish offenders without respect, understood by their information, that manie things by them of the spiritualtie (against whome their authori-tie might not be extended) were committed contrarie to common order: as theft, rapine, murder, and manslaughter; in so much that in his presence it was made notorious, that sith the beginning of his reigne, aboue an hundred slaughters had bene committed within his realme of England by preests and men of religious orders. Hereupon being moued in mind, he set forth lawes against the spiritualtie, wherein he shewed his zeale of iustice. For as the cause proceeded from the bishops of that age, so did the fault also, sith contrarie to their owne canons they permitted preests to liue ouer licentiouslie without due correction, studieng onelie to mainteine the liberties and immunities of the church, and not to reforme the irregularitie of the regulars. Of this crew was one Philip de Bosc, a canon of Bedford, who being arreigned before the kings iusticer for a mur-ther, vttered disdainfull words against the same iusticer: which when he could not denie before the archbishop, he was deprived of his prebend, and banished the land for two yeares space.

ning already for downe such orders as should bable the spiritalitie from their wished downes, thought that if he might get them confirmed in parliament by consent of the bishops and clergie, then the same should take place and be received for lawes. Wherefore he earnestly required at this parliament, that it might be enacted against all such of the spiritaltie, as should be taken and confirmed for any heinous offence, they should lose the privilege of the church, and be delivered unto the civil magistrate, like other for their utter execution for their offences, in like manner as he might any of the kings subjects being lay men. For otherwise the king alleged, that they would boldly presume to do much more wickedly, if after ecclesiasticall discipline, no secular correction should followe. And likewise it was that they would passe but little for their disgracing and loss of their order, who in contempt of their calling would not abstaine from committing most mischievous abominations and heinous enormities.

Unto these reasons thus proposed by the king, to have his purpose take effect, the archbishop and his last against the will of the bishops, answered verie proudly, labouring to prove that it was more against the liberties of the church, than that they might with reason well allowe. Whereupon the king being moved exceedingly against them, demanded whether they would observe his royal lawes and cu-stomes, which the archbishops and bishops in the time of his grandfather did hold and observe or not. Whereunto they made answer, that they would observe them, salvo ordine suo, Their order in all things saved.
But the king being highly offended with such exceptions, urged the matter so, that he would have them to take their oath absolutely, & without all exceptions, but they would none of that. At length he departed from London in verie great displeasure with the bishops, having first taken from the archbishop Thomas all the offices and dignities which he enjoyed since his first being created chancellor.

Howbeit, after this, many of the bishops seeing therunto this broile would grow, began to shrinke from the archbishop, and inclined to the king. But the archbishop stood firme in his opinion, and would not bend at all, till at length not onlie his suffragans the bishops, but also the bishop of Lisieux who came over to do some good in the matter, and the ab-bat of Clemencia who was sent from the pope, persuaded him to agree to the kings will, in so much that being overcome at last with the earnest suit of his friends, he came first to Woodstocke, and there promised the king to observe his lawes, bona fide, Faithfully, and without all collusion or deceit.

Shortlie after, in the feast of S. Hilarie, a counsell was holden at Clarendon, whereto the archbishop, and in manner all the lords spiritual and temporall of the land made their repaire. Here the archbishop would have willinglie started from his promise, if first the bishops, and after the earles of Leicester and Cornwall, Robert and Reignald, which Reignald was uncle to the king, and lastlie two knights templers, had not moved him to yield to the kings will.
But among the rest, these two knights, namely Richard de Hastings, and Wolscus de Boloigne were verie earnest with him, & at length prevailed, though not for conscience of dutie, whereunto he should have bene touched; yet with feare of danger, which by refusing to satisfie the kings will, he should have brought not onlie upon himselfe, but also upon the the other bishops there present.

These knights seemed to lament his case, as if already they had seen naked swords shaken about his eares. And indeed, certaine of the kings servants that attended upon his person after the manner of a guard, went to and fro, reaching by and about the chambers, shaking their bright battell axes ready appointed, and looking as if they would forthwith run upon the bishops. Whereupon the archbishop being touched with remorse, and seeming to strive against his determinet purpose, consented to obey the kings ; lease, and so promised in the word of a prelat, swearing furthermore, that he would observe the kings lawes and customes, without exception of these words.

Thus ordine suo, salvo ordine suo, which he had used before. The like oath did all the bishops take. But the archbishop refused at that time to seale to the testifying that contained the articles of the oath which he should have observed, requiring as it were a time to consider of them, sith in so weightie a matter nothing ought to be done without gods and deliberate advice, wherefore he took with him a copie thereof, and so did the archbishop of Doyke an other, and the card remained with the king.

Shortlie after, the archbishop considering further of this oath which he had taken, repented himselfe greatly thereof, in so much that he abstained from saicing of masse, till he had by confession and fruits of penance (as saith Marth. Paris) obtained absolu-tion of the pope. For addressing and sending out messengers with all speed unto the pope, with a certifi-cat of the whole matter as it laye, he requested to be absolved of the bond which he had unadvisedly entered into. This suit was soon granted, in so much that the pope directed his especiall letters unto him, conferring the same absolution in verie ample and large manner, as Marth. Paris doth report it. And thus began a new broile.

The archbishop in the meane time, perceiving that the liberties of the church were now not onlie embeshelled, but in manner strangled, and being loth to make any further attempt against his former dealings, would now (without the kings knowledge) have departed the realme, whereupon coming to Rouen, he took shipping, to have passed over into France, and so to have gone to the popes court. But by a contrarie wind he was brought backe into England, and thereby fell further into the kings displeasure than before, in so much that, whereas an action was commenced against him of late for a manor, which the archbishops of Cantuarburie had of long time held: now the matter was so bled, that the archbishop lost the manor, and was moreover condemned to paie the arrearages, and thus his troubles increased even though his owne malapertnesse and brainesicknesse; whereas all these tumults might have bene composed and laid asleepe, if he had bene wise, peaceable, patient, and obedient. For,

Vir bonus & sapiens quatuor sunt in omni pace, multiplicata sunt ei bona, et crescit ei opus Ne parum ei signa daretur in eterna iusticia.

In the end, the archbishop was cited to appeare before the king at Northampton, where the king used him somewhat roughly, placing his horses at his Anne, and laid disobedience to his charge, for that he did not personallie appeare at a certaine place before his highnesse, upon summons given unto him for the same purpose. Whereunto though the archbishop alleged that he had sent thither a sufficient deputie to make answer for him; yet could he not be so excused, but was found guilty, and his goods confiscat to the kings pleasure.

How when the archbishop heard that sentence was in such wise pronounced against him: What manner of judgement saith he is this? Though I hold my peace, yet the age that shall hereafter followe, will not hide it in silence; for sithens the world began, it hath not bene heard, that any archbishop of Cantuarburie hath bene judged in any of the kings of Englands

An assemblie of bishops.

The archbish. called to an account.

The next daie the king required of him the repaiment of five hundred markes, which he had lent him when he was chancellor. Now although he affirmed that he received the same by waie of gift, and not by waie of lone; yet because he confessed the receipt, he was condemned in that debt, forsomuch as he could not proue the title of the gift.

On the morrow after, the archbishop with his felow bishops being set in counsell, by commandement of the king (& the doores fast locked that they should not get out) this was proponed against the archbishop, that whereas he held certeine bishops sees as then vacant, with abbeies, and other reuenues of his soueraigne lord the king in his hands, and had made none account to him for the same of long time, the king required now to be answered at his hands, and that with all speed, for he would haue no delaie. The summe amounted to thirtie thousand markes.

When the archbishop had heard the variable sentences of the bishops in this case, he answered after this maner: I would (said he) speake with two earles which are about the king, and named them. Who being called, and the doores set open, he said vnto them; “ We haue not here at this present to shew whereby “ the thing may be more manifest: therefore we aske “ respite for answer till to morrow. The counsell there“ fore brake vp, and the multitude of people, which came with the archbishop thither, being afraid of the kings displeasure, fell from him. Wherefore he caused his seruants to fetch a great number of poze and impotent people to his lodging, saleng that by the seruice of such men of warre, a more speedie victorie in short space might be gotten, than by them which in time of temptation shamesfullie dreyne backe. Hereupon his house was filled full, and the tables set with such as his seruants had brought in, out of the lanes and streets abroad.

The bishops

The archbish.

He appealeth to the church of Rome.

Upon the tuesday, the bishops all amazed and full of care, came vnto him; and because of the displeasure which the king had conceiued against him, counselled him to submit himselfe to the kings will, or else in fine, they told him plainelie, that he would be iudged a pertured person; because he had swozne vnto the king as to his earthly soueraigne, touching all temporall hono: in life, lim, and member; and name-lie to obserue all his roiall lawes and customes, which of late he had established.

Wherevnto he answered: My brethren, ye see how the world roseth against me, and the enemie riseth vp, but I more lament that the sonnes of my mother fight against me. If I should hold my peace, yet would the world come to declare how ye leaue me alone in the battell, and haue iudged against me now these two daies past, I being your father, though neuer so much a sinner. But I command you by vertue of your obedience, and vpon perill of your order, that you be not present in any place of iudge-ment, where my person may fortune to be adiudged: in testimonie whereof I appeale to our mother the church of Rome. Furthermore, if it chance that tem-porall men late their hands vpon me, I charge you likewise by vertue of your obedience, that ye exercise the censures of the church in the behalfe of your father the archbishop as it becometh you. This one thing know ye well, that the world roseth, the flesh trembleth and is weake, but I (by Gods grace) will not shrink, nor leaue the flocke committed vnto to me.

After this he entred into the church, and celebrated the masse of saint Stephen (otherwise than he was accustomed to do) with his pall: which being ended, he put on his sacrificing vestures, with a cope vpon them all, and so went to the court. Furthermore, because he was afraid, he received the sacrament secretly with him, and bearing the crosse in his right hand, and the reine of his bridell in his left, he came in that order to the court, where he alighted, and entred the place, still bearing the crosse himselfe, till he came to the kings chamber doore, the other bishops following him with great feare and trembling. Now being come thither, the bishop of Hereford would gladlie haue taken the crosse, and haue borne it before him, but he would not suffer him, sayeng: It is most reason that I should beare it my selfe, vnder the defense whereof I may remaine in safetie: and beholding this ensigne, I need not doubt vnder what prince I serue.

He goeth to the court.

At length, when the king had exhibited great complaints vnto them all generallie against him, they cried that he was a traitor, sith he had received so manie benefits at the kings hands, and now refused to do him all earthly hono: as he had swozne to do.
 To be short, when the bishops came to sit vpon the matter in counsell, they appealed to the see of Rome against the archbishop, accusing him of periurie: and in the word of truth bound themselves by promise, to do what they might to depose him, if the king would pardon them of that iudgement which now hanged ouer the archbishops head. Then comming to the archbishop they said: Thou wast sometime our archbishop, and we were bound to obeie thee: but sith thou hast swozne fealtie to the king, that is, life, member, and earthly honour, & to obserue his lawes and customes, and now goest about to destroye the same, we say that thou art guiltie of periurie, and we will not from henceforth obey a pertured archbishop.
 Therefore we cite thee by appellation to appeare before the pope, there to answer thine accusors. Then they appointed him a day, in which they ment to prosecute their appeale. I heare you well (said the archbishop.)

He is repated

The bishops dissuade their archbishop.

The princes and peres of the realme did also iudge him a pertured person and a traitour. Among whome (manie then being present) the earle of Leicester accompanied with Reginald earle of Cozmewall, came vnto him and said: The king comma-ded thee to come and render an account of that which is objected against thee, or else heare thy iudgement.
 Iudgement: said the archbishop, [and therewith rising vp said,] Haie sonne earle, first heare thou: It is not vnknowne to thee how faithfull I haue bene to the king, in consideration whereof he advanced me to the archbishops see against my will (as God can be my iudge: for I knew mine owne infirmities, and I was contented to take it vpon me rather for his pleasure, than for Gods cause, and therefore doth God both withholde himselfe and the king from me. In the time of mine election he made me free, and discharged me of all courtlie bondage. Wherefore as touching those things from which I am free and de-liuered, I am not bound to answer, neither will I.
 So much as the soule is more worth than the bodie, so much the more art thou bound to obeie God and me, rather than any earthly creature. Neither will law nor reason permit, that the sonnes should iudge or condemne the father: and therefore I refuse to stand to the iudgement either of the king, or of any other, and appeale to the pope, by whome (vnder God) I ought to be iudged, referring all that I haue vnto Gods protection and his, and vnder the defense of his authoritie I depart out of this place. Having thus spoken, spoken, went incontinent to take horse.

Now as he passed on his waite, the kings seruants and others of the court did cast out manie reprochfull words against him, calling him traitor: and false forsworne cattife. At which words turning himselfe, and looking backe with a sterne countenance he said: That if it were not for his order of priesthod, and that it were lawfull for him, he would suerlie cleere himselfe of perurie and treason, in defending and maintaining his cause against them with weapon in hand.

When he was come to the vtter gate, he found the same fast locked, whereat they began all to be amazed: but one of his seruants espieng where a bunch of keyes tied to a clubs end were hanging on a pin, he toke them down, & tried which was the right key, by profe thereof he found it at the last, opened the gate, and let the archbishop out, the porters standing still as men amazed, and speaking not one word against it.

Now when he was got out, a great number of poore, weake and impotent people met him, saying: "Blessed be God, which hath deliuered his seruant from the face of his enemye. Thus with a great rout of companie, and with the clergie, he was honorablie conuered to the abbey of S. Andrews: and looking behind and before him, as he passed thitherward, he said vnto those that went with him, How glorious a procession doth bring me from the face of the enemye? Suffer all the poore people to come into the place, that we may make merie together in the Lord. Having thus spoken the people had entrance, so that all the hall, parlours, and chambers being furnished with tables and stools, they were conuenientlie placed, and serued with vittels to the full.

The verie same night before the cockcrowling he issued forth by a little posterne gate, and taking with him onelie two monks of the Cisterciour order, the one named Robert Canine, and the other S. Capman, with one of his owne seruants called Roger de Wyoc, he fled awaie disguised in a white vesture and a monks coule, and changing his name, caused himselfe to be called Dereman, & iourneied still all the night, and by daie laie close in one friends house or other: till at last he got to Sandwich, and there taking ship, he sailed ouer into Flanders, and so went to France, where at the citie of Sens he found pope Alexander, into whose bosome he emptied whole cart lodges of complaints and greeuances.

The king vpon knowledge that the archbishop was fled the realme, sent Gilbert Follioth bishop of London, and William carle of Arundell in spedie ambassage to the king of France, to signifie vnto him the whole matter and circumstance of the falling out betwixt him and the archbishop, requiring him not to receiue the archbishop into his realme, but this request was little regarded of the French king, as appeared: for the archbishops cause was fauoured of manie, and the blame imputed to king Henrie, so that the archbishop found great grace with the French king, and no small fauour at the hands of the pope.

Now when king Henrie heard that he was accused by the archbishop vnto the pope, he appointed Roger archbishop of Yorke, the foresaid Gilbert bishop of London, Hilarius bishop of Chichester, Roger bishop of Worcester, Bartholomew bishop of Exeter, with diuerse bishops, deanes, archdeacons, & other learned men of good account, to the number of 15, to passe in ambassage vnto the pope, that they might excuse his doings, and burden the archbishop with the note of rebellion, whereof he had good profe.

Roger archbis-shop of yorke

Being admitted to declare their message in the consistorie before the pope, they opened the whole circumstance of the matter, from the beginning to the end, declaring that betwixt Thomas the archbishop of Canturburie and the king there was a controuersie moued, and by both their consents a daie appointed for the hearing and determining thereof, as iustice should require. At the which daie (by the kings commandement) all the chiefe lords of the realme both spirituall and tempozall were assembled, to the end that the more generall the meeting should be, the more manifest might the discoverie of the fraud and malice of the archbishop appeare.

At the daie appointed (saie they) there came before the catholike prince his presence, the Nobles of his realme: and amongst other, the archbishop the disquieter both of the kingdome & church, who (as one not well assured of the qualitie of his owne deservings) blessed himselfe with the signe of the crosse at his coming into the court, as though he should haue come before some tyrant or schismaticall person. Notwithstanding all which contemptuous and ambitious behauiour, the kings maiestie was nothing offended, but committed the iudgement of his cause to the faithfull order of the bishops, meaning so to deliuer himselfe of all suspicion of wrong dealing. Then it rested in the bishops hands to make an end of the controuersie, and to set a finall union and agreement betwixt them. But the archbishop would none of that, alleging how it should be a derogation to the see apostolike and his metropolitane dignitie, to stand before the king in iudgement, or any other tempozall magistrate. And albeit (saie they) some diminution or eclipse might haue chanced to the dignitie of the church by that iudgement, yet it had bene his part to haue dissembled the matter for the time, to the end that peace might haue bene restored to the church. He further objected (alcribing to himselfe the name of father, which seemed to fauour somewhat of arrogancie) that the children ought not to come together to iudge the fathers cause, but it had bene far more necessarie that the humbleness of the sons should mitigate the pride and temper the ambition of the father.

To conclude, the kings ambassadors made earnest suit, that two legats might be sent from the pope, to haue the hearing & discussing of all the matter betwixt the king and the archbishop without any other appealing. But the kings tale could not be heard in that court, the archbishop hauing already perswaded the pope to the contrarie. For coming to the pope, he uttered his complaint as followeth:

Most holie father, I doe here come for succour to your audience, lamenting that the state of the church, and the liberties thereof are brought to ruine by the couetous dealing of kings and princes. Wherefore when I thought to resist the disease approaching, I was suddenly called before the king, to render accounts as a late man about certeine wards, for whom (while I was the kings chancellor) I had notwithstanding giuen accounts; and also, when I was made bishop, and entred into the dignitie of ruling the archbishops see, I was released and discharged of all reckonings and bonds by the kings eldest sonne, and by the chiefe iusticer of the realme: so that now, where I looked to haue found aid, I was destitute thereof, to my great hinderance and deration. Consider furthermore (I praise you) how my lords and brethren the bishops are readie at the pleasure of the noble men of the court to giue sentence against me, so that all men being about to run vpon me, I was almost oppressed: and therefore am now come as it were to take breath in the audience of your clemencie, which doth not forsake your children in their extreme necessitie, before whom I here stand, readie to declare and testifie that I am not to be iudged there, 1102 yet at all by them. For what other thing should 1103 that be, but to plucke awaie the right of the church?

 1104 What else then to submit spirituall things to tempo-1105 rall? This example therefore once sprung up, might 1106 give an occasion to manie enormities to follow. The 1107 bishops doe say, Those things that are Cæsars, ought 1108 to be referred to Cesar. But admit that in manie 1109 things the king is to be obeyed, is he therefore to be 1110 obeyed in things wherein he is no king? For those 1111 belong not to Cesar, but to a tyrant. Wherein if for 1112 my sake they would not, yet ought the bishops for 1113 their owne sakes to haue resisted him. For what 1114 should be the cause of such deable and vnnaturall ha-1115 tred, that to destroye me, they should destroye them-1116 selues? Therefore whilest for temporall things they 1117 neglect spirituall, they faile in both. Weigh then 1119 tion, and how for your sake I haue bene prouoked

The popes
 answer to the archbishop.

The pope hauing heard his words, tooke deliberation in the matter, with the aduice of his cardinals, and thereupon answered the archbishop in effect as followeth: That the lower power may not iudge the higher, and cheselle him whome he is bound to obie-1125 ce; all the lawes both of God and man doe witnesse, and 1126 the ordinaunces of the ancient fathers doe manifestlie 1127 declare: Whereupon we (to whome it appertaineth to 1128 reforme disorders) doe clearelie reuerse and make 1129 void the iudgement pronounced against you by the 1130 barons and bishops, whereby as well against the or-1131 der of law, as against the customes of the church, 1132 your goods were adiudged forfeit, whereas the same 1133 goods were not yours, but the churches of Cantur-1134 burie, ouer which you haue the onelic cure and charge.
 1135 But if those that haue violentlie entred vpon the pos-1136 sessions and goods of your church, and haue thereby 1137 wronged either you or yours, will not vpon admoni-1138 tion giuen to them, make restitution with sufficient 1139 amends, then may you (if you shall thinke conueni-1140 ent) exercise ecclesiasticall iustice vpon them, and we 1141 shall allow of that which you shall reasonable doe in 1142 that behalfe. Howbeit as touching the king himselfe 1143 we will not giue you any speciall commendement, 1144 neither yet doe we take from you any right belong-1145 ing to your bishoplike office, which you receiued at 1146 your consecration. But the king onlie we will spare, 1147 and exempt from your excommunications and cen-1148 sures. After these and manie by-matters were ouer-1149 passed, the archbishop resigned his pall vnto the pope, 1150 but the pope gaue it him againe, and appointed him 1151 to remaine at Mountney an abbey of monks Cis-1152 teaur in the diocesse of Auxerre, till the variance 1153 were brought to some good end betwixt the king and 1154 him. This was done in the yeare of our Lord 1155 1164.

The king hauing knowledg by his ambassadoys what answer the pope had made, became grauouslie offended in his mind, and thereupon confiscated all the goods that belonged to the archbishop and his complices, and seized their reuenues into his hands, appointing one Randall de Broc to haue the custodie of all that belonged to the see, which Broc was nothing frendlie to the archbishop, being his knowne not suffer that they should take wrong or displeasure

In the yeare 1165. quene Elianor was deliue-red of a daughter which was named Joane. Also on the 26. day of Januarie, there chanced a marvellous earthquake in Southfolke, in the Ile of Elie, and in Suffolke, so that men as they stood on the ground were ouerthrowne therewith, and buildings so shaken, that the belles in steeple knolled: the like had also chanced in the Aduent season then last before passed.

The Welshmen this yeare spoiled a great part of those countries that bordered vpon them: wherewith the king being sore moued, leuied an armie with all speed as well of Englishmen as of strangers, 1156 and (without regard of difficultie and dangers) did go against the rebels, and finding them withdrawne into their starting holes (I meane the woods and 1157 strait passages) he compassed the same about in vertiforceable maner. The Welshmen perceiuing themselues now to be brought into such leoparchie, as that they could not well deuise how to escape the same, consulted what was best to be done. After consultation, casting awaie their weapons, they came forth to the king, asking mercie; which somewhat hardlie 1158 they obtained. Few of them were executed in comparison of the numbers that offended: but yet the capitaines and cheefe authors of this rebellion were so punished, that it was thought they would neuer haue presumed so rashlie to offend him in like sort a-1159 gaine. For (as some writers affirm) he did iustice on the sonnes of Rice or Rees, & also on the sonnes and daughters of other noble men that were his complice 1160 res verie rigorously: causing the eies of the yong striplings to be pecked out of their heads, and their noses to be cut off or slit: and the eares of the yong gentlewomen to be stuffed.

But yet I find in other authors, that in this tour-nic king Henrie did not greatlie pccalle against his enemies, but rather lost manie of his men of warre, both horsemen and footmen: for by his seuerie proceeding against them, he rather made them more eager to seeke reuenge, than quieted them in any tu-1161 mult. They tooke the castell of Cardigan, and in besieging of Wigres, the king was in no small danger of his life: for one of the enemies shooting diricallie at him, had perled him through the bodie, if Hubert de Saint Clere constable of Colchester, perceiuing the arrow comming, had not thrust himselfe betwixt the king and the same arrow, and so preserving his 1162 master, receiued the stripe himselfe, whereof he died presentlie after, beseeching the king to be good lord to one onelic daughter which he had, whome the king bestowed in marriage vpon William de Languallee, together with hir fathers inheritance, which William 1163 begat of hir a sonne that bare both his name and surname. A president of gratitude & thankfulness is here committed to memorie. And surely the king could doe no lesse, than some way requite the venturous courage and hartie zeale of the gentleman, who with the losse of his owne life preserved the king, if not from death, yet from some dangerous wound that might haue put him to extreame anguish and

But to conclude with this tourneie which king Henrie made at this time against the Welshmen, although by reason of the cumbersome difficulties of farre as he wished, yet he so impounded and confre-

William king of Scots, successor of Malcolme (who departed this life in the yeare last past) after he had receiued the crowne of Scotland, came about this present tunc into England, and finding king Henrie at London, did his homage to him as his predecessor Malcolme had done before. He made suit also to have Northumberland restored unto him, which the king of Englands mother the emperesse had in times past given unto king David. But king Henrie gaue diuerse reasons to excuse himselfe why he might not deliuer that countrie to him at that present, namelie, without consent of a parlement: whereupon king William perceiuing how the matter went, gaue ouer his suit for that present, meaning (when occasion serued) to attempt the getting thereof by force, sith that by praiser and suit he sawe well inough he should not obtaine it.

Moreouer, the Scottish king being required by king Henrie to go ouer with him into Normandie, granted so to do: insomuch that king Henrie, hauing set all things in order within his realme of England, in the Lent following passed ouer into Normandie. But before he took his iourneie, he set forth a decrea consisting of these points in effect as followeth.

1 That no man should bring any letters or commandment from pope Alexander, or Thomas archbishop of Canturburie into England, containing an interdiction of the realme: upon perill to be apprehended and punished as a traitour to the king, and an enemie to the realme.

2 That no religious person or priest should be permitted to passe the seas, or to come into the realme of England, except he had letters of safe conduct from the iusticers for passage ouer, and of the king for his returne from thence.

3 That no man should appeale to the said pope or archbishop, nor by their appointment hold any place: and if any person were found doing the contrarie hereunto, he should be taken and committed to prison.

4 That if any manner of person, either spirituall or temporall, were obedient to the sentence of the interdiction, the same person should be banished the realme without delaie, and all his linage with him, so as they should not conueie with them any of their goods, the which together with their possessions should be seized into the kings hands.

5 That all spirituall persons, which had any benefices within England, should haue warning given to returne into England within foure moneths after the same summons pronounced, and that if they failed hereof, then should the king seize vpon their goods and possessions.

6 That the bishops of London and Norwiche, should be (and by vertue hereof were) summoned to appeare before the kings iusticers, to make answer for that they had interdicted the lands of erle Hugh, and excommunicated him.

7 That the Peter pence should be gathered and kept.

In the octaues of Easter king Henrie came to an enterbiew with the French king at Oisors, where they had conference together of sundrie matters.

This yeare the quene was deliuered of a sonne named John, who afterward was king of this realme.

Moreouer, king Henrie calling a councell of his bishops and barons in Normandie, caused an ordered collection (by their aduise) to be made through all his countreies and dominions, of two pence in the pound of euerie mans lands and goods, iewels and apparell onelie excepted: to be paid this yeare 1166, and for the space of foure yeares next ensuing, one pence of euerie pound to be paid yearelie: and those that were not worth twentie shillings in goods or landes (being householders notwithstanding) or bare any office, should paie a penie to this contribution, which was onelie granted for the release of the Christians in the east parts, and those that warred against the miscreants there. The payment thereof was appointed to be made in the feast daie of saint Remigius, or within fiftene daies after. It was also ordained, that all such as departed this life, within the terme that this collection was in force (their debts being paid) should giue the tenth part of the residue of all their goods vnto this so necessarie a contribution.

King Henrie remaining now in Normandie, and vnderstanding that diuerse lords and barons of Haine, and the marches of Britaine, would not in his absence shew themselves obedient vnto his wife quene Elianor, but were about to practise a rebellion, raised an armie, and went against them, easilie subduing them whom he found obstinate: and besieging the castell of Foulgiers, took and utterly destroyed it.

Some after the archbishop of Canturburie came from Mountney to Wizeley, and there (on Ascension daie) when the church was most full of people, got him into the pulpit, and with booke, bell, and candell solemnlie accursed all the obseruers, defenders, and maintainers, with the promoters of such customs, as within the realme of England they terme the custome of their elders: amongst others that were accursed, was Richard de Lucie, Richard the archdeacon of Poitiers, Jocelin de Wailenille, Alan de Beuille, and many other. But they being absent, neither called nor conuincid (as they alleged notwithstanding they were thus excommunicated) sent their messengers vnto the archbishop, and appealed from him, and so feared not to enter into their churches.

He had before this also written certeine letters vnto his suffragans, denouncing some of these and other persons by expresse name accursed, not onelie for maintaining the matter against him, touching the ancient custome of the realme: but also for the schisme raised in Almaine by Reinald archbishop of Colein, for the which he accursed one John of Oxford. Moreouer, he accursed Ranulfe de Broc, Hugh de S. Cleere, and Thomas Fitz Bernard, for violentlie seizing vpon and detaining the goods and possessions belonging to his archbishopp, without his consent or agreement thereunto.

The king on the other part banished out of England, and all parts of his other dominions, all those persons that were knowen to be of kin vnto the archbishop, both yong and old: and furthermore sent aduertisement to the abbat of Mountney and to his monks, with whom the archbishop by the popes appointment remained, that if they kept him still in their house, he would not faile to banish all the monks of their order out of England. Now the archbishop, after he had remained there scarce two yeares, departed from thence of his owne accord, and came to the king of France, who courteously received him, and sent him to the abbey of saint Columbes nere to the citie of Sens, where he remained a certeine season, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Shortlie after this, two legats named William of Dauia, and John of Naples both cardinals, came from the pope to Pontmiriall, whom the archbishop suspected rather to fauour the kings cause than his: yet he was contented that they should haue the iudgement thereof committed vnto them: so that first (according to the rules of the church) restitution might be made both to him and his, of such goods as had bene taken from them. For being spoiled, as he was, he would not stand to any iudgement, nor could not be compelled therunto by any reason (as he said.) Now

How when the two legats saw that they could not bring any thing to passe, they departed without any thing concluded.

About this time William Tasuan earle of Saragum (by the content of his sons and nephews) deliuered into the hands of king Henrie the castels of Alerrum, and Koch Laberie, with all the appurtenances to the castels belonging.

About this season also Conan the duke of Britaine departed this life, leauing behind him no issue, but one onellie daughter begot of his wife the dutchesse Constance, the daughter of the king of Scotland, which succeeded him in the estate. Whereupon king Henrie made earnest suit to procure a marriage betwixt hir and his sonne Gestefrey, which at length he brought to passe, to the great comfort and contentation of his mind, in that his sonne had by such good fortune attained to the dukedome of Britaine.

At that season in Britaine were certeine noble men of such strength and power, that they disdained to acknowledge themselves subiect to any superior, in somuch that through ambitious desire of rule and preheminnce, they warred continually one against another, to the great destruction and utter bndoming of their miserable countrie, so that the land sometime fruitfull by nature, was as it were a wilderness. Whereupon, those that were the weaker, perceiving themselves too much oppressed by the stronger, submitted themselves vnto king Henrie, and required his aid and succour. King Henrie reioysing to haue so good an occasion and opportunitie to reduce them to reason, with all speed aided these supplicants and subdued the resistants, notwithstanding their great puissance, and the strength of the places which they kept.

In the meane while Henrie came ouer to his father, and found him at Poitiers, from whence (shortly after Easter) he remoued, and with an armie entered into the lands of the earle of Aluerignes, which he waisted and spoiled, because the said earle had renounced his allegiance to king Henrie, and made his resort to the French king, seeking to sow discord betwixt the foresaid two kings: which was kindled the more by a challenge pretended about the sending of the monie ouer into the holie land, which was gathered within the countie of Tours: for the French king claimed to send it, by reason that the church there appertained to his dominion: and the king of England would haue sent it, because it was gathered within the countrie that belonged to his gouernement.

This yeare a great preparation of ships was made by the earle of Wallongne, to haue invaded England, but by the warlike prouision of Richard Lucie, lord gouernour of the realme, the sea-coasts were so prouided of sufficient defense, that the varles attempts came to nothing. The cause why he made this brag, was for that the king withheld from him certaine reuenues which he claimed to haue here in England, and therefore he ment to recouer them by force. The emperesse Maud mother to the king of England (a woman in stoutnesse of stomach and warlike attempts more famous than commonlie any of that sex) deceased this yere the 10. of Septemr.

Also Robert bishop of Lincolne departed this life, after whose deasse the see of Lincolne was vacant by the space of seuentene yeares, the king in all that meane time receiuing the profits. The clea of Colein came ambassadour from the emperour vnto the king of England, requiring to haue one of his daughters giuen in marriage vnto the emperours sonne, and another of them vnto Henrie duke of Saronie: which request the k. did willingly grant, and thereupon was the queene sent for to come ouer into Normandie, and to bring her sonne the lord Richard and his daughter the ladie Maud with hir: which ladie was married vnto the duke of Saronie, in the beginning of the yeare next ensuing; and had issue by him three sons, Henrie, Edmo, and William, of which the middlemost came to be emperour.

The variance still depending betwixt the king and the archbishop of Canturburie: there was also about the same time a great debate betwixt the emperour Frederike the first and pope Alexander the third: whereupon king Henrie wrote to the emperour, and signified vnto him, that he would aid him if need should require against the pope, who maintained such a runagate traitor: as the archbishop Becket was. Moreover at the same time the king caused all his subiects within the realme of England, from the child of twelue yeares old vnto the aged person, to forswear all obedience that might be pretended as due to the same pope Alexander. The king for the space of two yeares together, remaining still in Normandie, and in other places beyond the seas, subdued diuerse rebels, as the earle of Angoulesme, Aimerike de Lucignie, and his sonnes Robert and Hugh.

Also he came to an enterbiel with the king of France betwixt Pacie and Maunt, where they communed of such iniuries as were thought to be attempted on either part. For the Poitouins had made their resort to the French king, and were confederate with him against their supreme lord king Henrie, and had deliuered pledges for assurance thereof, which pledges the French king would not restore. But yet there was a truce concluded betwixt them, to endure till the feast of S. John Baptist.

About the feast of Easter Patrike the earle of Salisburie was slaine by treason of the Poitouins, and was buried at Saint Hilaries: after whome his sonne William succeeded in the earldome.

The Britons practised rebellions dailie: but king Henrie entering their countrie, wan diuerse strong townes and castels, and brought them at length vnder his subiection. Moreover in this summer season the two kings met againe at Fert Bernard to treat of peace, but they departed without concluding any agreement at all. For there were manie of the Poitouins and Britons, which took part with the king of France, and hauing deliuered vnto him hostages, had a promise made them, that the French king should not conclude an agreement with the king of England without their consent. Whereupon they made warres either vpon other, till finally (about the feast of the Epiphanie) a peace was accorded betwixt them: and then Henrie the king of Englande sonne made his homage vnto the French king for the countie of Anson: and the French king granted him the office of the Seneschalrie of France, which ancientlie belonged vnto the earles of Anson. Also Gestefrey duke of Britaine did homage to his elder brother the aforesaid Henrie, by commandement of his father, for the duchie of Britaine. And afterwards the same Gestefrey went into Britaine, and at Rheims receiued the homage and fealtie of the lords and barons of that countrie.

King Henrie in the meane while subdued certeine rebels in Gascoigne, and returning into Normandie, built a goodlie towne and fortrese nere to Hain de Palatrey, called Beaulieu.

About the same time one Harury de Puon, who had married the daughter of one William Colet, was died in his iourne which he took into the holie land: deliuered certeine castels into the hands of king Henrie, because he was in despalle to keepe them against Theobald earle of Chartres, who through the French kings aid, sought to dispossesse him of the same castels: whereupon the war was renewed betwixt the king of England and the said earle of Chartres.

tres.ouertheleffe king Henrie making no great accompt of those wars, went into Britaine with his sonne Cestrey, where going about the countrie to visit the cities and townes, he reformed many disorders, laicng as it were a manner of a new foundation of things there, fortifying the castles, cities and townes, and communicating in courteous manner with the lordes and perres of the countrie, sought to win their good wils: and so in such exercises he spent a great part of the time.

He kept his Christmalle at Stautes, whither all the great lordes and barons of Britaine resorted to him. The solemnitie of which feast being past, he entered into the lands of earle Cudo, and wasted the same, till the said earle submitted himself. At length, after the king had taken order for the good gouernement of Normandie, and his other countries on that side the sea, he returned into England in the first weeke of March, but not without great danger, by reason of a tempest that toke him on the seas, beginning about midnight, and not ceasing till 9. of the clocke in the morning, about which houre he came on land at Portesmouth, not with many of his ships, the rest being tossed and diuerted to seekes succour in sundrie craks and haecens of the land, and one of them which was the cheefest and newest, was lost in the middle of the clouds, together with 400. persons, men & women: among whome was Henrie de Aguell with two of his sons, Gilbert Sullemmy, and Rafe Beumont the kings physician & household seruant.

After this the king held his Easter at Winsor, whither William the Scotish king came with his brother David, to welcome him home, and to congratulate his happie successe in his businesse on the further side the seas. They were honorable entertained, and at their departure princelie rewarded. The king thus returned into England, punished the shrikes of the land very grauously for their extortion, byberie, and rapine. After this, studieng how to assure the estate of the realme vnto his sons, vpon good consideration remembryng that no liuing creature was more subiect to the vncerteintie of death than Adams heires, and that there is ingrafted such a feruent desire in the ambitious nature of man to gouerne, that so oft as they once come in hope of a kingdome, they haue no regard either of right or wrong, God or the diuell, till they be in possession of their desired prey: he thought it not the worst point of wisdom to forese that which might happen. For if he should chance to depart this life, and leaue his sons yong, and not able to mainteine wars through lacke of knowledge, it might fortune them through the ambition of some to be defrauded and disappoynted of their lawfull inheritance. Therefore to prevent the chances of fortune, he determined whilste he was alive to crowne his eldest sonne Henrie, being now of the age of 17. yeares, and so to inuett him in the kingdome by his owne act in his life time: which deed turned him to much trouble, as after shall appeare.

Being vpon this point resolved, he called together a parlement of the lordes both spirituall and temporall at London, and there (on S. Roger archbishop of Yorke did crowne according to the manner, being commanded so to do by the king. This office appertained vnto the archbishop of Cantuarburie, but because he was banished the realme, the king appointed the archbishop of Yorke to do it, which he ought not to haue done without licence of the archbishop of Cantuarburie within the precinct of his prouince (as was alledged by archbishop Becket) who complained thereof vnto pope Alexander, and so incensed the pope, that he being highly moued by his letters, forbade not onelie the archbishop of Yorke, but also Gilbert bishop of London, and Jocelin bishop of Salisburie (who were present at the coronation) the vse of the sacraments, which made king Henrie far more displeased with the archbishop Thomas than he was before.

The archbishop of Yorke, who sat by him, marking his behauior, turned vnto him, & said; Be glad my god sonne, there is not another prince in the world that hath such a seruer at his table. To this the new king answered, as it were disdainfullie, thus: Why dost thou marnell at that? My father in doing it, thinketh it not more than becommeth him, he being borne of princelie blood onlie on the mothers side, serueth me that am a king borne hauing both a king to my father, and a queene to my mother. Thus the yong man of an euill and peruerse nature, was puffed by in pride by his fathers vnseemelie doings.

But the king his father hearing his talke, was verie sorrowfull in his mind, and said to the archbishop sittie in his eare; It repenteth me, it repenteth me my lord, that I haue thus advanced the boy. For he gessed hereby what a one he would proue afterward, that shelded himselfe so disobedient and forward alreadie. But although he was displeased with himselfe in that he had done vndiscretelie, yet notwithstanding that which was done could not be vndone, he caused all the Nobles and lordes of the realme, together with the king of Scots and his brother David, to do homage vnto his said sonne thus made fellow with him in the kingdome: but he would not release them of their oth of allegiance, wherein they stood bound to obeye him the father, so long as he liued.

Whobest some wrote that he renounced his estate, first before all the lordes of the land, and after caused his sonne to be crowned: but in such vncerteine points let forth by partiall writers, that is to be receiued as a truth, which is confirmed by the order and sequence of things after done and put in practice. For true it is, that king Henrie the father (so long as his sonne liued) did shewe himselfe sometime as fellow with his sonne in gouernment, and sometime as absolute king: and after his sons decease, he continued in the entier gouernment, so long as he liued. But to proceed.

The French king hearing that his sonne in law was thus crowned, and not his daughter the wife of Henrie the sonne, was highly offended therewith, and threatned to make war against king Henrie the father, except his daughter Margaret might receiue the crowne also as queene immediatlie.

The French

The cause why she was not crowned, was by reason of her yong yeares, and for that she had not as yet accompanied with her husband. But H. Henrie the father vnderstanding the French kings threats, sailed ouer into Normandie, where whilste they prepared for war on both sides, by the earnest diligence of Thomas earle of Blois, both the kings came to an entreatie at Vendosme, where at length they were accorded, vpon promises made by king Henrie, that he would cause his sonne to be crowned againe, and with him his wife the said Margaret the French kings daughter as queene.

hometwards, and king Henrie returning came to Vernon, where he fell into so great a sicknesse, that anon it was noised ouer all the countrie. Insomuch that he was in such despaire of life, that he made his testament: wherein he assigned his sonne Richard the dutchie of Aquitaine, and all those lands which came by quene Elianor the mother of the same Richard. And to his sonne Gesteuy he bequeathed Britaine (with the daughter of earle Conan) which he had purchased to his vse of the French king. And to his sonne king Henrie he gaue the dutchie of Poymandie, and all those lands which came by his father Gesteuy earle of Anjou. And to his yongest sonne John he bequeathed the earledome of Mortaine. And finally appointed where he would haue his bodie to be buried.

In the meane time Henrie the sonne remaining at home in England, fell from all good order of meane keeping, and gaue himselfe to all excessive riot, spending and wasting his reuenues inordinatelic. Of which behauiour his father being aduertised, returned into England, where he taried not long, but passed ouer againe into Poymandie, hauing his said sonne in his companie, meaning thereby to remoue him from the companie of those that were verie like to corrupt his nature, and frame the same to all lewdnesse: for he knew that

In this meane while Thomas the archbishop of Canturburie remained in exile almost six yeares, and could not be restored, till partly by swelling threats of the pope, and partly at the earnest suit of Lewes the French king, Theobald earle of Blois, and others, king Henrie began somewhat to shew himselfe conformable towards an agreement.

Ex Quadrilogio.
The king and the arch.
Becket met together in presence of the French king.

Whereupon the two kings met diuerse times, and the archbishop Thomas comming with the French king, at one time humbled himselfe so to the king of England, that kneeling downe at his feet, he said: My soueraigne liege lord, I commit the whole cause of the controuersie betwixt your grace and me, vnto your maiesties order, Gods honour onelie referred.

on, said to the king of France: Whatsoeuer displeaseth this man, is taken (as he interpreteth it) contrarie to Gods honour, and so by that shift will he challenge to himselfe all that belongeth vnto me. But because you shall not thinke that I go about to resist Gods honour, or him, in any reasonable order, loke what the greatest and most holie of all his ancessors haue done vnto the meanest of mine ancessours, let him do the same vnto me, and I am contented therewith.

All the companie present cried, that the king humbled himselfe enough. My lord archbishop (said the French king) will you be greater than saints, and better than saint Peter: Wherof stand you in doubt? Behold, your peace is at hand. The archbishop made answer in commendation of the present state of holie church, as thus: My holie predecessours in their time, although they cut not all things away that extolled it selfe against God, yet did they cut off diuers: but if they had plucked vp all by the hard roots, which might offend, who should now haue raised the fire of temptation against vs? We are in much better case (thanks be to God) and as we haue laboured in their lot and number, so are we partakers of their labour and reward. What if any of them had bene defectiue or excessive in any point, are we bound to follow the example of their defection or excellence? We blame Peter for his denying of Christ, but we praise him in re-proving of Peters violence with danger of his life. The church hath risen and increased out of manie dangerous oppressions, our fathers haue suffered manie things, because they would not forsake the name of Christ; and ought I to suppress his honour, to be reconciled vnto any mans fauour? God forbid, God forbid.

When the Noble men present heard this answer of a subiect against his soueraigne, they all held against him, imputing the fault to the archbishops arrogancie, that the peace was not made betwene the king and him, insomuch that there was an erle which openlie said; Sith he resisteth the will of both the realmes, he is not worthe to be succoured by either of them from henceforth: and therefore being cast out of England, let not France receiue him.

The counsell then being broken vp, the kings departed without bidding the archbishop farewell, and such as were mediators for peace, in departing from this meeting, spake manie reprochfull words to him, alledging that he had bene euer stout and wise in his owne conceit, and a follower of his owne will and opinion: adding that it was a great hinderance to the church, that he was ordeined archbishop, and that by him the church was already in part destroyed, and would shortly be altogether brought to utter ruine.

But the archbishop setting a watch before his mouth, kept silence (as though he had not heard) and folowed the French king with his people. Manie said by the waie as they iourneied, Behold the archbishop ponder, which in talke the last night would not for the pleasure of the king denie God, nor keepe his honour in silence.

After this, when the archbishop was come to Sens, and aduised with himselfe whether it should be best for him to go, at length he said, God is able in the last point of miserie and distresse, to helpe those that be his. Herewith came a messenger from the French king to bring him to the court, for the French king (as one that had bene better instructed in the matter) repented himselfe that he had iudged euill of his answers at the last meeting, and hereupon receiued him againe into his fauour, and rested not to trauell so much in his cause, that at length another meeting was assigned at a certeine place nere the confines of Poymandie, whither king Henrie came, and there found king Lewes, the archbishop of Rouen, and diuerse other bishops together, with the foresaid archbishop, who after they had reasoned of the matter thoroughlie as they saw cause, king Henrie receiued the archbishop into his fauour againe, and promised to redresse all that had bene done amisse, and pardon all those that had folowed him out of the realme. Whereupon the king and the archbishop being reconciled, the archbishop the same day came before the king, and talked with him.

Now among other things he required of the king that it might be lawfull for him (without offending of his maiestie) to punish (according to the censures of the church) the iniurie done vnto him by the archbishop of Poike, and other bishops in the coronation of his sonne. The king granted this, and shewed himselfe so courteous at that time, that (as it is said) he held his stirrup whiles he mounted on horsebacke.

Notwithstanding which obsequiousnes of the king, it is to be presumed that all inward repining could not be so abolished, as that no fragments remained; but that the archbishop for his part, for the maintenance of his great title, & the king for the imposition of his soueraintie, when opportunitie serued, sought to get aduantage one of another, & acquit their harts with a new reuenge of an old grudge: for

But whereas twise within a few daies after, the king and the said archbishop met at masse, the king refused to kisse the par with him. This was marked as a signe of a fained reconciliation, though in deed he afterwards interceded him verie courteously, and at his departure ouer into England, toke leaue of him in frendlie manner, and directed letters vnder his seale to his sonne the new king in feyne as followeth.

A letter of the king touching the pacification betweene him and Thomas Becket.

Now ye that Thomas the archbishop of Canturburie hath made his peace with me at my will and pleasure; and therefore I command you, that both he and his may re-maine in peace; and that he and al those which for his cause departed out of the realme, may haue all their goods restored, and in such quiet estate be now possessed of them as at any time within three moneths before their departure from thence. And further, cause to come before vs of the best and most ancient knights of the honor of Salwood, that vpon their oths they may find what fee the archbishop ought to haue within that honor, & that which shall appeare to appertene vnto him, as in fee, let him inioy the same. And thus farewell.

The honor of Salwood.

The archbishop (before he toke his iournie into England) went to visit the French king, and to giue him thanks for his great paines and trauell sustained in his cause, who aduised him in no wise as yet to commit himselfe to present danger amongst his new reconciled enimies, but rather to staie till their malice were somewhat asswaged. For he perceiued by king Henries words & countenance such a deepe rooted displeasure in his hart, that he agreed to reuerie him into fauour rather by compulsion and against his will than otherwise.

But when the archbishop would needs depart & go ouer into England, the French k. suffered him so to do, doing him all the honor he could at his leaue taking. Then the archbishop departing out of France, came into England, and landed at Sandwich about the first of December, in the seuenth yeare after his first departure out of the realme. Shortlie after his arrivall, Roger the archbishop of Yorke, Gilbert bishop of London, and Jocelin bishop of Salisbury, with diuerse other, came vnto him as to the popes legat, and required that it might please him to restore them to the immutation of their offices againe: whose request he granted, but yet vpon condition, that they should undertake to stand to his iudgement and order in all things, which (by the counsell of the archbishop of Yorke) they vicerlie refused.

The archbis-

England.

Where authors agree not (as Polydor trulie saith) for some write that archbishop Thomas (immediatlie vpon his returne into England) denounced the archbishop of Yorke with the bishops of Salisbury and London accursed, whereas before they were deputed of the use and administration of the sacraments. Some others write, that now at his coming ouer into England from his exile, he deputed them onlie of the administration of the sacraments, together with the bishops of Eresier, Chesser, Rochester, S. Asaph, & Landaff, which had before alie bene present at the coronation of king Henrie the sonne, to the derogation of the dignitie of their ymmat the archbishop of Canturburie (as before you haue heard.) It shuld seme yet by Ger. Dorober: that the archbishop of Yorke, and the bishop of Durham were suspended, and the bishops of London, Salisbury, and diuerse other excommunicated.

But how soeuer he used them, the archbishop of Yorke, the two bishops London and Salisbury, being offended with his doings, sailed ouer into Normandie, and there complained to king Henrie of iniuries done to them by archbishop Thomas, grieuouly accusing him that he went about to take awaie their libertie of priesthod, to destroe, corrupt, and finally to abolish both the lawes of God and man, together with the ancient decrees and statutes of their elders; in somuch that he toke vpon him to exclude bishops at his pleasure from the companie of christian men, and so being excluded, to banish them for euer: to derogat things merrelie prejudiciall to the kings roiall prerogatiue; and finally to take awaie from all men the equitie of lawes and ciuill orders.

Ger. Dor.

The king giuing eare to their complaint, was so displeased in his mind against archbishop Thomas, that in open audience of his lords, knights, and gentlemen, he said these or the like words: In what miserable state am I, that can not be in rest within mine owne realme, by reason of one onelie priest? Neither is there any of my folkes that will helpe to deliuer me out of such troubles.

The occasion of the kings words that cost bish. Becket his life.

There were some that stood about the king, which gessed by these words, that his mind was to signifie how he would haue some man to dispatch the archbishop out of the waie. The kings displeasure against the archbishop was knowne well inough, which caused men to haue him in no reuerence at all, so that (as it was said) it chanced on a time, that he came to Strowd in Kent, where the inhabitants meaning to do somewhat to his infamie, being thus out of the kings fauour, and despised of the world, cut off his horses taile.

There were some also of the kings seruants, that thought after an other maner of sort to reuenge the displeasure done to the kings maiestie, as sir Hugh Sporeuille, sir William Tracie, sir Richard Wiltaine, and sir Keignold Fitz Arse, knights, who taking aduice together, and agreeing in one mind and will, toke shipping, & sailed ouer into England, landing at a place called Dogs hauen, nere Dover.

The knights that slue the archbishop Becket.

Now the first night they lodged in the castell of Saltwood, which Randulfe de Broc had in keeping. The next morning (being the 29. of December, and first daie of Christmasse, which as that yeare came about fell vpon a tuesday) having gotten together certeine souldiers in the countie thereabouts, came to Canturburie, and first entring into the court of the abbey of S. Augustine, they talked with Clarembald the elect abbat of that place: and after conference had with him, they proceeded in their businesse as followeth.

The first knight sir Keignold Fitz Arse came to him about the eleuenth houre of the daie, as the archbishop sat in his chamber, and sitting downe at his feet vpon the ground without any manner of greeting or salutation, at length began with him thus: Being sent of our soueraine lord the king from beyond the seas, we doe here present vnto you his Graces commandments, to wit, that you should go to his sonne the king, to do vnto him that which appertaineth vnto you to do vnto your soueraine lord, and to do your fealtie vnto him in taking an oth, and further to amend that wherein you haue offended his maiestie. Wherevnto the archbishop answered: For that cause ought I to confesse my fealtie vnto him by oth: & therein am I guiltie in offend-during the kings praierie: Sir Keignold said: For your baronie, sealtie is demanded of you with an oth, and an other oth is required of those clerkes, which you haue brought with you, if they meane to continue within the land. The archbishop answered: For my baronie I am ready to do to the king what soeuer law or reason shall allow: but let him for certeine hold, that he shall not get any oth either of me or of my clerkes. We know that (said the knight) that you would not do any of these things which we proponed vnto you. Whereupon the king commaundeth you to absolve those bishops that are excommunicated by you without his licence. Wherevnto he said: The bishops are excommunicated not by me, but by the pope, who hath thereto authoritie from the Lord. If in deed he hath reuenged the iniurie done to my church, I confesse that I am not displeased therewith.

Then said the knight: With that such things in despite of the king displease you, it is to be thought that you would take from him his crowne, and be called and taken for king your selfe, but you shall misse of your purpose surelie therein. The archbishop answered: I do not aspire to the name of a king, rather would I knit these crownes vnto his crowne if it lay in my power.

At length after these and such words, the knights turning them to the monks, said: In the behalfe of our soveraigne lord the king, we command you, that in any wise ye keepe this man safe, and present him to the king when it shall please his grace to send for him. The archbishop said: Dope thinke that I will run away? I came not to run away, but looke for the outrage and malice of wicked men. Truclie (said they) you shall not runne away, and herewith went out with noise and theatinings. Then maister John of Salisburie his chancelor said vnto him: My lord, this is a wonderfull matter that you will take no mans counsell: had it not bene meet to haue given them a more meke and gentle answer? But the archbishop said: Surelie I haue already taken all the counsell that I will take, I know what I ought to do. Then said Salisburie, I pray God it may be good.
Now the knights departing out of the place, and going about to put on their armour, certeine came to the archbishop, & said: My lord, they arme themselves.
What force it? said he, let them arme themselves.
Now when they were armed, and manie other about them, they entred into the archbishops palace.
Those that were about the archbishop cried vpon him to flee, but he sat still and would not once remoue, till the monks brought him euen by force & against his will into the church. The coming of the armed men being knowen, some of the monks continued singing of euensong, and some sought places where to hide themselves, other came to the archbishop, who was lethy to haue entred into the church, and when he was with them, he would not yet suffer them to make fast the doores, so that there was a great stir among them, but chertie when they perceiued that the armed men went about to seeke for the archbishop, by meane whereof their euensong was left unfinished.

At length the knights with their seruants hauing sought the palace, came rushing into the church by the cloister doore with their swords drawne, some of them asking for the traitor, and some of them for the archbishop, who came and met them, saying: Here am I, no traitor, but the archbishop. The foremost of the knights said vnto him: Flee, thou art but dead. To whome the archbishop said, I will not flee. The knight stept to him taking him by the sleue, and with his sword cast his cap besides his head, and said, Come hither, for thou art a prisoner. I will not, said the archbishop, do with me here what thou wilt: and plucked his sleue with a mightie strenght out of the knights hand. Wherewith the knight stepped backe two or three paces. Then the archbishop turning to one of the knights, said to him, What meaneth this, Keig-nold? I haue done vnto thee manie great pleasures, and commett thou now vnto me into the church armed? Vnto whome the knight presentlie answered and said: Thou shalt know anon what is ment, thou art but dead: it is not possible for thee any longer to liue. Vnto whom the archbishop answered: I am ready to die for my God, and for the defense of his iustice and the libertie of the church, gladlie doe I im-brace death, so that the church may purchase peace and libertie by the shedding of my blood. And herewith taking on other of the knights by the haberge-on, he slong him from him with such violence, that he had almost throwne him downe to the ground.

This was sir Will. Tracie, as he after confessed.

The courage of the archb.

Then the archbishop inclined his head after the maner of one that would praie, pronouncing these his last words: To God, to saint Marie, and to the saints that are patrones of this church, and to saint Demise, I commend my selfe and the churches cause.
Wherewith sir Keignold Fitz Urle striking a full blow at his head, chanced to light vpon the arme of a clerke named Edward of Cambridge, who cast vp his arme to saue the archbishop: but when he was not able to beare the weight of the blow, he plucked his arme backe, and so the stroke staid vpon the archbishops head, in such wise that the blond ran downe by his face. Then they stroke at him one after an other, and though he fell to the ground at the second blow, yet they left him not till they had cut and pathed out his baines, and dashed them about vpon the church pavement. All this being done, they rifled his house, spoiled his goods, and toke them to their owne uses, supposing it lawfull for them being the kings seruants so to do.

But doubting how the matter would be taken, after they had wrought their feat, they got them into the bishoprike of Duresme, there to remaine till they might heare how the king would take his their un-lawfull enterprise: though (as they alledged) they had lustilie defended his cause, and reuenged his quarrell as faithfull seruants ought to do. Holobert, it chanced otherwise than they looked it should haue done: for king Henrie gaue them so litle thanks for their presumptuous ad, sounding to the euill example of other in breach of his lawes, that they despairing of terlie of pardon, fled one into one place, and another into another, so that within foure yeares they all died an euill death (as it hath bene reported.) Some write, that they went to Rome by the kings commandement, and there presented themselves before the pope, to receiue such penance for their wicked ad as he should enioine them. Herevpon the pope appointed them to go vnto Jerusalem, there to do their penance, where they remained certeine yeares, applying themselves verie diligentlie to performe the satisfaction of their offense, according to the maner prescribed to them by the pope, and so at length died.

This was the end of Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie, which was after he had entred into that se eight yeares and six moneths, in the yeare after the birth of our Lord 1171. On Christmas day before his death, which fell that yeare on the fridate, he preached a sermon to the people, and when he had made an end thereof, he accursed Wigell de Sack-tille, the violent incumbent of the church of Berghes, and Robert de Broc, both which had (vpon spite) curtailed the hofte of the said archbishop: and as the same day whilest he was at the altar, according to his custome, altogether in feares and lamentation; so at dinner he shewed himselfe verie pleasant & merrie, insonmuch that when those that were at the table seemed somewhat doubtfull to eat of the flesh that was set before them, because it was friday: Why doe ye abhorre flesh he to eat flesh: This day flesh hath a great privilege, for this same day the word was made flesh and came into light, and appeared vnto vs. These his words greatlie contented all the company.

¶ Thus you haue heard the tragicall discourse of ambitious Becket, a man of meane parentage, and yet through the princes fauour verie fortunate, if he had not abused the beneuolence of so gracious a soueraigne by his insolencie and presumption. Wherein we haue to note, how vnseemlic a thing it was for him being called to so sacred a function, to lead so secular and prophane a life, as if he had professed open hostility to the vocation which he pretended to honour and reuerence. We are also taught, that promotions attained by ambition are not permanent, and are so farre from procuring fame and renowne to the obtainers, that they turne them in the end to shame, infamie and reproch, after losse of life and effusion of blood. The issue of all which tragedie is to be imputed to the providence and counsell of almighty God, as one witteth verie agreeable to this purpose, saying,

*Nom. facile extollit facile elatūq; resanāt, Et clorū obscurans, obscuri nomen adanget.
Ergit & miserū facile extinguitque superbum Iuppiter alijhemus, cui celsū regis aethum.*

But to let this matter passe. King Henrie doubtlesse was right pensiue for his death, because he wist well enough that it would be iudged, that he himselfe was priuie to the thing: and euen so came it to passe, for immediatlie vpon notice giuen into France of the archbishops death, king Lewes, and Theobald the earle of Blois, as they that loued him most dearelie were most sorowfull for it, and iudging straightwaie that king Henrie was the procurer, they wrote their letters vnto pope Alexander, giuing him to vnderstand both of the slaughter, and how king Henrie had caused it to be put in execution, requiring most instantlie, that such an iniurie done to the Christian religion, might speedilie be punished. The pope was much offended, and determined to haue the matter throughlie considered and ordered, so as might stand with his dignitie, and accordinglie as the hainous state of the case required. King Henrie whilst these things were a doing, lay certain daies at Argenton, so much displeased in his mind, that he would suffer no man once to speake to him about any maner of business.

At length, he sent his ambassadours to Rome, partly to purge himselfe of the archbishops death, partly to excuse his fault, for that in his furie he had vttered words against the archbishop, which had giuen occasion to naughty men to contriue his death, & partly to requyre the pope to send his legats into England, to make inquirie both for the death of the archbishop, and also of the state of the clergie. The kings ambassadours found the pope at Anoli, and there were heard to declare their message: but little credit was giuen to their words, in so much that the pope plainelie told them, that he vnderstood the matter to be much otherwise than they had declared. Yet according to the kings request, he sent two of his cardinals into England, which vpon due examination, might vnderstand the truth of the matter thoroughlie as a pertained.

There be that wisse, that the king sent ambassadours twice vnto the pope, for the first that went, could not come to his presence, nor be suffered to declare their message: those that were sent the second time, were receiued of some of the cardinals, but yet onelie with words without any other way of friend-lie intertainment. At length, when the feast of Easter drew nere, on the which either absolution or communication was to be denounced against euery man, there were certeine of the cardinals which gaue intelligence to the English ambassadours, that the pope by aduice of the colledge, meant on the thursdaie before Easter daie to declare the sentence of interdiction against the king of England, and against all his dominions, and to confirme that which had bene already pronounced against Richard the archbishop of Yorke, and the other bishops his complices.

The ambassadours being brought to a streit issue herewith, by helpe of some of the cardinals found meanes to haue it put into the popes head, how the English ambassadours had commission to undertake, that the king of England should obvie in all things that order souerier pleased the pope and his court to award him. Herevpon they took their oath, that it should so be, and by that meanes they auoided the interdiction. The messengers of the archbishop of Yorke & the other bishops vied the like wiff, but yet the same daie the pope did excommunicate the knights that had murdered the archbishop Thomas, and all those that had procured, aided, succoured, or abetted them therein. Some wite, that those ambassadours which the king sent to the court of Rome, could not be suffered to come to the popes presence, till according to the fashion, they had giuen 500. marks in reward, and so at length were admitted to his presence.

Howsoeuer that matter passed, the king stood in great feare lest his land should be interdicted, in so much that he commanded the wardens of the ports both on this side the sea and beyond, to take good heed, least any coming with letters of interdiction should passe into England: but if any such came, that the bringer should be arrested and committed to prison. Also he commanded, that no cleerke were suffered to come ouer into England, except he first take an oath that he came about no businesse that might turne to the preiudice of the king or his realme. This commandement he set forth, at what time he transported ouer into England himselfe, where he landed this yeare at Portsmouth the third daie of August. About which time it came into the kings mind, to make a conquest of Ireland vpon this occasion.

It chanced, whereas diuerse rulers or as we may call them petty kings reigned the same season in that Island (which was diuided into seuerall estates or kingdoms) that continuall strife and dissention remained amongst them, so that oftentimes they made fore war after the manner of their countrie one against an other, (for

Herevpon it fortuned, that one of those kings or rulers, about the 14. yeare of this kings reigne, was fore afflicted and oppressed by his neighbours, wherevpon taking aduice what he might best do for remedie in that case, at length he sent his son into England to retaine souldiours and men of warre, and to bring them ouer vnto his aid in hope of gaine, & such commodities as he assured them of.

Now it came to passe, that by the assistance of such Englishmen as then came ouer, the foresaid Irish king began to recouer his losses, and in the end waxed so strong, that he subued all his enemies. When he had thus obtained the victorie, he did not onelie not send backe his aiders, but so liberallie retained them still with him, that they had no hast to returne home, but settled themselves in that countrie, where they liued a pleasant and verie licentious life. For this cause also the stoutest lords and rulers of the and Irish nation began sore to stomach the matter against him that had thus brought the English nation into their countrie, in so much that the Englishmen perceiving their malice, and therewithall having some feare of themselves, because of their small number, they sent over into England for such as wanted living, and were willing to seeke for it in other countries, of which sort, great numbers went over thither within a short space, whereby the multitude of the English greatly increased: but for as much as they had no ruler to governe them, they procured Richard Strangbow earle of Struguille, alias Chepstow in Wales to come over thither, and to receive the soueraine gouernement, with such honorable prouision for maintenance of his estate, as should seeme requisite.

¶ Some write, that this earle Richard (being also earle Marshall of England) for a rebellion moued against king Henrie, had before this time forfeited all his lands; but others affirme that through riot and more sumptuous port than his abilitie might beare, he had made awaie and consumed the most part of his living, and was run so far in debt, that he knew not how to satisfie his creditors, and therefore was he the readier to incline to their request, which made labour unto him to come over into Ireland to haue the gouernance of such English people, as had alreadye planted themselves there to inhabit & remaine. Hereupon he prepared a nauie, and assembled together a great number of such as lacked living, and shortly determined to passe over into Ireland. But even as he was ready to set forward, there came vnto him messengers from king Henrie, commanding him to staie, and not to take that iourne in hand. Howbeit the earle hauing nothing in England wherof to make any great accompt, notwithstanding the kings commandement, toke the sea, and passed over into that countrie, where he greatly delighted such Englishmen as dailye had looked for his repaire and coming thither.

Shortly after, joining those which he brought over with him, with the other that were there before his coming, he thought to worke some feat, whereby he might make his name famous, & cause the Irishmen to haue him in feare. Whereupon he first assaulted the citie of Dublin, and by force wain it. He likewise wain Waterford, & diuerse other townes nere vnto the sea side. Also to haue some friendship amongst those barbarous people, he married the daughter of the confederate king, and so grew into verie great estimation in that countrie and region.

Howbeit, with these and the like doings of the earle, king Henrie toke such displeasure (but chiefly for disobeying his commandment) that he confined him the realme, seized his lands as forfeited, and by proclamation restrained all his subjects from passing into Ireland with any kind of merchandize, prouision of vittells, or other commodities whatsoeuer. By reason whereof, earle Strangbow, partly by constraint, and partly in hope to returne into fauour with king Henrie, and for other respects as may be coniectured, aduertised him of the whole state of the countrie of Ireland, promising him, that if it would please his grace to come over thither, he would so worke that he should be admitted soueraine lord of all the land. Whereupon king Henrie pardoned him of all former trespasses, and restored vnto him all his lands and inheritances within England and Normandie: and further, confirmed to him such livings abroad in Ireland out of the walled townes, as he held alreadye in right of his wife: and furthermore ordeined, that he should be high steward of Ireland vnder him.

into England about the first day of August (as is aforesaid) caused a nauie of 400. ships to be made ready, and to assemble at Milford haue in Denboshshire, with all such prouision and furniture as was thought necessarie for such a iourne. Wherewith also he leuied a great armie both of horsemen and footmen, and came forward with the same vnto Denbosh, and so when all his prouision and ships were ready, he entered the sea at Milford haue aforesaid the sixteenth daie of October, and landed in Ireland, at a place called Crovach, not past seauen miles from Waterford the day next following, about nine of the clocke: and on the morrow after being S. Luke the euangelists day, he with all his armie marched forth to Waterford, where he found William Fitz Aldelm his sower, and Robert Fitz Bernard, with other whome he had sent thither before him for such purposes as he thought most convenient. He remained at Waterford sixtene daies, during which time, there came in vnto him the king of Conke, the king of Limerike, the king of Ossie, the king of Deeth, Keignald de Waterford, and diuerse other great princes of Ireland. At his first arrivall, the aforesaid earle Richard surrendered into his hands all those townes and places which he had subdued in that countrie.

Herewithall the whole land began to tremble, so that the rulers of townes and countries sent vnto him messengers, offering to become tributaries, and to deliuer hostages: for whilist euerie of those rulers which had the gouernment of Ireland in their hands, feared their owne estate, and mistrusted their owne powers, they all in maner submitted themselves, so that this victorie chanced to king Henrie, without the drawing forth of his sword, and in such wise, that he could not haue wished for better or more speedie successe therein. For whereas the whole land was diuided into sundrie dominions, and ruled by sundrie gouernours, not drawing all one waie, but through factions and contrarie studies one enuieing an others wealth (for nothing more hindred the fierce and vniuersal nation from making resistance, than in that they could not agree to take counsell together for defending of their liberties, and entier state of the commonwelth. Whereupon, whilist euerie of them apart by himselfe was in doubt to attempt the hazard of war against so mightie a king, they were all overcome, as were the Britons likewise in the time of Cesar and the Saxons. King Henrie therefore gladly receiued their humble submission, and they doing homage vnto him, swore to be his liege and faithfull subjects. Onelie Roderike gouernour of Connagh refused to submit himselfe.

This Roderike pretended to be the chiefe king of Ireland, and therefore kept continuall war with the other rulers, which was partly the cause wherefore they submitted themselves so sone vnto king Henrie. The said Roderike held that part of Ireland which lieth toward the west, being full of great and thicke woods, and defended with verie high & great mountaines, closed also with waters and marshes, so that it should be verie hard, and speciallie in the winter season, to bring an armie vnto it: which was the onelie cause whie king Henrie attempted nothing against Roderike at that time, but toke in hand to plant garisons of souldiers in places convenient to keepe the land in quiet, which he had wone alreadye, and to giue order for the gouernement of the whole estate of the countrie to his behoufe and commoditie. Whereupon going to Dublin, which is the chiefe citie of all Ireland, he assembled all the rulers and lords as well spirituall as temporall togither in counsell, consulting with them for the assurance of the dominion of the land to him and his heires for evermore.

The allegation of the Irishmen.

The Irishmen alleged for themselves, that his demerit therein could not be compassed, unless the popes authentic were therein first obtained: for they affirmed, that immediately upon receiving the christian faith, they did submit themselves, & all that they had, unto the see of Rome, so that they could not acknow- ledge any for their soueraine lord, but onelie the pope. Which opinion some of them, although baine- lie haue holden unto these our daies. King Henrie then understanding this matter, dispatched ambassa- dors to Rome, requiring of pope Alexander, that he would by his authoritie grant him licence to teine the countrie of Ireland unto the realme of En- gland, who went thither with all expedition accord- ing to their charge.

And certeinlie, these ambassadors whom the king sent now out of Ireland to Rome in this behalfe, re- turned with better speed in their message, than did the other whom he had sent to him out of Norman- die, to excuse him of the death of the archbishop Tho- mas. For the pope upon good advice taken in this matter considering that he had now no profit grow- ing to him by that Isle, and that the Irish people be- ing wild and rude, were far off from all good order of christianitie in diuerse points, thought it would be a meane to bring some gaine to his cofers, and the peo- ple more easilie from their naughty customes, if they were once made subiect unto some christian prince of puissance able to tame them, and constrain them by force to be more make and tractable. In con- sideration wherof, he was content to grant unto the king all that therein he required.

Caillul.

R. Houel.

The archdeacon of Landaf.

Hereupon, king Henrie considering in what re- spect the pope was so readie to accomplish his re- quest, called a counsell of the bishops to assemble at Caillul, where manie things were decreed and orde- ned for the reforming of diuerse customes used be- fore amongst the Irish men, and merelie repugnant to the lawes of the christian religion. There were also appointed as solicitors in these matters, and to sit as a iudicants with the Irish bishops, one of the kings chaplaines named Nicholas, and one Rafe the arch- deacon of Landaf.

1 Amongst other things there concluded, it was ordeined, that children shuld be brought to the church, there to receiue baptisme in faire water, with three dippings into the same, in the name of the father, the sonne, and the holie-ghost, and that by the priests hands, except in case where danger of death was fea- red, which then might be done by any other person, and in any other place.

2 Also it was ordeined, that tithes should be paid to churches, and that such laie men as would kepe wines, should kepe them according to the lawes of holie church, and not otherwise.

3 The Peter pence also that Adrian reserued in his bulls, sent to the king touching the same matter in the beginning of his reigne (with diuerse other things) were in like maner appointed to be paid, so that nothing was omitted that might pleasure the pope, or recouer his gracious fauour already lost in the matters of Thomas Becket, whereof you haue already heard. Thus you heare what successe our ambassadors had in this voiage. ¶ Now will I tell you per I proceed any further) what strange things did happen in England whilest the king was thus oc- cupied in Ireland, and within the compasse of that yeare, and first of all, in the night before Christmas day last passed, there chanced such a tempest of light- ning and thunder, that the like had not bin heard of, which tempest was not onelie generallie throughout all England, but also in other forreine parts were adioining, namelie in Ireland, where it continued all that night, and Christmas daie following, to so great terror of the people, that they looked for present death.

The same night at Andewer in Hamshire, a priest being in his praiers before the altar, was stricken with the tempest, so that he died per it was nine of the clocke in the morning. Also, a temporall man that was there the same time, was burned with the light- ning, and whereas his brother being present, ran to him to haue succoured him, he likewise was caught with the fire, and in like maner consumed. In Ire- land also, cuill diet in eating of fresh flesh and drink- ing of water, contrarie to the custome of the En- glishmen, brought the sir and other diseases in the kings armie, so that manie died thereof, for 20 Therefore, about the beginning of Lent, the king re- moued from Dublin, & went unto the cite of Uler- ford, where he remained till toward Casser, and then prepared to returne into England: but before he toke the sea, he gaue and by his charter confirmed to Hugh Lacie, all the lands of Meath, with the appurte- nances, to hold of him & his heires in fee by knights service, as to find him an hundred knights or men of armes (as we may terme them for evermore. He gaue also unto the same Hugh, the keeping of the ci- tie of Dublin, and made him cheefe iusticer of Ire- land. Unto Robert Fitz Bernard he committed the cities of Waterford, and Welleford, that he should keepe the same to his vse, and build in them castels, for a more sure defense against the enemies.

Thus when the king had planted garisons of sould- iers in those & other places also where was thought needfull, and further had giuen order for the politike gouernement of the whole countrie, so far as he had conquered; he first sent ouer his household seruants, which toke the water on Casser daie, and landed at Willeford, but he himselfe and other of the nobles staid there all that daie, by reason of the high solemn- itie of that feast: holmbrit the daie next after they toke the sea together, and landed nere to S. Dawids in South Wales, from whence (without delaie) he har- sed forth to Douer, and hauing his scone the young king with him, he sailed ouer into Normandie in the croffe weeke to meet the popes legats, whom he bin- derstood to be already come thither. At his meeting with them there, he gaue them verie good counte- nance, and right honorable entertainment, omit- ting nothing that might do them pleasure.

Here when the matter came to be discussed touch- ing the death of archbishop Thomas, because it could not be certeinlie tried out in whom the fault rested, much reasoning to and fro passed, about obie- ctions and excuses laid (as in doubtfull cases it of- ten happeneth) so that welnere the space of foure moneths was spent in debating of that matter. In which meane time, the king to avoid all contention and strife betwixt him and king Lewes, sent his son Henrie together with his wife ouer into England, there to receiue the crowne, and with them came Rotrod the archbishop of Rouen, Giles bishop of Eueux, Roger bishop of Worcester, and diuerse others.

Hereupon the young king being arrived in Eng- land, called an assemblee of the lords spirituall and temporall at Winchester, where both he and his sard wife Margaret daughter to the French king, was crowned with all solemnitie, by the hands of the said Rotrod archbishop of Rouen upon the twentieth one of August.

Reg. Houel.

In the meane time (saith one writer) his father king king Henrie might haue foresent and found means to haue auoided the discord, which euen now began to spring by betwixt him and his children, causing a sore and euill warre, if he had not bene a man that vertue did detest all superstitious admonitions. For being told (I wot not by whome) that if he did not repent, and take more regard to minister iustice, which is a vertue that containeth in it selfe all other vertues; it would come to passe, that within short time he should fall into great and manifold calamities.

A strange apparition.

In his returne also out of Ireland (saith an other) vpon the sundaie next after the feast of Easter, commonlie called Lotowundaie, as he should take his horse at Cardiffe in Wales, there appeared vnto him a man of pale and swanne colour, barekoted, and in a white kirtell, who bolbly in the Dutch language spake vnto him, and admonished him of amendment of life, and to haue regard that the sabbath daie (commonlie called the sundaie) might be more duely kept and obserued, so that no markets nor booke workes be holden, used, or done vpon that day within the bounds of his dominions, except that which appertaineth to dressing of meates. And if thou do (saith he) after this commandement, I assure thee that all things which thou dost enterprise of god intent and purpose, shall sort to god effect and verie luckie end.

But the king was not greatlie pleased with these words, and in French said to the knight that held his bible: Aske of this churle, whether he hath dreamed all this that he telleth or not. When the knight had expounded it in English, the man answered, Whether I haue dreamed it in my sleepe or not, take thou heed to my words, & marke what day this is: for if thou amend not thy life, and do as I haue aduertised thee, before a twelue moneth come to an end, thou shalt heare such tidings as will make thee sorrowfull all the daies of thy life after. The man hauing thus spoken, vanished awaie suddenly, and the king toke his words but in sport: howbeit he wondered that he was so suddenly gone, as he did likewise at his sudden appearing. Manie other warnings the king had (saith mine author) but he set little thereby.

The second warning he receiued of an Irishman, that told him of tokens verie priuie. The third time a knight of Lindsey called Philip de Chesserby, passing the sea, came to the king into Normandie, and there declared vnto him seauen articles, which he should amend, which if he did, then he should reigne seauen yeares in great honor, and subdue Gods enemies. If he did not amend and redresse those points, then should he come to death with dishonour in the fourth yeare.

1 The first article or point was, that he should seeke to mainteine holie church.

2 The second, that he should cause rightfull lawes to be executed.

3 The third, that he should condemne no man without lawfull processe.

4 The fourth, that he should restore the lands, goods and heritages to those rightfull owners from whome he had taken them by any wrong or vnlawfull means.

5 The fifth, that he should cause euerie man to haue right, without buying and giuing of mee.

6 The sixt, that he should paie his debts as well due to any of his subiects, for any stufte taken vp of them to his vse, as to his seruants and souldiers, who because they could not haue their wages truelie paid them, fell to robbing and spoiling of true labouring men.

7 The seauenth and last article was, that he should cause the felues to be auoided out of the land, by whom the people were sore murthered with such unmercifull vsurie as they exercised.

The king (notwithstanding these and other like warnings) toke no regard to the amendment of his sinfull life, wherevpon (as is thought) the troubles which ensued did light vpon him by Gods iust appointment.

¶ Howsoeuer this may seeme a fable, but no written veritie, & therefore esteemed as the chaffe of summer flowers; yet as in the tales of Aesop many good moralls are compisid, so the scope whereto this apparition tendeth being necessarie, maketh the argument it selfe of the more authoritie. The end therefore being (as you see) to reuoke the king from worse to better, from the swines-she of vice to the statelie throne of vertue, from the kennell of sinne to the riuers of sanctitie, proueth that euen verie fictions of poets (though of light credit) haue their dritt manie times to honest purpose, and therefore bring with them a competent weight of profit to the readers. So the scope of this tale being the same that David pointeth at in the second psalme, when he saith,

Et ins ab alta sede plebi dicitis, Errorum tenebras depellite, discite verum, &c.)

Ex. G. Buch. paraph. in psal. 2.

maketh the narration it selfe (though other wise seeming more fabulous) to be somewhat authentical. But to returne to the course of our storie, and now to saie somewhat of this Henrie the seconds sonne the young king, by whom the troubles were moued, (note you this) that after he had receiued the crowne together with his said wife, they both passed the seas incontinentlie backe againe into Normandie, where on the seauen and twentieth of September, at a generall assemblee holden within the city of Auranches in the church of the apostle S. Andrew, king Henrie the father, before the cardinals the popes legats, and a great number of bishops and other people, made his purgation, in receiuing an oth vpon the holie reliques of the saints, and vpon the sacred euangelists, that he neither willed, nor commanded the archbishop Thomas to be murdered, and that when he heard of it, he was sorie for it. But because he could not apprehend them that slue the archbishop, and for that he feared in his conscience least they had executed that vnlawfull act vpon a presumptuous boldnesse, because they had perceiued him to be offended with the archbishop, he sware to make satisfaction (for giuing such occasion) in this manner.

2 Item, that he would neither impeach appeals, nor suffer them to be impeached, but that they might freely be made within the realme vnto the pope, in causes ecclesiasticall; yet so, that if the king haue the parties suspected, they shall find him suerties that they shall not procure harme or hinderance whatsoeuer to him or to his realme.

3 Item, that within three yeares after the natiuitie of our lord next ensuing, he should take vpon him the crosse, and personallie passe to the holie land, except pope Alexander or his successours toke other order with him.

5 Item, he bound himselfe in the meane time by his oth, to emploie so much monie as the templers should thinke sufficient for the finding of two hundred knights or men of armes, for one yeares tennie in the defense of the holie land.

6 Item, he remitted his wrath conceiued against those those which were inuile for the archbishop Thomas his cause, so that they might returne againe into the realme.

7 Item, to restore all the lands and possessions which had bene taken awaie from the see of Canturburie, as they were belonging thereto in the pere before the departure of the archbishop Thomas out of England.

8 Item, he swaie to take awaie and abolish all these customes, which in his time had bene brought in against the church, as prejudiciall thereto.

All these articles faithfullie, and without maleingene to performe and fulfill in euerie degre, he receiued a solenne oth, and caused his sonne the yong king being there present, to receiue the same for performance of all those articles, such as touched his owne person onelic excepted. And to the intent the same should remaine in the popes consistorie as matter of record, he put his scale vnto the writing wherein the same articles were ingrossed, together with the scales of the aboue mentioned cardinals.

Shortlie after king Henrie the father suffered the yong king his son to go into France, together with his wife, to visit his father king Lewes, according as their deputies required, which iourneie verelie bred the cause of the dissention that followed betwixt him and his father. King Lewes most louinglie refused them (as reason was) and caused diuers kinds of triumphant plaies and pastimes to be shewed for the honour and delectation of his sonne in law and daughter.

The French king seeketh to sow sedition betwixt the father and the sonne.

Nevertheless, whilst this yong prince sojourned in France, king Lewes not hartilie fauouring the king of England, and therewithall perceiving the rash and headstrong disposition of the yong king did first of all inuegle him to consider of his estate, and to remember that he was now a king equall vnto his father, and therefore aduised him so shortlie as he could, to get the entire gouernment out of his fathers hands: wherevnto he furthermore promised all the aid that laie in him to performe.

The yong king being readie enough not onelic to worke vnquietnesse, but also to follow his father in lawes counsell (as he that was apt of nature to aspire to the sole gouernment, and loth to haue any partener in authoritie) according to that of the tragedie-writer, and namelye such one as might controll him) was the more encouraged thereto by a number of prodigall currie fauours, who by flatterie set him aloft, declaring vnto him that he was borne to rule, and not to obeye, and therefore it became not his highnesse to reigne by the appointment of an other, but rather to haue the gouernment free in his owne hands, that he might not be counted prince by permission. Whereupon the youthfull courage of the yong king being tickled, began to wax of a contrarie mind to his father: who suspecting indeed that which chanced; to wit (least his sonnes yong yeares not able yet to discern good and wholesome counsell from euill, might easilie be infected with some sinister practise) thought it not good to suffer him to be long absent from him, and therefore sent for him: who taking leaue of his father in law king Lewes in courteous manner, returned and came to his father king Henrie into Normandie, who when the feast of Christmas drew nere, repaired towards Anion, where in the towne of Chinon, he solemnized that feast, hauing left his sonne the yong king and his wife all that while in Normandie: but sending for him after the feast was ended, they went both into Aubergne, where being at mount Ferrat, Hubert earle of Poitou came vnto them, bringing with him his eldest daughter Alice, whom king Henrie the father bought of him for the summe of five thousand markes, that he might bestow hir in mariage vpon his yongest sonne John with the heritage of the countie of Poitouenne, if his father died without other issue, or at the leastwise the said Hubert chanced to haue any sonne lawfullie begotten, that then he should leaue vnto them and to their heires the countie of Ruffellon, the countie of Belle, as he then had and held the same, Pierre castle with the appurtenances, the ballie of Poullelle, also Chambrie with the appurtenances, Aiz, Alpermont, Rochet, mont Paga, and Chambres, with Burg, all which lieng on this side the mountaines with their appurtenances, the said Hubert granted to them immediatlie for euer. And beyond the mountaines he couenanted to giue vnto them Turine with the appurtenances, the colledge of Canuozeth with the appurtenances, and all the fees which the earles of Canaues held of him, together with the fealties and seruices. And also, the fees, fealties, and seruices which belonged to him in the countie of Amund, and in the ballie called Vale Dosta; and in like manner, the towne of Castellone.

Comitatus bellensis.

All the forenamed places the said earle gaue and granted to the said John, sonne to the king of England for euermore, with his daughter, so free, whole and quietlie (in men and cities, castels, fortresses, or other places of defense, in medowes, leaschies, milnes, woods, plaines, waters, ballies and mountaines, in customes and all other things) as euer he or his father had held or enioied the same. And furthermore, the said earle would, that immediatlie (when it pleased the king of England) his people should doe homage and fealtie to the king of Englands sonne, reseruing the fealtie due to him so long as he liued. Moreover, the said earle Hubert granted to the said John and his wife all the right that he had in the countie of Cranople, and whatsoeuer might be got and euided in the same countie. It was also couenanted, if the elder daughter died, that then the said John should marrie the yonger daughter, and enioy all the like portions and parts of inheritance as he should haue enioied with the first.

Finallie, that these couenants, grants and agreements should be performed on the part and behalfe of the said earle Hubert, both he, the said earle, and the erle of Geneua, and in maner all the great lords and barons of those countreies receiued an oth, and undertooke to come and offer themselves as hostages to remaine with the king of England, in case the said earle Hubert failed in performance of any of the aforesaid articles, till he framed himselfe to satisfie the kings pleasure in such behalfe.

Furthermore, Peter the reuerend archbishop of Arensalia, and Arduene the bishop of Geneua, and also William the bishop of Poitouenne, with the abbat of S. Michell promised vpon their oth to be readie at the appointment of the king of England, to put vnder the censures of the church the said earle and his lands, refusing to performe the foresaid couenants, and so to keepe him and the same lands bound, till he had satisfied the king of England therein.

William earle of Handeuill, and William earle of Arundell swaie on the part of king Henrie, that he should performe the articles, couenants and agreements on his part, as first to make paiement immediatlie vnto the said Hubert of one thousand markes, and as soone as he should receiue his daughter, he should pay him an other thousand markes at the least, and the residue then remaining of the said sum of five thousand markes, should be paid when the marriage was consummate.

The earles of Handeuille and Arundell.

It was provided also, that the said earle Hubert might marrie his yonger daughter where he would, with without any great diminishing of the earledome after the first marriage consummate with the lord John, the king of Englands sonne. And that if either the said lord John, or his affianced wife chanced to die before the consummation of the marriage, then should the monie which the earle had receiued, be repaid to the king, or bestowed as the king should appoint.

Shortlie after that the parties were agreed vpon the couenants afore cited, the marques of Montferrat & one Gessrey de Blozac with his sonne Miles and other noble men came to the king as ambassadors from the earle of Poixenne, and receiued an oth, that they should see and procure the said earle to performe the couenants and agreements concluded betwixt the king and him. When these things were thus ordered, as seemed good to both parties, for the establishment of the foresaid marriage, the king the father, and the king the sonne remoued to Limoges, whither the earle of S. Giles came, and was there accorded with king Henrie and his sonne Richard duke of Guen, concerning the controuersie that had bene moued for the countie of Tholouze, doing his homage as well vnto the father as to the sonne for the same countie, and further couenanted to serue them with an hundred knights or men of armes (as we may call them) for the terme of fourtie daies at all times, vpon lawfull summons. And if the king or his sonne duke Richard would haue his seruice longer time after the fourtie daies were expired, they should paie wages both to him and his men in reasonable maner. Moreover, the said earle condescended & agreed to giue yearelie for Tholouze an hundred marks, or else 10. horses with 10. marks a peece. Now also, whilst the king sojourned at Limoges, the earle of Poixenne came thither to him, and required to vnderstand what parcels of land he would assigne vnto his sonne John. Whereupon the king resolved to allot vnto him the chappell of Chiron, Lodon and Mirabell, whereby he offended his eldest sonne the young king (as after may appeare) who was glad to haue occasion (whome the poets saie to be bald behind and hairie before, as this monastich insinuateth, offered to broch his conceited purpose of rebellion which of late he had imagined, and now began to put in practise, vntill the opportunitie of the time and the state or qualitie of the quarrell then taken for his best advantage, and meaning to make it an ingredience or entrance to the malicious conceit which he had kept secret in his hart.

This peece the monks of Canturburie (by the kings assent) chose for their archbishop one Richard, who before was prior of Dover, this man was the 39. in number that had ruled the church of Canturburie, being of an euill life, as he well shewed, in that he waisted the goods of the church inordinatlie. Roger the abbat of Bechellon was first chosen, but he refused that dignitie rather for slothfulness and idleness (as some take it) than for modestie or wisdom: so hard a thing it is to please the people, which measure all things to be honest or dishonest, as they be or flow in profit and gain.

The said Richard, after that he was elected, did homage vnto king Henrie, and sware fealtie vnto him (Solito semper ordine suo, His order alwaies saued) without making mention of the customes of the kingdome. This was done at Westminster in the chappell of S. Katharine, the kings iusticer giuing his assent thereto, where a counsell was held the same time, and a letter of the popes read there before the bishops and barons of the realme, containing amongst other things this that followeth.

Edmonish you all, & by the authoritie which we reteine, doo streightlie charge you, that you celebrat the daie of the suffering of the blessed man Thomas the glorious martyr, sometime archbishop of Canturburie, euerie yere in most solemn sort, & that with deuout praiers ye endeavour your selues to purchase forgiveness of sins; that he which for Christes sake suffered banishment in this life, and martyrdom in death by constancie of vertue, through continuall supplication of faithfull people, may make intercession for you vnto God.

The tenor of these letters were scarceie read, but euerie man with a loud voice began to recite this psalme or hymne, Te Deum laudamus. Furthermore because his suffragans had not exhibited due reuerence to him their father, either in time of his banishment, or at his returne from the same, but rather persecuted him; that they might openlie confesse their errour and wickednesse to all men, they made this collect: Be fauourable good Lord to our supplication and praier, that we which acknowledge our selues guiltie of iniquitie, may be deliuered by the intercession of Thomas thy blessed martyr and bishop, Amen.

This praier was vsed by the couent of S. Albons on the daie of his martyrdom. Thus Notwithstanding all which honour of the pope then exhibited to his saint, as his canonization, with other solemnities procured for the maintenance of his memorie in all ages succeeding; what remembrance is there now of Thomas Becket? Where be the shynes that were erected in this church and that chappell for perpetuities of his name and fame? Are they not all defaced? are they not all ruined? are they not all conuerted to powder and dust? And although the pope ment by causing such tokens to be erected, to prefer Thomas as a perpetuall saint to all posterities, and thought as he that said of his poems, was disappointed by letters that came from king Henrie the sonne, in forme as followeth.

A letter of yong king Henrie touching the disappointment of archbishop Richards consecration.

Henrie by the grace of God king of England, duke of Normandie, and earle of Aniou, sonne of king Henrie; to our deere and faithfull freend Odo, prior of the church of Canturburie, and to all the conuent there, sendeth greeting. By the assured report of some we vnderstand, that in your church and in other churches also, my father goeth about to institute certain persons not verie meet for such calling: and bicause (without our consent) it ought not so to be doone, who by reason of our kinglie annointing haue taken vpon vs the kingdome and charge of the whole realme: herypon we haue in the presence of many persons appealed to the see of Rome, and haue signified our appeale in that behalfe, made vnto our reuerend fathers and freends Albert and Theodorike, cardinals and legats of the apostolike see, by our writing and messenger, who like wise and discreet personages haue assented therevnto. We haue likewise signified the same our appeale to our faithfull freends the bishops of London, Exce-ster, and Worcester, and as we haue appealed, so likewise we doo appeale vnder your testimonic.

After the perusal of this letter, and the due consideration of the substance and summe of the same, (albeit no such afterclaps were suspected before) the bishops were altogether diuident to their thits, some of them desiring to go forward with the consecration, and some supposing it better to yeld vnto the appeale. The elect archbishop therefore first sent messengers to Rome with letters, not written onelie by himselfe, but also by all the bishops and conuent of Canturburie. After this he followed himselfe in person, and coming to the popes court, found there diuers aduersaries to his cause. For some were there that toke part with the king the father, and some with the king the sonne, and so his businesse could haue no speedie dispatch. In the meane time the ran-our which king Henrie the sonne had conceived against his father was so ripened, that it could not but burst out, and shew it selfe to the breach of all dutifull obedience which nature requirerth of a sonne towards his father.

You haue heard how king Henrie promised the earle of Spotiennne, when the marriage was concluded betwixt his son John and the said earles daughter, to giue vnto the said John certaine townes in Normandie, for the better mainteining of his estate and his wiues. This gift of the fathers caused his eldest sonne the yong king Henrie, the soner to poyze out his poison which he had suckt before at his being with his father in law king Lewes. For conceiuing an offense, that his father should giue away any portion of his inheritance, he would not condescend to any such gifts, but alledged that sithens he was king of England, and that all belonged to him, his father could not now haue any title to giue awaie that which did in no wise appertene vnto him.

There was another cause that troubled his mind also, and moued him to grudge at his father, which was; for that the proportion of his allowance for maintenance of his household and port was verie sleender, and yet more slenderlie paid. Also his father remoued from him certaine of his seruants, as Altulle de S. Hilarie, and other whome he suspected to giue him euill counsell. Wherefore those that were procurers of him to attempt the seizing of the gouernement into his hands, vpon this occasion slept not, but put into his head such matter, that at length he openlie demanded to haue the whole rule committed to him: which when he saw would not be obtained of his father by quiet meanes, he fled secretlie awaie vnto his father in law king Lewes, requiring aid of him to recouer his right, which king Henrie the elder vniuillie detained from him.

The French king comforted him, and bad him be of god cheare, for he ment to do for him all that in him laie. Herewith he proclaimed him duke of Normandie, and receiued homage of him for the same.
King Henrie the father vnderstanding that his sonne was thus fled to the French king, sent ambassadors forthwith to the same king, requiring him to giue his son some good & wholesome counsell, that he might repent, and not follow such wilfulnesse of mind in swaruing from his fathers frendship, but rather with speed to returne home againe; & to promise in his name, that if any thing were otherwise than well, he would be contented the same should be reformed by his order and correction. But so farre was king Lewes from meaning to set a quietnesse betwixt the father and the sonne, that he would not heare the ambassadors declare their message, bicause they named the father, king, to the derogation of the sonnes right, to whome he said he offered manifest hysong in vsurping the gouernement, which he had already giuen ouer and resigned. Insomuch that when the ambassadors had declared some part of their message, he asked them what he was that willed such things of him: and when they answered that the king of England had sent them with that message, That is a false lie (saith he) behold here is the king of England, who hath giuen you no commission to declare any message from him vnto me at all.

¶ Here we see Philautie or selfe-loue, which rageth in men so preposterouslie, that euen naturall dutie and affection quite forgotten, they vnder take what mis-chiefe soeuer cometh next to hand, without exception of place or person; and all for the maintenance of statelie titles, of lostie stiles, of honorable names, and such like vanities more light than thistle-downe that flieth in the aire. A vice that hath bene noted to reigne in all ages, among all pères and people of all nations, both at home and abroad, as one verie well noteth and giueth his verdict therevpon, saieing, *proh dy, nunc nomina tantum

King Henrie the father perceiuing hereby that warres would follow, prepared the best he could for his owne defense: but he was in great doubt on e-uerie side, not knowing whome he might trust. And to increase this mischiefe, his wife queene Elianor studied to mainteine the strife betwixt hir sonnes.
The yong king then getting an armie together entered into Guien.

King Henrie was not hasty to go against him, but sought rather with gentlenesse and all courteous meanes to reconcile him: insomuch that whereas diuers graue personages being of the yong kings counsell, and doubting to runne into the displeasure of his father, revolted from the sonne to the father, and brought with them the sonnes scale, which he used in sealing of letters. Howbeit, the father received them not, but sent them backe againe to his sonne, commanding them to continue faithfull in serving him as he should appoint them, and herewith he sent ambassadours vnto his sonne to entreate with him of peace and concord.

Now whilst the father went about to asswage the sonnes displeasure, the mother quene Glanor did what she could to picke him forward in his disobedient attempts. For she being enraged against his husband because he kept sundrie concubines, and therefore delited the lesse in his companie, cared not what mischief she procured against him. Hereupon she made his complaint so greivouslie vnto his sons Richard and Geoffrey, that they iolned with their brother against their father, & came to him into Gtuen, to aid him to the uttermost of their powers.

This may well seeme to be brought vpon the king as a plague of his incontinent, vnchaste and libidinous life; who hauing Chara coniugij pignora, a notable motiue to kinde and continue honest loue in wedlocke, did notwithstanding most inordinatlie abandon his bodie to beaustie and vnlawfull companie keeping with strange flesh. Note here how God stirreth by the wife of his owne bosome, & the sonnes descending of his owne loines to be thornes in his eyes and godes in his sides for profaning so diuine and holie an ordinance; which the verie pagans did so honour and reuerence, that they did not onlie giue precepts touching the due obseruation thereof, but denounced vnboubted vengeance for the violation of the same, as appeareth in this old testimonie, Heliod. in lib. viii. tit. op. & di.

Patrat & ingreditur quicquid cubilia fratris Proxorem maculans, & sancta cubilia supro, Hunc pater ipse deum Saturnius odit, & ipse Hunc male dixit vexant, &c.

But we will remit this to the readers consideration, and note the issue of this mischief now broched. The young king resoluing that he had his brethren thus on his side, readie to take his part, became more stout than before, and for answer vnto the messengers that came to him from his father, he declared that if his father would deliuer by the whole government into his hands, he would be content to breake by his armie. As for such souldiers as would willingly take his part in this quarell, he caused them to sweare that they should faithfullie serue him against his aduersaries: and those that had rather serue on the other side, he licenced them freely to depart and go to his father.

King Henrie the father receiuing such a rebellious answer from his sonne, much lamented the matter, and so much the more, for that he saw there was no remedie, but to haue the controuersie decided by the sword. Therefore least he should be taken vnprovided, he kept his armie in a readinesse about him, hauing retained certein bands of Wabanders called the Howlers.

The lords that took part with his sonne, being aduertised by espials of the doings of the father, and hearing that he was readie (if he were constrained) to defend himselfe by battell, and yet willing to receiue his sons into his fauour againe, if they would be reformed, they took great care how to cause his sons to persist in their enterprise, till the father were compelled by force to resigne the government vnto them. But none more than the French king courted to maintaine the discord, till it might be ended by force of armes: and therefore sent vnto King Henrie the sonne, willing him to come to Paris, where he caused a counsell to be called, & there made a league betwixt the said Henrie and himselfe, with William king of Scotland, Hugh earle of Chester, William Patrike the elder, the three sons of Robert earle of Wellent, whose castles King Henrie the elder had in possession, Roger Mombay, Hugh Wigot, and diuerse other complices of the conspiracie, Flabella seditionum, that took part with Henrie the sonne.

Here after they had consulted of the maner how to maintaine warre, because they would assure the young king that they ment not to forsake him, first King Leues, and after all the residue took an oth to aid him with men and monie, till his father should either be driuen out of his kingdome, or brought to agree with him at his will and pleasure. On the other part, he swore neuer to conclude any peace with his father without their consent and good will. He also promised vpon his oth to giue, & by his charter vnder his seale he confirmed vnto Philip earle of Flanders (for his homage) a thousand pounds of yearelie reuenues in England, and the countie of Kent, with the castles of Douer and Rochester. And to Mathew earle of Bullongne (for his homage) he likewise promised and confirmed the Soke of Kirketon in Lindsey, and the earldome of Poxtoun, with the honour of Hef. Also to Theobald earle of Blois (for his homage) he gaue and granted five hundred marks of yearelie reuenue in Anion with the castill of Ambois, and all that which he claimed as his right within the countie of Touraine, and surrendered to him all the right which he and his father claimed and demanded to haue in Chateau Reignold. To the King of Scots (for his assistance) he gaue and granted all Northumberland as far as the riuer of Tyne. And to his brother Dauid (to haue his seruice) he granted the counties of Huntington and Cambridge. To Hugh Wigot (for his seruice) he gaue the castill of Poxtowich. All these gifts and grants (with diuerse other to other persons) promised & granted, he confirmed with his new seale, which the king of France had caused him to make. These things being thus ordered at Paris, euery man resorted to his charge, that he might prouide for the warre with all speed conuenient.

King Henrie the father aduertised of this new league of the conspirators against him, was in great perplexitie of mind, for that he saw himselfe in danger, not onelie of outward enemies, but also of his owne subiects at home. Yet because the winter season was already at hand, taking awaie all conuenient occasions of attempting any great exploit by war for that time, he was in hope to compasse some agreement with his sons per the spring of the yeare should returne, and therefore he made not so great prouision for his defense, as had bene necessarie in so dangerous a case. But the Frenchmen, who were bent to set forward this war with all diligence, were readie in the field immediatlie vpon the coming of the spring with King Henrie the sonne, and euen at one instant made their inuasions vpon the lands of King Henrie the father in three severall parties; namelie, in Normandie, Gtuen, and Britaine, which (against the will of his sonne Geoffrey duke thereof) King Henrie the father did hold and retaine in his owne hands. The Frenchmen thus inuading the foresaid countries, did much hurt with robbing and spoiling, and also took diuerse castles and townes.

Whereouer, about the same time, William king of Scotland entred with a great power, first into Cumberland, and besieged Carlisle: but hearing that an armie was prepared against him in the south parties of the realme, and readie to set forward, he raised his siege, and entred into Northumberland, (which prouince King Henrie the sonne had giuen him in the last assemblee holden at Paris) endeavouring to bring it into his possession. But the more earnestlie he went about to enforce the people to his will, the more wislie did they withstand his purpose, hating him him so much, that in no condition they were willing to come under his rule, whereby the Scots were put backe and repelled, and that to their great losse. The kings power also comming into the countrie followed them, and passing ouer the water of Tweed, which diuided them (as it doth at this daie) the two realmes, made the like spoile in the land of the enemies, as they had made in the countries of Northumberland and Cumberland.

Uernueil besieged.

Reloued.
Hugh Beauchampe.

But in Normandie, whilst others in other places, made their hand in fetching preies and booties out of the enemies countrie, king Lewes besieged Uernueil, which towne being strong of it selfe, Hugh Beauchampe and others that had charge thereof valiantly defended, so that the French king was a moneth before it, yet he could win arie part thereof. This towne of Uernueil was in those daies diuided into three portions, beside the castell, euerie of them a part from other with mightie wals and deepe ditches full of water. One of these parts was called the great Burrow without the wals, where the French king had pitcht his field & planted his engines. About a moneth after whose coming thither, vittels began to faile them within, so that at length they required a truce onlie for three daies, & if no succour came within those three daies, they promised to yeeld that part of the towne called the great Burrow, & the peremptorie daie was the bigill or seue of S. Laurence. Hereupon were hostages deliuered by the burgeses unto the French king. Now it was agreed that if they yeelded the towne at the daie appointed for want of succour, king Henrie the son, and Robert the French kings brother, with the earls of Trois & Blois, Henrie and Theobald, and William archbish. of Sens, undertooke upon their othes that the hostages should then be restored free & without any hurt or damage.

The French king requireth to talke.

King Henrie being certified from them within of the composition thus made, was driuen to a verie hard shift: for he doubted nothing lesse than that any such thing should haue chanced. Yet considering with himselfe, that the saving of the towne stood in his speedie comming to the rescue, he hastied thither without any staie, and came to the place the daie before the third and last daie of the truce. King Lewes perceiving him to be come, doubting least he should lose the preie which he looked for, sent unto the king, and required that he might common with him on the next daie, touching some means of agreement to be had betwixt him and his sons. This did he of policie, to feed him with hope of some end to be made in the troubles betwixt him and his sons, till he had gotten possession of the towne.

Reg. Houed.

The ninth of August being Thursdaye last; K. Houed. king Lewes firste awoke in the night.
Prob. Mo.

Now as he forsooke that matter, euen so it came to passe, for whilst a great pece of the next daie was spent in feined talke about an agreement; K. Lewes appointed a great part of his host to close the towne about, and to declare unto them within, that king Henrie was put to flight; which talke they within Uernueil beleauing, yeelded the towne & themselves to the French men. Some after, king Lewes mistrusting least he should not be able to keepe it, set it on fire, and so burnt it, contrarie to the composition betwixt him and them agreed and concluded upon. He kept also the souldiers that had yeelded it into his hands, together with the hostages as prisoners, and doubting to cope with his enimie, went awaie in the night with as still noise as was possible. Which euill dealing had not inuaded his hart, but that euill meaning had possessed it before, euen at the composition making; but he neuer learned that,

Idem qui perdit nihil potest ultra perdere.

King Henrie at length perceiving the fraud, sent certaine bands of his horsemen after to pursue the enimie: but for that king Lewes was already got ten into the inner parts of his owne countrie, those which were sent, turned upon those that were left in the hindermost ward, of whom they slue a great number both horsemen and footmen.

K. Henrie following his men, came to Uernueil, and staing there that night, took order for the repairing and new fortifying of the towne. On the morrow after he went to the castell of Danuile, and lian it, taking diuerse knights and yeomen within it: this castell belonged to one Gilbert de Tileres. And thus it came to passe touching the attempt of the French king for the winning of Uernueil, as in some authors we find reported. Other wise otherwise of the mater, as thus, the French K. being summoned by K. Henrie the father, either to depart from the siege of Uernueil, or to loke for battell; hearing also that in performance of the message K. Henrie approached with his power, he sent a bishop & an abbat unto him to vnderstand if he meant to giue battell in deed. The messengers met king Henrie as he was aduanced before his host upon some occasion, with a small companie about him, unto whom they declared that their maister the French king required to be assured whether he should haue battell or no. King Henrie armed as he was, with fierce countenance and dreadfull voice made this short answer; Get you hence, and tell your king that I am here at hand. The messengers returning to their maister, declared what they had sene and heard. Whereupon (without longer staie) he raised his field, and with a gallant and mightie armie departed home to his great dishonour, not winning the towne at all, as by the same author it should appere.

About the same time the earle of Flanders, one of the confederats besieged the towne of Albe marie, and the earle thereof within it, which earle was thought to betraie the towne, because it was so easilie wonne, and both he himselfe, and those which king Henrie the father had sent thither to defend the towne were taken prisoners. Diuerse other places which belonged to the same earle were also immediately deliuered into the enemies hands, which increased the suspicion.

After this towne of Bebecastell (otherwise called Drincourt) in those frontiers was besieged, and finally wonne by surrender, by the said earle of Flanders, who reioiced nothing at the gaine of that towne: for his brother Matthew the earle of Bullongne who should haue bene his heire, was shot into the knee with an arrow, as he approached to the wals, and died of the hurt within a few daies after. The earle of Flanders was so penfise for his brothers death, that he brake vp his iournie and returned, blaming his euill hap and follie in that he had attempted war against his cosen germane king Henrie, who neuer had harmed him, but rather had done him manie great and singular pleasures from time to time.

God cause had the earle to giue over the prosecuting of violence against his souereigne, being dauonted with so heauie a chance, & griped also with the grudge of conscience, in so unkindlie rewarding his wellwiller, at whose hands he confessed himselfe to haue receiued manie a benefit. Wherein we are to note, that ingratitude neuer hurteth arie so much as him or them in whom it is needed. And hereio alldoth the comedie-writer, when he saith verie neatly, morem hunc homines habent, quod sibi volunt Dum id impetrant, boni sunt: sed id ubi iam penes se habent, Ex bonis pessimi & fraudulentissimi sunt.

Moreover Henrie the elder (after the iournie of Uernueil ended) came backe to Rouen, and there vnderstanding that Hugh earle of Chester, and Rafe de Foulgiere, men of singular prowesse (who long before were ruolted to his sonne Henrie) had taken the the castell of Dole in Britaine, and there making warre, brought all the countrie into trouble, he sent forth strenghties certeine of his capitaines with the Wabanders to aid his people in those parts who on the twentieth day of August (being monday) encountering with the enimies, discomfited them in battell, take seauentene knights, besides diuers others both horsemen and footmen, slue aboute fiftene hundred of the enimies being Britaines, and pursuing the residue, entered the towne which they wan, and drave their aduersaries into the castell, where they besieged them, and with all speed aduertised the king of that enterpryse, who immediatly with all possible had came thither, applying his whole diligence to win the place, that he might haue them with inre within the same at his commandement.

To be that, it was not long per he had his desire, for being such a multitude, that they were not able long to continue within so streted a roome, for want of bittell they fell to a composition, yielding the castell unto the king, their lodies liues and lims saued, on the 25. day of August. There were taken within this castell 80. knights, besides peomen and other common souldiers. In like maner, and with the semblable god fortune, about the same time, his capitains in England ouercame his enimies: for whereas Robert earle of Leicester that toke part with king Henrie the sonne, had assembled at the towne of Leicester a great host of men, in purpose to set upon Reigolds earle of Cornewall and Richard Lucie captiues on the side of king Henrie the father: they tendering his meaning, marched straight towards Leicester, and by the way met with their enimie earle Robert, whom they so fiercely assailed, that they put him to flight, and after approaching the towne, had it surrendered unto them, permitting the inhabitants to depart with bag and baggage, and then burned the towne: but the castell (which in those daies was of great strength by reason of the situation) they could not win.

Wherwith some write, that by undermining, the walles of the towne were subuerted and throwne downe, so that the towne was entered by force, although they within withdrew themselves into the castell and other strong houses, which they defended for a time, till at length they surrendered all, one parcell of the castell excepted, for the which by composition they paid by way of a fine the sum of three hundred pounds to the use of R. Henrie the father. The siege began the seauenth day of Iulie, and on the 28. day of the same moneth the armie departed from thence, a truce being granted to those that still defended a certeine tower of the castell into the which they were withdrawne.

William also the Scottis king, with an armie of horse and Collovainmen invaded Northumberland and passing by the confines of the bishopricke of Durham did much hurt by slaughter, burning and spoiling the countrie. Neuerthelesse, hearing of cosider raised by the English lords in those parts to resist him, he withdrew into his countrie. The English armie following him, wasted the countrie of Scotland, till at length by mediation of certeine religious men, a truce was granted to the Scots to endure till the feast of S. Vilarie. For the which truce hapilie some rewards went betwixt, and so the English lords with spoiles and gaires returned homeward.

A few daies after these luckie chancies thus happening to king Henrie, king Leices perceiuing fortune to be on that side, determined to assaie whether he could obtaine his purpose by some means of treating or at the least putting Henrie in hope of a peace for a time, knowing that he would rather suffer all discommodities whatsoever, than once to trie the matter by battell with his sonnes: wherefore he offered to come to a communication with him betwixt Gisors and Etrie, shewing bread in the one hand (as they say) and hiding a stone in the other.

King Henrie was easilie intreated to heare of a nie talke for peace, and therefore coming to the place on tuesday the fiftenth daie of September, made so large offers, that he had almost conuered the pong mens minds vnto concord. First he offered to his sonne Henrie the yong king, the moitie of one halfe of all the reuenues belonging to the demaines of the crowne within England, and foure conuenient castels within the same. And if his sonne had rather remaine in Normandie, he offered the halfe of all the reuenues of that dutchie, with all the rents and profits that were his fathers pertaining to the earldome of Anjou, with certeine castels in Normandie, one castell in Anjou, one in Maine, and one in Tozaine. To his sonne Richard, he offered halfe the reuenues of Guien, and foure conuenient castels in the same. And to his sonne Gesteire he offered all those lands that belonged by right of inheritance vnto the daughter of Conaricle of Britaine, if he might by the popes god licence marrie hir. And further king Henrie the father yielded himselfe to stand to the order of the archbishop of Eberent and other the popes legats, not refusing to giue his sonnes what rents and reuenues sooner they should say were reasonable, reseruing onlie to himselfe the administration of iustice, and the power roiall.

These seemed to be large offers, but yet they could not be accepted. For certeine sonnes of Bechal, set upon nothing but mischief, troublers of common peace and quietnesse, wrought so with them, that no conditions of peace (were the same neuer so reasonable) could content them, so that without effect this communication brake by, but not without continuall words passed betwixt the parties, inso much that the earle of Leicester (who being put from all his aid in England, was come ouer to the French king to purchase aid at his hands) could not refrain but giuing credit to the old adage,

Homo extra corpus suum est cum irascitur, after many opprobrious words uttered against king Henrie the father, laid hand on his sword to haue stricken him, but the standers by would not suffer him: and so they departed; which rash attempt or rather discollall enterpryse, Non fuit esse hominis non fuit iret Orestes.

On the morrow after, the French and English skirmished together betwixt Cursells and Gisors, in which consist Enguerane Chastillone de Etrie was taken prisoner by earle William de Handeuille, who presented him to the king of England. King Leices though he indged it his part to preferue his sonne in law from danger, yet he ment nothing lesse than to soine battell with the English at that present. But within a few daies after, he sent Robert earle of Leicester into England with an armie of Flemings and others, there to soine with Hugh Wigot, that both of them might as well by force as faire promises and gentle persuasions bring the whole realme vnto the obedience of king Henrie the sonne.

The earle of Leicester therefore landing at Wals-ton the 21. of September, passed through the countrie into Frenningham, where he was receiued of Hugh Wigot earle of Northfolke; and after that an other host of Flemings were arrived for their aid, they went vnto Gipswich, where when they had remained a few daies, and augmented their forces by certeine bands of men of warre that belonged vnto earle Wigot, they went to the castell of Baghenet

After this, hearing that the countesse of Leicester was arrived at Oxford with an other power of Flemings, they went to meet her: and so the earle of Leicester, having now a strong armie about him, took leave of earle Wigot, and went to passe through the countrie into Leicestershire, there to succour his friends, and to worke some feat for the behoufe and furtherance of their quarrell.

Reg. Henric.

In the meane time the arrivall of the earle of Leicester being knowne, the people of the countrie were assembled together. Also Richard Lucie lord chiefe iustice, and Humfrey de Boun high constable of England, with the kings power of horsemen which lately before had bene in Scotland and made invades there (as before is mentioned) came with all speed to saue the countrie from spoile, having first taken a truce as before is said, with the king of Scots, till the feast of Saint Hilarie next ensuing (or rather Easter, hostages being delivred on both sides. Upon knowledge then had where the enemies were lodged, and what they intended to do, the said Richard Lucie & Humfrey de Boun came to Saint Edmundsburie, whither Keignold earle of Cornewall the kings uncle, Robert earle of Glocester, and William erle of Arundell resorted.

Reg. Henric.

In the meane while, the earle of Leicester passed forward on his waie so farre as Fornham a little village beside S. Edmundsburie. The lord chiefe iustice & the earls before mentioned with a great armie, and amongst others the said Humfrey de Boun, who had the leading of 300. knights, or men of armes at the kings wages, came out of S. Edmundsburie, having the baner of S. Edmund borne before them, & in a marsh ground betwixt Fornham & Edmundsburie, they encountered with the said earle of Leicester, and after long and cruell fight discomfited his people, and took him prisoner, together with his wife the countesse Petronill, after he had done all that belonged to a valiant capteine.

Some write that there were killed on that day of his people to the number of ten thousand (and almost as manie taken) herelic [all the footmen of the Flemings being in number foure or five thousand were either taken or slaine:] the residue that escaped fled towards Leicester, that they might both defend the towne & themselves from the danger of their foes.

Will. Parvus.

But here is to be noted, that it seemeth by the report of some writers, how the earle of Leicester had not so great an armie there at that battell, as by others account of the number slaine and taken it should appeare he had. For at his departure from his companion in armes Hugh Wigot, he took upon him to passe through the countrie (as some write) partly upon trust that he had of the force and number of his souldiers, being about foure or five thousand stout and valiant footmen, besides 80 chosen and well appointed horsemen; and partly in hope that manie of those which were in his adversaries campe, would rather turne to him than fight against him.

He had a great confidence in the Flemings, who indeed presumed much upon their owne strength, so that they made account of some great conquest, in such wise, that when they came into any large plaine where they might rest, they would take each others by the hand and leading a danse, sing in their countrie language,

King Henrie receiving advertisement of the victorie which his capteines had thus gotten in England, was marvellous ioyfull, and commanded that the prisoners should be brought over unto him into Normandie: which being done, he went into Anion, and there fortified the towne and castles of the countrie with sure garrisons of men, to resist all sudden invasions, secret practices, and other attempts of the enemies. On the feast of S. Andrew the apostle, he took the towne of Clarendone by force, which Richard de Lauerdin held against him, having first expelled his father the earle of Clarendone.

About this season, or rather somewhat before, king Henrie the father, contrarie to the prohibition of the king his sonne) and after the appeale made unto the pope, gave not onlie unto Richard prior of Dover, the archbishoppe of Canturburie; but also to Ketbold Fitz Joceline the bishoppe of Bath; to Richard de Worcester archdeacon of Poitiers the bishoppe of Winchester; to Robert Foliot the bishoppe of Hereford; to Geoffrey Ribell archdeacon of Canturburie he gave the bishoppe of Ely, and to John de Orenford the bishoppe of Chichester.

But now to our purpose. The nobles of the realme of England (after the battell of S. Edmundsburie) with an infinit number of men went against Hugh Wigot in purpose to abate his pride. But whereas they might easilie have had him at their pleasure, by means of such summes of monie as he gave in bribes, a peace was granted to him till Christmas, within which time having gotten together fourtene thousand Flemings, he passed through Essex, and so getting over into Kent, came to Dover, where he took ship and transported over into France.

Which was fought on the 27. of October.

King Henrie the father held his Christmasse this yeare at Caen in Normandie, about which time a truce was made betwixt him and king Lewes to endure till Easter, or (as others write) for the terme of six moneths. For ye haue to understand, that the fame of the victorie gotten by the capteines of king Henrie the father against the earle of Leicester (being not onlie spread through England, but also blown over into France) put those that took part with him in great feare; but speciallic king Lewes mistrusting the matter began to wax wearie that he had attempted so far, and sustained so great travail and expences in another mans cause.

Whilste this truce indured, the archbishop of Canturburie being readie to returne home in despair of his businesse, upon a feigned rumour spread that there was a peace concluded betwixt the two kings, the father and sonne, he was called backe and consecrated by the pope the sundaie after Easter: and then furnished with the dignities of pimat and legat of England, and other privileges according, he took his waie homewards towards England, after he had laid forth great summes of monie to display point the purposes of his adventures.

This yeare in June, the lord Geoffrey the elect of Lincolne the kings sonne besieged the castell which Roger de Molubray had repaired at Linard Ferie, within the Ile of Wyholme, and compelling the souldiers within to yeld, he beat downe and rased the same castell unto the verie ground. Robert Molubray constable of that castell, as he passed thorough the countrie towards Leicester, there to procure some aid, was taken by the men of Clait, and kept as prisoner. Moreover, the said elect of Lincolne took the castell of Halesfert that belonged to the said Roger Molubray, which being now taken, was delivred unto the keeping of the archbishop of York. The said elect also fortified a castell at Topelise, and took it to the keeping of William Stuteville. In this meane while the king took the strengths and fortresses which his sonne Richard had fortified at Harwates, and in the same forts and church (which was also fortified against him) 60. knights or men of armes, and 400. archbalifers, that is, the best of them that bare Philip earle of Flanders in the presence of the French king and other the peeres of France, laien his hand vpon the holie reliques, sware that within 15. daies next insuing the feast of S. John then instant to enter England with an armie, and to doe his best to subdue the same to king Henrie the son. Upon trust wherof the young king the more presuming came downe to Whitland, the 14. daie of Iulie, that he might from thence send ouer into England Kase de la Haie with certeine bands of souldiers. Before this the earle of Flanders had sent ouer 318. knights or men of armes, as we may call them. But after their arrivall at Dorwell, which chanced the 14. of June, by reason that their associats were dispersed, and for the more part subdued, they toke with them earle Hugh Bigot, and marching to Dorwich, assaulted the citie and won it, gaining there great riches, and spectallie in readie monie, and led awaie a great sort of prisoners whome they ransomed at their pleasure. This chanced the 18. of June.

I remember that William Parvus writeth, that the citie of Dorwich was taken by the Flemings that came ouer with the earle of Leicester in the yeare last past, by the conduct of the said earle before he was taken, and that after he had taken that citie, being accompanied with earle Bigot, he led those Flemings also vnto Dunwich, purposing to win and sacke that towne also; but the inhabitants being better provided against the coming of their enemies than they of Dorwich were, shewed such countenance of defense, that they preferred their towne from that danger, so that the two earles with Flemings were constrained to depart without achieving their purpose. But whether that this attempt against Dunwich was made by the earle of Leicester (before his taking) in companie of earle Bigot, I haue not to auouch. But verelie for the winning of Dorwich, I suppose that William Parvus mistaketh the time, except we shall saie that it was twice taken, as first by the earle of Leicester in the yeare 1173. For it is certeine by consent of most writers, and especiallie those that haue recorded particularie the incidents that chanced here in this land during these troubles betwixt the king and his sons, that it was taken now this yeare 1174. by earle Bigot (as before we haue shewed.)

But now to proceed. The lords that had the rule of the land for king Henrie the father, perceiuing earle Bigots proceedings, sent knowledge thereof with all expedition to the king, as yet remaining in the parties beyond the seas. Whilst these things were a doing, although the minds of manie of the conspirators against king Henrie the father were inclined to peace, yet Roger Hovwray, and Hugh Bigot (by reason of this new supplie of men got out of Flanders) ceased not to attempt fresh exploits; and cheslie they solicited the matter in such wise with William king of Scotland, that whilst they in other quarters of the realme played their parts, he entered into the confines of Cumberland, and first besieged the citie of Carlisle, but perceiuing he could not win it in any short time, he left one part of his armie to keepe siege before it, and with the residue marched into the countrie alongst by the riuer of Eden, taking by force the cassels of Bourgh and Applebie, with diuerse other. This done, he passed ouer the riuer, and came through Northumberland (wasting the countrie as he went) vnto Alnewike, which place he attempted to win, though his labour therein proved but in vaine.

This enterprise which he made into Northumberland, he toke in hand cheslie at the suit and request of Roger Hovwray, from whome Gestepe (who after was bishop of Lincoln) B. Henries eldest base son had taken two of his cassels, so that he kept the third with much adoe. He had given his eldest sonne in hostage vnto the said king of Scots for assurance of such covenants to be kept on his behalfe as were passed betwixt them. In the meane time one Dun-against the enemies, sith it should be a great rebuke to them to suffer the countrie to be wasted after that sort without reuengement. Herevpon riding forth one morning, there arose such a thicke fog and mist that they could not discern any waie about them, so that doubting to fall within the laps of their enemies at brivares, they staid a while to take aduise what should be best for them to doe. Now when they were almost fullie resolved to haue turned backe againe, by the comfortable words and bold exhortation of Bernard Ballioll, they changed their purpose, and rode forward, till at length the northerne wind began to waken, and droue awaie the mist, so that the countrie was discovered vnto them, and perceiuing there Alnewike stood, not knowing as yet whether the Scots had wone it or not, they staid their pace, and riding softly, at length learning by the inhabitants of the countrie, that the Scottish king despairing to win Alnewike, had raised his siege from thence the same day, they turned freight thither, and lodging there all night, in the morning got to their hostes verie carelie, riding forth towards the enemies that were spred abroad in the countrie to forrey the same. They had anon espied where the king was, and incontinentlie compassed him about on euerie side, who perceiuing the English horsemen readie thus to assaile him, with all diligence called backe his men from the spoile; but the more part of them being straid far off through the sweetnes they found in getting of preies, could not heare the sound of the trumpets, yet notwithstanding with those his horsemen which he could get together, he encountered the English men which came vpon him verie hastily.

The battell was begun verie fiercelie at the first, and well fought for a time, but the Scottish horsemen being toiled before in forreling the countrie, could not long continue against the fierce assault of the English, but were either beaten downe, or else constrained to saue themselves by flight. The king with a few other (who at the first had begun the battell) was taken. Also manie of the Scots who being far off, and yet hearing of the skirmish, came running toward the place, & were taken yet they could vnderstand how the matter had passed. This taking of the king of Scots was on a saturday, being the seventh of Iulie.

In the meane while and somewhat before this time, the earle of Leicesters men, which laie at Leicester vnder the conduct of Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie (as some write) or rather of Anketill Malozie constable or gouernour (if we shall so call him, as Roger Houeden saith) came to Portsmouth, where they fought with them of that towne, and getting the victorie, toke two hundred prisoners, and sue or wounded nere hand as manie more, and so with this good successe in that enterpryse returned againe to Leicester, from whence they first set forth. King Henrie the sonne being hereof aduertised by letters oftentimes sent vnto him by this Robert Ferreis, and other his friends here in England, sometimes conceiued some good hope to obtaine his purpose: and therefore determined to prepare for the warre. Herevpon he purchased aid of king Letwes, who (because the truce which he had taken with king Henrie the father was now expired) thought it was reason to further his sonne in lawes enterpryse so farre as in him laie. Wherefore he made his prouision at Graueling, and there incamping with his people, staied till his ships were readie to transport him and his armie, which consisted of certeine hostemen, and of a number of Zabanders.

King Henrie the father being informed both of his sonnes purpose, and of the doings in England, with all possible speed determined to passe ouer into England, and therefore got his souldiers a shipboard, among whom were certeine bands of his Zabanders: and so sone as the wind blew to his mind, he caused the sailes to be hoised vp, and the nauie to set forward. Being landed, he repaired first vnto Canturburie, there to make his praiers, doubting least the blood of the archbishop Thomas Becket being shed through his occasion, did yet require vengeance against him for that fact. From Canturburie he came to London, and toke order for the placing of captains with their bands in certeine townes about the coast, to defend the landing places, where he thought his sonne was like to arrive. Then went he to Huntington, and subdued the castell there the 19. of Julie: for the knights and other souldiers that were within it yelded themselves to the kings mercie, their liues and lims saued.

This agreement was concluded the 25. of Julie. Herevpon on a multitude of the Flemings which Philip earle of Flanders had sent into England (as before is mentioned) vpon their oth receiued, not afterwards to come as enimies into England, had licence to returne into their countrie. Also the bands of souldiers that came into the realme with Rafe de la Haie departed without impeachment by the kings sufferance.

The king hauing thus accomplished that which stood with his pleasure in those parties, remoued from thence and drew towards Portsmouth. To which towne after his comming thither, the king of Scots was brought with his feet bound vnder the horses bellie. Thither also came the bishop of Durham, and deliuered to the king the castels of Durham, Poatham, and Allerton. Thither also came to the king Roger Howbzaie, and surrendered to him the castell of Trefke, and Robert earle Ferreis deliuered vpon into his hands the castels of Lutburie and Duffield, and Anketill Malozie, and William de Due constables to the earle of Leicester yelded to the castels of Cicester, Grobie, and Mountsozell, to the intent that he should deale more courteously with the earle their master. Also William earle of Gloucester, and earle Richard of Clare submitted themselves to the king, and so he brought all his aduersaries within the realme of England vnto such subiection as he himselfe wished: so that the king hauing atchiued the vpper hand of his enimies returned to London.

¶ All this hurlie burle and blondie tumult, was partlie to be ascribed to the king himselfe, who ouer tenderlie fauouring his sonne, did defect and abase himselfe to aduance the other; partlie to the ambitious disposition of the youth, who was charged with roialtie, before he had learned sufficient loialtie, else would he not haue made insurrections against his father, that himself might obtaine the monarchie, and the old king doe him homage: and partlie to the quenes discontented or rather malicious mind, whose dutie it had bene (notwithstanding such dishonour done hir by the king in abusing his bodie vnlawfullie) so little to haue thought of stirring commotions betwixt the father and the sonnes, that she should rather haue lulled the contention asleepe, and done what she possible could to quench the feruent fier of strife with the water of pacification. But what ensued herevpon euen by waie of chastisement, but that which commonlie lighteth vpon tumult-raisers; namely, either losse of life, or at least restraint of libertie: For the king after this haplie atchiuement of his warlike affaires, being ruled by reason and aduise (as it is likelie) would not that so smoking a fierbrand (as quene Eliauo had proued himselfe to be) should still annioie his eyes, and therefore (whether in angrie or quiet mood, that is doubtfull) he committed hir to close prison, because she had procured his sons Richard and Gesefrey to foine with their elder brother against him their father (as before ye haue partlie heard.)

Shortly after also king Henrie the sonne and Philip earle of Flanders came thither, meaning to obtaine the possession of Normandie first, and after to go into England. king Henrie the father hereof with all speed, who as then was come ouer from Normandie, and was (the same day that the Scottish king was taken) at Canturburie, making his praiers there before the sepulture of the archbishop Becket (as after it shall appere.)

In the meane while and somewhat before this time, the earle of Leicesters men, which laie at Leicester under the conduct of Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie (as some write) or rather of Anketille Malozie constable or gouernour (if we shall so call him, as Roger Houeden saith) came to Portsmouth, where they fought with them of that towne, and getting the victorie, took two hundred prisoners, and due or wounded nere hand as manie more, and so with this good successe in that enterpryse returned againe to Leicester, from whence they first set forth. The kings hoysmen here vpon came streightwaies to Portsmouth, and following the enemies, could not ouertake them.

Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie being now come vnto Leicester in aid of them that laie there, staied not past ten daies: but finding meanes to increase his number of hoysmen, suddenly made to Nottingham, which Reigbold de Lucie had in keeping, and comming thither earlie in the morning took it, drew out the kings souldiers that laie there in garrison, burned the towne, due the inhabitants, and diuided their goods amongst his souldiers: which thing put the countrie about in such feare, that manie of the inhabitants submitted themselves vnto him.

King Henrie the sonne being hereof aduertised by letters oftentimes sent vnto him by this Robert Ferreis, and other his friends here in England, sometimes conceiued some good hope to obtaine his purpose: and therefore determined to prepare for the warre. Wherevpon he purchased aid of king Letwes, who (because the truce which he had taken with king Henrie the father was now expired) thought it was reason to further his sonne in lawes enterpryse so farre as in him laie. Wherefore he made his prouision at Graueling, and there incamping with his people, staied till his ships were readie to transport him and his armie, which consisted of certeine hoysmen, and of a number of Brabanders.

King Henrie the father being informed both of his sonnes purpose, and of the doings in England, with all possible speed determined to passe ouer into England, and therefore got his souldiers a shipboard, among whom were certeine bands of his Brabanders: and so sone as the wind blew to his mind, he caused the sailes to be hoised vp, and the nauie to set forward. Being landed, he repaired first vnto Canturburie, there to make his praiers, doubting least the blood of the archbishop Thomas Becket being shed through his occasion, did yet require vengeance against him for that fact. From Canturburie he came to London, and took order for the placing of capteins with their bands in certeine townes about the coast, to defend the landing places, where he thought his sonne was like to arrive. Then went he to Huntington, and subdued the castell there the 10. of Iulie: for the knights and other souldiers that were within it yelded themselves to the kings mercie, their liues and lims saved.

After this, assembling his people on all sides, he made his generall musters at S. Edmundsburie, and determined to besiege the castles of Wingham and Fremingham, which the earle Hugh Bigot held against him, who mistrusting that he was not able to defend himselfe and those places against the king, agreed with the king to haue peace, paing him the summe of a thousand markes by composition. This agreement was concluded the 25. of Iulie. Wherevpon on a multitude of the Flemings which Philip earle of Flanders had sent into England (as before is mentioned) vpon their oth receiued, not afterwards to come as enemies into England, had licence to returne into their countrie. The king hauing thus accomplished that which stood with his pleasure in those parties, remoued from thence and drew towards Portsmouth. To which towne after his comming thither, the king of Scots was brought with his feet bound vnder the hoyses bellie. Thither also came the bishop of Durham, and deliuered to the king the castles of Durham, Rotham, and Allerton. Thither also came to the king Roger Spowbate, and surrendered to him the castell of Treke, and Robert earle Ferreis deliuered vp into his hands the castles of Lutburie and Duffield, and Anketill Malozie, and William de Due constables to the earle of Leicester yelded to the king the castles of Cicester, Grobie, and Mountsozell, to the intent that he should deale more courteously with the earle their maister. Also William earle of Glocester, and earle Richard of Clare submitted themselves to the king, and so he brought all his aduersaries within the realme of England vnto such subiection as he himselfe wished: so that the king hauing atchised the vpper hand of his enemies returned to London.

All this hurle burle and bloudie tumult, was partlie to be ascribed to the king himselfe, who ouer tenderlie fauouring his sonne, did dield and abase himselfe to aduance the other; partlie to the ambitious disposition of the youth, who was charged with roialtie, before he had learned sufficient loialtie, else would he not haue made insurrections against his father, that himself might obtaine the monarchie, and the old king do him homage: and partlie to the quenes discontented or rather malicious mind, whose dutie it had bene (notwithstanding such dishonour done hir by the king in abusing his bodie vnlawfullie) so little to haue thought of stirring commotions betwixt the father and the sonnes, that she should rather haue lulled the contention asleepe, and done what she possible could to quench the feruent fier of strife with the water of pacification. emies. Now whilst they within were busie in devising how to repell the assault, and to defend themselves, the adversaries about midnight came forth of their campe, and approaching the walles with their ladders, raised them up, and began to scale the citie. But the citizens being aduised thereof, boldlie got them to the loops and towers, ouerthrew the ladders, stones and darts beat them backe, to their great losse and ouerthrow. Howbeit though the enemies could not preuaile thus to get the citie by this assault, yet they continued the siege, and suffered not them within to be in quiet, but daye and night assailed them by one meane or other.

Rog. Houed.
King Henrie
returneth into Normandie.

King Henrie the father being aduertised hercof, after he had set his businesse in order, touching the saertie and safe defense of the English estate, he returned into Normandie, and landed at Harflet on a thursdaie being the eight daie of August, bringing backe againe with him his B. and a thousand Welshmen. In this meane while, king Lewes continued still his siege before Rouen, confreining them within by all meanes he could deuise to yeld up their citie. At length came the feast of Saint Lawrence, on which daie the French king commanded that no man should attempt any enterpryse against the citizens, granting them truce for that day, in worship of that saint. This truce was so acceptable a thing to them within, that they forgetting themselves, without all respect to the danger wherein the citie stood, threw off their armour, and gaue themselves to sleepe and rest. Some also fell to banquetting and other pastimes in verie dissolute maner.

¶ But through this their remisse vsage and loose behauiour, and forgetting that a temporarie truce is no safe warrant of securitie and peace, they deriued danger and destruction to themselves; which it had bene their parts prouidentlie to haue prevented, and not through their carelesnesse to set open a gap of aduantage to their enemies, who pursued them with professed hostilitie, notwithstanding they reposed confidence in the truce that was granted. Wherein they are to be resembled to the coks of whome Plautus speaketh verie neatly, saying,

Demiror, qui tot videntur condimento is eos co Condimento non vti quod praestat omnibus,*

Meaning sobrietie: so these delighting more in their dishes, than mistrusting their enemies, remembred to take the use of any pleasure that the conuenientnesse of this present time might proffer; onlie as cokes among all their sauces do mind nothing lesse than sobriety: so these in the abundance of their ioies, thought nothing of afterclaps, which afterwards made them (like folcs) to sing an unhappie had I wist. For the Frenchmen, perceiuing this their negligence, required licence of the French king to giue assault to the citie, declaring in what state the matter presentlie stood; who not meaning to violate the reuerence of that day, and his promised faith, with any such vnlawfull attempt, commanded his men of warre that made the request in no wise to stirre. Howbeit the souldiers upon conuention of the spoile, raised the ladders to that part of the wall which they indged to be most without warders, so that some of them mounting aloft, got up, and were about to helpe by their fellowes.

Two praests.

Now it happened (as God would haue it) that two praests being gone up into the steeple of the chiefe church, to looke about them for their pleasures, fortun- ed to see where the French men were about to enter the citie, and straightwaies gaue knowledge to the citizens beneath. Whereupon the alarm rose, in- somuch that with all speed the people ran to the place, and with such violence came vpon their enemies which were entred vpon the walles, that straightwaies they slue manie of them, and chased the residue out of the ditch, so that they returned with bleeding wounds to their campe, repenting them of their unhappie enterpryse, that turned them to such wo and grauaunce.

The French-
men are repelled.

The same day a little before night, king Henrie the father came vnto Rouen, and was receiued into the citie with great ioy and gladnesse: for he came thither by chance, euen about the time that the citie had thus like to haue bin surprisid & taken at vnwares.

Polydor.

¶ There be that write, how the French king (immediatlie vpon the arriual of king Henrie) left his field and departed, greatlie to his dishonour, burning by his engines of warre, and not staling till his men might haue leisure to charge their wagons with their armour and other stuffe, which they were glad to leaue behind for a prey to the English men illusing forth vpon them. But other declare, that the French king being nothing abashed of king Henries comming, continued the siege, in hope to win the citie.

Matt. Paris.

The next day earlie in the morning (or as other say in the night season) the king did send forth a certein number of Welshmen to passe ouer the riuer of Saine, which they did, and by force made themselves waie through the French campe, getting without losse or danger vnto a great wood, and slue that day of their adversaries aboue an hundred men. After this, lieng abroad in the countrie, they skirmished daillie with the French horsemen, and oft times cut off such prouision of vittels as came to nourish the campe. The king himselfe on the other side remaining within the citie, caused his people to issue out at the gates, and to keepe the enemies occupied with skirmishes afore the citie. And moreover, where there was a great trench cast betwixt the French campe and the walles of the citie, he caused the same to be filled up with sagots, stones, and earth. But although the French men sawe this the kings deed well enough, yet none of them issued forth of their tents to hinder the English of their purpose.

Now king Lewes being fore bered with his enemies on each side, and perceiuing the citie would not be wone within any short time, began to wax wearie, and to repent himselfe (as afore) for taking in hand so chargeable and great a warre for another mans quarell. Whereupon he caused William bishop of Sens, and Theobald earle of Blois to go to king Henrie, and to promise vpon forbearance from warre for a time, to find means to reconcile him and his sonnes, betwene whome vnnaturall variance rested. Whereof k. Henrie being most desirous, and taking a truce, appointed to come to Cisors [in the feall of the natiuitie of our ladie] there to meet king Lewes, that they might talke of the matter and bring it to some good end.

The French king, so soone as he knew that truce was taken, raised his siege, and returning home, within a few daies after (according to the appointment) came to Cisors, and there communed with king Henrie: but because he could not make any agreement betwixt him and his sonnes at that time, he appointed another time to meet about it. King Henrie the father (whilst the truce continued with the French king) and his sonne Henrie went to Poitou, where his sonne Richard (whilst his father had bene occupied in other places) had gotten the most part of the countrie into his possession. But now hearing of his fathers comming, and that a truce was taken with the French king and with his brother, he considered with himselfe, that without their assistance he was not able to withstand his fathers power. Wherbeit at length choosing rather to trie the matter with force of armes, than cowardlie to yield, he prepared for defense, furnishing diuerse townes and castels with garisons of men: and assembling togither all the other power that he was able to make, came into the field, & pitched his tents not far off from his father. In the meane while, which way soeuer his father passed, the townes and castels submitted themselves vnto him, so that Richard began to despaire of the matter, inso much that he durst not approach nere his father, but kept aloofe, doubting to be entrapped.

At length when he had considered his owne state, and weled how vnthankfullie the French king and his brother had dealt with him, in hauing no consideration of him at such time as they took truce, he determined to alter his purpose, and hauing some good hope in his fathers clemencie, thought best to trie it, which he found to be the best waie that he could haue taken. For oftentimes it chanceth, that latter thoughts are better aduised than the first, as the old saing is,

Δελήσας Φερώνες σφόνδρος.

Hereupon Richard laing armour aside, came of his owne accord vnto his father on the 21. of September, and asked pardon. His father most courteously receiuing him, made so much of him as though he had not offended at all. Which example of courtesie preuailed much to the alluring of his other sons to come to a reconciliation. For the bringing whereof to speedie effect, he sent this Richard vnto king Leues, and to his other sonne Henrie, to comment with them of peace, at which time earle Richard did so effectualie his message, that he brought them both in godd forwardnesse to agree to his fathers purpose, so that there was a daie appointed for them to meet with their father, betwixt Tobyes in Touraine and Ambois.

King Henrie reioicing hereat, kept his daie (being the morrow after the feast of S. Michael) and there met him both king Leues, and his two sonnes Henrie and Gessrey, where finally the father and the sonnes were accorded; he promising to receiue them into fauour vpon these conditions.

1 First the prisoners to be released & take without rancome on both sides, and their offenses, which had taken either the one part or the other, to be likewise pardoned.

2 Out of this article were excepted all those which before the concluding of this peace had already compounded for their ransomes, as the king of Scots, the earles of Leicester and Chester, and Rafe Fulgier, with their pledges.

3 It was also agreed, that all those castels which had bene builded in time of this warre, should be raced and throwne downe, and all such cities, townes, castels, countries and places, as had bene wonne by either part during these wars, should be restored vnto those persons that held the same, and were in possession of them 15. daies before the departure of the sonnes from king Henrie the father.

4 That king Henrie the father should assigne to his sons more large reuenues for maintenance of their estates, with a caution included, that they should not spend the same riotously in any prodigall sort of manner.

5 To the king his sonne, he gaue two castels in Normandie, with an increase of yearelie reuenues, to the summe of 15. thousand pounds Anouin.

6 To his sonne Richard he gaue two houses in Poitou, with the one halfe of all the reuenues of the countie of Poitou to be receiued and taken in readie monie.

7 And to his sonne Gessrey he granted in monie, the moitie of that which he should haue by the ma-riage of earle Conans daughter, and after he had married hir by licence purchased of the pope, he should enioy all the whole liuings and reuenues that descended to hir, as in hir fathers writing therof more at large was conteined.

8 On the other part, king Henrie the son couenanted to & with the king his father, that he would per-forme and confirme all those gifts, which his father should grant out of his lands, & also all those gifts of lands which he either had made and assured, or hereafter should make and assure vnto any of his men for any of their seruices: & likewise those gifts which he had made vnto his sonne John the brother of king Henrie the sonne; namely, a thousand pounds in lands by yeare in England of his demaine and ex-cheats with the appurtenances, and the castell and countie of Potingham, with the castell of Harlebrough, & the appurtenances. Also a thousand pounds Anouin of yearelie reuenues in Normandie, and two castels there. And in Aniou a thousand pounds Anouin, of such lands as belonged to the earle of Aniou, with one castell in Aniou, and one in Touraine, and another in Paine.

Thus were the father and sons agreed and made friends, the sonnes couenancing neuer to withdraue their seruices and bounden duties from their father, but to obeie him in all things from that day forward. Herewith also the peace was renewed betwixt king Henrie and king Leues, and for the further confirmation, a new alliance was accorded betwixt them, which was, that the ladie Adela the daughter of king Leues should be giuen in marriage vnto earle Richard the sonne of king Henrie, who because she was not yet of age able to marie, she was con-uied into England to be under the guiding of king Henrie, till she came to lawfull yeares.

Thus the peace being concluded, king Henrie forgetting all iniuries passed, brought home his sons in manner aforesaid, who being well pleased with the agreement, attended their father into Normandie, where Richard and Gessrey did homage to him, re-ceiuing their othes of allegiance according to the manner in that case required. But king Henrie the sonne did no homage, for his father (in respect that he was a king) would not suffer him, and therefore took onlie sureties of him for performance of the coue-nants on his part, as was thought expedient.

¶ All this dissention and strife was kindled (no doubt) by the meanes of certeine sowers of discorde, sycophants, parasites, flatterers, clawbacks, & pick-thanks, who had learned their lesson, that Principibus placuisse viuis non vltima laus est, and thinking by their embossed speech to tickle the eares and harts of the young princes, who by reason of their young yeares and nakednesse of experience in the course of worldlie matters, sought their owne aduancement, even by slingeing fire faggots of dissention betwene them, whose harts naturall affection had vnited. For by the tenor of the storie (marke it who will) we shall see that no attempt of the sons against the father but had originall from the suggestions of euill disposed persons, who (like eeles that fatten not in faire running water, but in muddie motes and ponds) sought honour in hurle burlies, & reached out long armes to riches by manie a ones impouerishment. This to be true, the small euent and issue proueth; namely, the mutuall attonement and reconciliation wouen betwene the father and the sonnes; their remorse for their vndutifulnes, his louing fauour and graciousnesse; their promptnesse to yield to conditions of agreement; his forwardnes to giue consent to covenants required; their readi-nesse to do the old king homage, his acceptable ad-stances to be collected out of the storie, all which do proue that this their disloall resistance sprang ra-

At length king Henrie went to Saleise, and there deliuered out of captiuitie William king of Scotland, Robert earle of Leicester, Hugh earle of Chester, with diuerse other Noble men which were kept there as prisoners, putting them to their ransomes, and receiuing of them pledges with an oth of allegiance. This king Henrie the father released for his part the number of nine hundred 69. knights or men of armes (if ye list so to terme them) which had bene taken since the beginning of these passed warres.

As for king Henrie the sonne he also set at liber-tie aboue an hundred, and that without ransome pacing, according to the articles of the peace (as before you haue heard.) But yet some (as is already specified) were excepted out of the benefit of that article, as William king of Scotland, who being not able to paie his ransome in present monie, deliuered vp in gage foure of the strongest castles within his realme into king Henriess hands, namely, War-wike, Edbourough, Korbourgh, and Sterling, with condition, that if he brake the peace, and paid not the monie behind due for his ransome, king Henrie and his successors should enioy for euer the same castles. He also couenanted, not to receiue any English rebels into his realme. Other write that the king of Scots did not onelie become the king of Englands liegeman at this time, and couenanted to do homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and all other his lands, but also deliuered the castles of Warwike, and Korbourgh to be possessed of the same king of England and his heires for euer, without any couenant mentioned of mortgage.

Things being settled thus in good order, king Henrie leauing his sonne Henrie at Rouen, went to Ar-genton, and there held his Christmase, and after wards, namely in the feast of the purification of our ladie, both the kings (as well the father as the sonne) were at Pauns, and vpon their returne from thence into Normandie, came to a communication with the French king at Gisors, and then being come backe into Normandie at Bure, the sonne (to put the father out of all doubt and mistrust of any euill intention in him) swore fealtie to him against all persons, and so became his liegeman in the presence of Ro-thob archbishop of Rouen, Henrie bishop of Baieux, William earle of Spandeville, Richard de Bumez, his conestable, and manie other.

After this they kept their easter at Chirebourgh, from whence they came to Caen, where they met with Philip earle of Flanders, who had latelie before taken on him the crosse, to go to the holie land: where king Henrie the father required him to release all such couenants as king Henrie the sonne had made vnto him in time of his last warres, which he freely did, and deliuered by the writing that he had of the same king concerning those couenants, and so they confirmed vnto him the yearelie rent which he was wont to receiue out of England, before the said warres.

Finallie, when king Henrie had visited the most part of the countrie, he came to Warlew, and caused his nauie to be decked and rigged, that he might saile ouer into England. Whilste he tarried here till his ships were readie, he sent letters to his sonne king Henrie, willing him to repaire vnto him, and meaning that he should accompanie him into England. Who at the first was loth to obeye his fathers will and pleasure herein, because some enuous persons about him had put in his head a doubt, least his father had not altogether forgot his former grudge, and that he ment at his comming into England to commit him to prison. Which was a surmise altogether void of likeliehood, considering that the father, in the whole processe of his actions betwene himselfe and his sonnes, was so farre from the desire of inflicting any corporall punishment, or leuening anie fine vpon them for their misdemour, that he alwaies sought meanes of reconcilment and pacification. And though this Henrie the sonne for his part deserued to be roughly dealt withall, yet the father handled him so gentlie with courteous letters & messages, that shortly after he came of his owne acord vnto Warlew, from whence shortly after they sailed both together ouer into England, landing at Portsmouth on a fridaie being the ninth of Maye, from thence they toke their iourne streight to London, all the waies being full of people that came to see them, and to shew themselves glad and ioyfull of their concord and happie arriual. At their comming to the citie they were receiued with great reioicing of the people, beseeching God long to preserve them both in health and honour.

The same yeare William de Breause having got a great number of Welshmen into the castell of Abergaunmie, vnder a colourable pretext of communication, proposed this ordinance to be receiued of them with a corporall oth: That no trauelier by the waie amongst them should beare any bow, or other vnlawfull weapon. Which oth when they refused to take, because they would not stand to that ordinance he condemned them all to death. This deceit he vsed towards them in reuenge of the death of his uncle Henrie of Hereford, whom vpon easter euen before, they had through treason murdered, and were now acquitted with the like againe.

The same yeare died Reignold earle of Cornwall, bassard sonne to king Henrie the first without heirs male, by reason whereof the king toke into his hands all the inheritance of lands and liuings which he held within England, Normandie and Wales, except cer-teine portions which the daughters of the same earle had by assignement allotted to them. Also Richard earle of Gloucester deceased this yeare, and his sonne Philip succeeded him.

The same yeare was a synod of the cleargie kept at Westmister, wherein many things were decreed for the conseruation of religion. Amongst other things it was provided, that those abbeies and churches which were void of gouernours, and could haue none placed in them by the time of the late ciuill warres, should now be committed vnto men wo-thy to enioy the same, for the reformation of disorders growne and plentifulle sprung vp in time of the vacations.

The realme now brought into good order and delivered from the troubles of warre, as well at home as abroad, the king being at good leisure determined to ride about a great part of the realme, and com-ming to Powke, sent for the king of Scots to come and do his homage. Now the king of Scots (according to couenants before concluded) came vnto Powke in the moneth of August, where doing his homage about the twentieth day of the same moneth in St. Peters church, the king granted further by his letters patents, that he and his successors kings of Scotland, should do homage and fealtie to the kings of England, so often as they should be necessarilie required therevnto. In signe and token of which subjection, the king of Scots offered his hat and his sab-

The charter containing the articles of the peace and agreement concluded betwixt the two kings, which was read in S. Peters church at the same time, exemplified as followeth.

R. Houed.

Wilhelmus rex Scotie deuenit homo ligius domini regis Anglie contra omnes homines, de Scotia & de alijs terris suis, & fidelitatem ei fecit ut ligio domino suo sicut alij homines sui ipsi facere solent. Similiter fecit homagium Henrico filio regis salua fide domini regis patris sui.

2 Omnes vero episcopi, abbates & clerus terre Scotie & successores sui faciant domino regi sicut ligio domino fidelitatem, de quibus habere voluerit, sicut alij episcopi sui ipsi facere solent, & Henrico filio suo & David & heredibus eorum.

3 Concessit autem rex Scotie, & frater eius, & barones, & alij homines sui domino regi, quod ecclesia Scotie talem subiectionem amodo faciat ecclesie Anglie, qualem facere debet, & solebat tempore regum Anglie predecessorum suorum.

4 Similiter Richardus episcopus Sancti Andree, & Richardus episcopus Dunkeldi & Gaufridus abbas de Dunfermlin & Herbertus prior de Coldingham concesserunt, ut ecclesia Anglicana illud habeat in ecclesia Scotie, quod de iure debet habere: & quod ipsi non erunt contra ius Anglicane ecclesie. Et de hac concessione sicut quando ligiam fidelitatem domino regi & domino Henrico filio suo fecerint, ita eos inde asscurauerint.

5 Hoc idem facient alij episcopi & clerus Scotie, per conventionem inter dominum regem Scotie & David fratrem suum & barones suos factam, comites & barones & alij homines de terra regis Scotie (de quibus dominus rex habere voluerit) facient ei homagium contra omnem hominem, & fidelitatem ut ligio domino suo sicut alij homines sui facere ei solent, & Henrico filio suo & heredibus suis salua fide domini regis patris sui. Similiter heredes regis Scotie & barones & hominum suorum homagium & ligiantiam facient heredibus domini regis contra omnem hominem.

6 Praterea rex Scotie & homines sui nullum amodo fugitiuum de terra domini regis pro feloniam receptabunt, vel in alia terra sua nisi voluerit venire ad rectum in curia domini regis & stare iudicio curie. Sed rex Scotie & homines sui quam citius poterunt eum capient, & domino regi reddent, vel iusticiarijs suis aut balliis suis in Anglia.

7 Si autem de terra regis Scotie aliquis fugitiuus fuerit pro feloniam in Anglia, nisi voluerit venire ad rectum in curia domini regis Scotie, & stare iudicio curie, non receptabitur in terra regis, sed liberabitur hominibus regis Scotie per balliios domini regis ubi inuentus fuerit.

8 Praterea homines domini regis habebunt terras suas quas habebunt, & habere debent de domino rege, & hominibus suis, & de rege Scotie & de hominibus suis. Et homines regis Scotie habebunt terras suas, quas habebant, & habere debent de domino rege & hominibus suis. Pro ista vero conventionem & sine firmiter observando domino regi & Henrico filio suo & heredibus suis a rege Scotie & heredibus suis liberavit rex Scotie domino regi castellum de Roxburgh, & castellum Puelarum, & castellum de Striueling in manu domini regis, & ad custodienda castella assignavit rex Scotie de redditu suo mesurabiliter ad voluntatem domini regis.

9 Praterea pro predicta conventionem & sine exequendo liberavit rex Scotie domino regi David fratrem suum in obsidem & comitem Duncannon, & comitem Waldenum, similiter alios comites & barones cum alijs viris potentibus quorum numerus 18. Et quando castella reddita fuerint illis, rex Scotie & David frater suus liberabuntur. Comites quidem & barones prenominati unusquisque postquam liberaverit obsidem suam, scilicet filium legitimum, qui habuerit, & alij nepotes suos vel propinquiores sibi heredes, & castella ut dictum est redditis liberabuntur.

10 Praterea rex Scotie & barones sui prenominati asscurauerunt, quod ipsi bona fide, & sine malo ingenio, & sine occasione faciant ut episcopi & barones & ceteri homines terre sue, qui non assuerunt quando rex Scotie cum domino rege finivit eandem ligiantiam & fidelitatem domino regi & Henrico filio suo quam ipsi fecerunt, & ut barones & homines qui assuerunt obsides, liberabunt domino regi de quibus habere voluerit.

11 Praterea episcopi, comites & barones conventionauerunt domino regi & Henrico filio suo, quod si rex Scotie aliquo casu a fidelitate domini regis & filij, & a conventionem predictam recederet, ipsi cum domino rege tenebunt sicut cum ligio domino suo contra regem Scotie, & contra omnes homines ei inimicantes. Et episcopi sub interdicto ponent terram regis Scotie donec ipse ad fidelitatem domini regis redeat.

12 Predictam itaque conventionem firmiter observandam bona fide, & sine malo ingenio domino regi & Henrico filio suo & heredibus suis a Wilhelmo rege Scotie & David fratre suo 20 & baronibus suis predictis, & heredibus eorum asscuravit ipse rex Scotie, & David frater eius, & omnes barones sui prenominati sicut ligij homines domino regi contra omnem hominem, & Henrici filij sui (salua fidelitate patris sui) hijs testibus, Richardo episcopo Abbrincensi, & Iohanne Salisburie decano, & Roberto abbate Malmesburie, & Radulpho abbate Mundeiburg, nec non alijs abbatibus, comitibus & baronibus, & duobus filijs suis scilicet Richardo & Galfrido.

These things being recited in the church of S. Peter in Porke, in the presence of the said kings, & of David the king of Scots brother, and before an innumerable number of other people, the bishops, earles, barons and knights of Scotland sware fealty to the king of England and to Henrie his sonne, and to their heires against all men, as to their liege and soveraigne lords.

King Henrie having ended his businesse at Porke with the king of Scots and others, which likewise did homage to him there, returned to London, in the octaves of S. Michaele, and he called a parlement at Windsoe, whereat were present king Henrie the sonne, Richard archbishop of Canturburie, and other bishops of England, Laurence archbishop of Dublin with a great number of earles and barons of this realme. About the same time the archbishop of Euanon, and the abbat of S. Brandon, with Laurence the chancelor of Roderike king of Connagh in Ireland were come as ambassadours from the said Roderike, unto king Henrie, who willinglie heard them, as he that was more desirous to grow to some accord with those savage people by some frendlie order, than to war with them that had nothing to lose: so that he might in pursuing of them seeme to ffish with an hoke of gold. Therefore in this parlement the matter was debated, and in the end a peace concluded at the request of the said ambassadours, the king appointing Roderike to paie unto him in token of subiection, a tribute of ox hides.

The charter of the agreement was written and subscribed in forme as followeth.

Ecce est finis & concordia que facta fuit apud Windshore in octavis sancti Michaelis an. Gracia 1175. inter dominum regem Anglie Henr. secundum, & Rodericum regem Conacie, per catholicum Tuamensem archiep. & abbatem C. sancti Brandani, & magistrum Lancellarium regis Conacie.

1 Scilicet quod rex Anglie concedit predicto Roderico ligio homini suo regnum Conacie, quamdiu ei fideliter serviet, & sit rex sub eo, paratus ad servicium suum sicut homo suus, & ut teneat terram suam ita bene & in pace, sicut tenuit antequam dominus rex Anglie intraret Hiberniam, reddendo ei tribu-

Anglie, & fideliter & integre persoluerint tributum & omnibus iure & honore domini regis Anglie & suo.

2 Et si qui ex eis regi Anglie & ei rebelles fuerint, & tributum & alia iura regis Anglie per manum eius soluere noluerint, & a fidelitate regis Anglie recesserint, ipse eos iusticiis & amoneat. Et si eos per se iusticiare non poterit, constabularius regis Anglie, & familia sua de terra illa iunabunt eum ad hoc faciendum, cum ab ipso fuerint requisiti, & ipsi viderint quod necesse fuerit. Et propter hunc finem reddet predictus rex Conacia domino regi Anglie tributum singulis annis, scilicet de singulis decem animalibus unum corium placabile mercatoribus, tam de tota terra sua, quam de a-Midia cum omnibus pertinentiis suis, sicut unquam Marchat Wamailethlachlin cum melius & plenius tenuit, aut aliqui pertinentiis suis, scilicet cum tota lagenia. Et excepta Water-fordia cum tota terra illa, que est a Waterford usque ad Dun-

4 Et si Hibernenses qui aufugerint, redire voluerint ad terram baronum regis Anglie, redeant in pace, reddendo tributum predictum quod alij reddunt, vel faciendo antiqua ser-uitia que facere solebant pro terris suis. Et hoc sit in arbitrio dominorum suorum. Et si aliqui eorum redire noluerint, domini eorum & rex Conacie accipiat obsides ab omnibus quos ei commisit dominus rex Anglie ad voluntatem domini regis & suam. Et ipse dabit obsides ad voluntatem domini regis Anglie illos vel alios, & ipsi seruiant domino de canibus & auribus suis singulis annis de presentis suis. Et nullum omnino de quacunque terra regis sit, retinebunt contra voluntatem domini regis & mandatum. Hys testibus, Richardo episcopo Wintonie, Gaufrido episcopo Eliensi, Laurentio Dunelinen-si archiepiscopo, Gaufrido, Nicholao, & Rogero capellanus regis, Guilhelmo comite de Essex, & alijs multis.

Moreover, at this parlement the king gaue an Ireishman named Augustine, the bishoppe of Waterford, which see was then void, and sent him into Ireland with Laurence the archbishop of Dublin to be consecrated of Donat the archbishop of Cassels.
The same yeare, both England and the countries adioining were soze bered with a great mortalitie of people, and immediatlie after followed a soze dearth and famine.

King Henrie held his Christmas at Windsor, and about the feast of the conuersion of saint Paule he came to Northampton, & after the mortalitie was well ceased, he called a parlement, whereat was present a deacon cardinall intituled of S. Angelo, being sent into England as a legat from the pope, to take order in the controuersies betwixt the two archbishops of Canturburie and Poike. This cardinall whose name was Hugh Petro Lion, assembled in the same place a conuocation of synod of the bishops and cleargie, as well of England as Scotland: in which conuocation, after the ceassing of certeine strifes and decrees made as well concerning the state of common-wealth, as for the honest behauiour of mans life, the cardinall consented that (accoding as by the kings lawes it was already orde-ned) all manner of persons within the sacred orders of the cleargie, which should hunt within the kings grounds and kill any of his deare, should be conue-ned and punished before a tempozall iudge. Which libertie granted to the king, did so infringe the immu-nitie which the cleargie pretended to haue within this realme, that afterwards in manie points, preests were called before tempozall iudges, and punished for their offenses as well as the laitie, though they haue grudged inoed and mainteined that they had wzong therein, as they that would be exempted and iudged by none, except by those of their owne order.

Moreover, in this counsell the matter came in question touching the obedience which the bishops of Scotland did owe by right vnto the archbishop of Poike, whom from the beginning the popes of Rome had constituted and ordeined to be primate of all Scotland, and of the Isles belonging to that realme, as well of the Orkneys as all the other. Which constitution was obserued by the bishops of those parts manie yeares together, though after they renounced their obedience. Whereupon the archbishops of Poike (for the time being) continuallie complained, so that these popes, Paschall the second, Calixt the second, Honorius, Innocentius, Eugenius the third, and Adrian the fourth, had the hearing of the matter, and with often sending their letters, went about to reduce them to the prouince of Poike. But the Scots still withstanding this ordinance, at length the matter thus in controuersie was referred to pope Alexander, who sent the foresaid cardinall Hugh as well to make an end of that contention, as of diuerse other: but yet he left it vnderdecided.

William king of Scotland came personallie unto this parlement at Northampton, by commandement of king Henrie, and brought with him Richard bishop of S. Andrew, and Josseline bishop of Glas-cow, with other bishops and abbats of Scotland, the which being commanded by king Henrie to shew such subiection to the church of England as they were bound to do by the faith which they owgnt to him, and by the oth of fealtie which they had made to him, they made this answer, that they had neuer shewed any subiection to the church of England, nor ought. Against which dentall, the archbishop of Poike replied, and brought forth sufficient priuileges granted by the foresaid popes, to proue the subiection of the Scottish bishops, and namelie Glascow and Whiterne vnto the see of Poike. But bicause the archbishop of Canturburie meant to bring the Sco-tish bishops vnder subiection to his see, he wrought so for that time with the king, that he suffered them to depart home, without yielding any subiection to the church of England. The letters which the foresaid popes did send touching this matter, were remaining safe and sound amongst other writings in the colledge at Poike, when Polydor Virgil wzote the hystories of England, the copies whereof in an old ancient booke he confessed to haue seene and read.

But to speake further of things ordered and done at this parlement holden at Northampton, the king by common consent of his Nobles and other states, diuided his realme into six parts, appointing three iustices itinerants in euerie of them, as here followeth, Hugh de Cressie, Walter Fitz Robert, and Robert Pantell, were deputed vnto Northfolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeshire, Huntingtonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Essex and Hertfordshire: Hugh de Cundeuille, William Fitz Rafe, and William Ballet were appointed to Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Leicestershire: Robert Fitz Bernard, Richard Gifford, Roger Fitz Kemfey, were assigned to Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, Suffer, Berksheire and Oxfordshire: William Fitz Stephan, Bertham de Werton, Thurstan Fitz Simon were ordeined to Herefordshire, Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, and Salopshire: Rafe Fitz

The king caused these iustices to sweare vpon the holie euangelists, that they should keepe his assises which he first had ordeined at Clarendon, and after had renewed here at Northampton, & also caused all his subiects within the reime of England to keepe and obserue the same.

Ger. Dor.

Whereafter at this councell, king Henrie restored vnto Robert earle of Leicester all his lands, both on this side the sea, and beyond, in maner as he held the same fiftene daies before the warre. To William de Albennie earle of Arundell, he gaue the earldome of Suffex. About midlent, the king with his sonne and the legat came to London, where at Westminster a conuocation of the cleargie was called, but when the legat was set, and the archbishop of Canturburie on his right hand as primate of the realme, the archbishop of Poike comming in, and disdainning to sit on the left, where he might seme to giue preeminence vnto the archbishop of Canturburie (in manerlie inough indeed) swast him downe, meaning to thrust himselfe in betwixt the legat, and the archbishop of Canturburie. And where belike the said archbishop of Canturburie was loth to remoue, he set his buttocks in his lap, but he scarce touched the archbishops skirt with his bum, when the bishops and other chaplains with their seruants slept to him, pulled him away, and threw him to the ground, and beginning to lay on him with bats and fists, the archbishop of Canturburie yelding god for euill, sought to saue him from their hands. Thus was verified in him that sage sentence,

The archbishop of Poike with his rent rochet got by, and awaie he went to the king with a great complaint against the archbishop of Canturburie: but when vpon examination of the matter the truth was knowne, he was well laught at for his labour, and that was all the remedie he got. As he departed so becuffed south of the conuocation house towards the king, they cried out vpon him; Go traitor that diddest betray that holy man Thomas, go get thee hence, thy hands yet stinke of blood. The assemblie was by this means dispersed, and the legat fled and got him out of the waie, as he might with shame enough, which is the common panion and waiting-woman of pride, as one verie well said, Cito ignominia fit superbi gloria.

After this, followed appealing, the archbishop of Poike appealed to Rome, and the legat also for his owne safegard appealed the archbishop of Canturburie vnto Rome, which archbishop submitting himselfe and his cause vnder the popes protection, made a like solenne appeale from the legat to the pope. The legat perceiuing that the matter went otherwise than he wished, and seeing little remedie to be had at that present, gaue ouer his legatship as it had bene of his owne accord, though greatlie against his will, and prepared himselfe to depart. Neuerthelesse, through mediation of friends that toke paines betwixt them, they gaue ouer their appeales on either side, and dissembled the displeasures which they had conceiued either against other, but yet the conuocation was dissolved for that time, and the two archbishops presented their complaints to the king, who kept his Casser this yeare at Winchester, and about the same time or shortly after, licenced his sonne Henrie to saile ouer into Normandie, meaning shortlie after to go vnto Compostella in Spaine, to visit the bodie of saint James the apostle, but being otherwise aduised by his fathers letters, he discontinued his purpose and staid at home.

The same yeare, the ladie Johan the kings daughter was giuen in marriage vnto William king of Sicill. Also the same yeare died the lord cheefe iustice of Ireland, Robert earle of Striguill otherwise Chepfolm, then was William Fitzaldelme ordeined lord cheefe iustice in his place, who seized into the kings hands all those fortresses which the said earle of Striguill held within the realme of Ireland. The Irishmen also paid to the king a tribute of twelue pence pearelie for enerie house, or else for euerie yoke of oxen which they had of their owne. William earle of Arundell died also this yeare at Wauerley, and was buried at Wintonham.

This yeare, when it might haue bene thought that all things were forgotten touching the rebellious attempts made against king Henrie the father by his sons, and other (as before ye haue heard) he caused the walls both of the towne and castell of Leicester to be rased, and all such castels and places of strength as had bene kept against him during the time of that rebellion, to be likewise ouerthrowne and made plaine with the ground, as the castels of Huntington, Waleton, Crowby, Wep, Stutesbirrie or Stedebirrie, Malafert, the new castell of Allerton, the castels of Fremingham and Bungey, with diuers other both in England and Normandie. But the castels of Walsie, and Mountferrat he retained in his owne hands as his of right, being so found by a iurie of freholders impanelled there in the countrie; further, he seized into his hands all the other castels of bishops, earles and barons, both in England and Normandie, appointing keepers in them at his pleasure. This yeare also he married his daughter Elianor vnto Alonse king of Castile.

Whereafter, Gilbert the sonne of Fergus lord of Galloway, who had slaine his brother Althez cosen to king Henrie, came this yeare into England, vnder conduct of William king of Scotland, and became king Henrie the fathers man, swearing fealtie to him against all men: and to haue his loue and fauour gaue him a thousand marks of siluer, and deliuered into his hands his son Duncane as a pledge. It is to be remembred also, that in this yeare, Richard earle of Poitou sonne to king Henrie, fought with certeine Breabanders his enemies betwixt Sevegrine and Buteuille, where he overcame them.

¶ Here I haue thought good to aduertise the reader, that these men of war, whom we haue generalie in this part of our booke named Breabanders, we find them written in old copies diuerslie, as Breabazones, Brebanceni, and Brebationes, the which for so much as I haue found them by the learned translated Breabanders, and that the French word somethat yeldeth thereto, I haue likewise so named them: wherein whether I haue erred or not, I must submit mine opinion to the learned & skillfull searchers of such points of antiquities. For to confesse in plaine truth mine ignorance, or rather vnresolved doubt herein, I can not satisfie my selfe with any thing that I haue read, whereby to assure my coniecture what to make of them, although verelie it may be, and the likelihood is great, that the Breabanders in those daies for their trained skill and vsuall practise in warlike feats, wan themselves a name, whereby not onelie those that were naturallie borne in Brebant, but such also as serued amongst them, or else vied the same warlike furniture, order, trade and discipline, which was in vse among them, passed in that age vnder the name of Breabanders. Or else I must thinke, that by reason of some old kind of ba-bit of other speciall cause, a certeine sort of souldiers purchased to themselves the privilege of that name, so to be called Brabanceni or Brebatones (where ye will) as hath chanced to the Lanquenety and Keisters in our time, and likewise to the companions Arminaces and Escorthers in the daies of our forefathers, and as in all ages likewise it hath continued amongst men of warre. Which if it so chanced to these Brabanceni, I know not then what countie-men to make them: for as I remember, Marchades that was a chiefe leader of such souldiers as were knowne by that name (as after ye shall heare) is reported by some authors to be a Brebatoncois.

It should seeme also that they were called by other names, as the Kronts (in Latine Ruparij) which name whether it came of a French word, as ye would say some vnrallie and headstrong companie, or of the Dutch word Kutters, that signifieth a rider, I cannot say. But it may suffice for the course of the historie to understand that they were a kind of hired souldiers, in those daies highly esteemed, and no lesse feared, in so much that against them and others there was an article contained among the decrees of the Laterane councill holden at Rome, in the yeare 1179, whereby all those were to be denounced accursed, which did hire, mainteine or any way nourish those Brebatones, Aragonois, Panarrois, Basques and Coterelles, which did so much hurt in the christi- an world in those daies.

But to returne where we left to earle Richard, beside the above mentioned victorie against those Brabanders, if we shall so take them; he also vanquished Hamerike vicount of Limoges, and William earle of Angouleme, with the vicounts of Clemtadoze and Cambanais, who attempted rebellion against him, whome earle Richard subdued, and tooke prisoners, with diverse castles and strong holds which they had fortified.

The departure of the legat fourth of the Realme. Liberties obtained for churchmen.

About the feast of Peter and Paule, the legat departed out of the realme, of whom we find that as he granted to the king some liberties against the privileges which the cleargie pretended to have a right unto: so he obtained of the king certeine grants in fauour of them and their order, as thus.

1 First, that for no offense, crime or transgression any spirituall person should be brought before a temporall iudge personallie, except for hunting, or for some laie sex, or that for which some temporall service was due to be payed, either to the king, or some other that was cheefe lord thereof.

2 Secondlie, that no archbishops sex, nor bishops sex, nor any abbaie should be kept in the kings hands more than one yeare, except upon some euident cause or necessitie constraining.

3 Thirdlie, that such as due any spirituall person, and were of such offense convicted, either by evidence or confession before the iustice of the realme in presence of the bishop, should be punished as the temporall law in such cases required.

4 Fourthlie, that spirituall men should not be compelled to fight in lists for the trial of any matter or cause whatsoeuer.

N. Triuet,

It should appeare by Nicholas Triuet, that the archbishop of Cantuarburie procured the bishops of Winchester, Ely, and Norwich, three prelates highly at that present in the kings fauour, to further these grants; namelie, that such as due any prelat or spirituall person might haue the law for it: where before, there was no punishment for a season used against such offenders but onelie excommunication. At now to leaue prelates, we will passe to other matters.

In this meane time, king Henrie the sonne remaining in Normandie, began to deuise new practises how to remove his father from the government and to take it to himselfe: but one of his seruants named Adam de Chereboudine being of his secret counsell, aduertised king Henrie the father thereof, for the which his maister king Henrie the sonne put him to great shame and rebuke, causing him to be stripped naked, and whipped round about the streets of the citie of Poitiers, where he then was upon his returne from his brother earle Richard, with whom he had bene to aid him against his enemies. King Henrie the father perceiving the naughtie mind of his sonne, and that he ceased not from his wilfull maliciousnesse, thought to dissemble all things, sith he saw no hope of amendment in him: but yet to be poulded against his wicked attempts, he furnished all his fortresses both in England and in Normandie with strong garisons of men, and all necessarie munition.

About this time, the sea rose on such a heighth, that manie men were drowned thereby. Also a great snow fell this yeare, which by reason of the hard frost that chanced therewith, continued long without wa-king away, so that fishes both in the sea and fresh water died through sharpenesse and vehemencie of that frost, neither could husbandmen till the ground. A soze eclipse of the sunne chanced also the first daies of Ianuarie. The monasterie of Westwood or Lel- nos was begun to be founded by Richard de Lucie Lord chiefe iustice. The same yeare also at Woodstocke the king made his sonne the lord Gessrey knight.

In the yeare 1177, king Henrie held his Christmas at Portsmouth, with his two sonnes Gessrey and John, his other two sonnes the yong king Henrie, and Richard earle of Poitou, were in the parts beyond the seas, as the king in Normandie, and the earle in Gascoigne, where he besieged the citie of Aques, which the vicount of Aques and the earle of Wigore had fortified against him, but he wan it within ten daies after his coming thither. Within the like terme also he wan the citie of Baion, which Arnold Berthram had fortified against him, and coming to the uttermost frontiers of that countie adioining to Spaine, he tooke a castell called saint Piero which he destroyed, and constrained the Basques and Panarrois to receiue an oth, that from thenceforth they should suffer passengers quietlie to come and go through their countie, and that they should liue in quiet and keepe peace one with another, and so he reformed the state of that countie, and caused them to renounce manie euill custumes which they before that time had vnlawfullie used.

Moreouer, king Henrie, to auoid further slander, placed for bishop in the see of Lincolne a bastard son which he had named Gessrey, after he had kept that bishopricke in his hands so long till he had almost clerelic destroyed it. And his sonne that was now made bishop to helpe the matter for his part, made haucke in wastling and spending in riotous manner the goods of that church, and in the end forsoke his miter, and left the see againe in the kings hands to make his best of it.

Furthermore, the king in times past made a voto to build a new monasterie in satisfaction of his offenses committed against Thomas the archbishop of Cantuarburie: wherefore he required of the bishops and other spirituall fathers, to haue some place by them assigned, where he might begin that foundation. But whilste they should haue taken aduise here- in, he secretly practised with the cardinals, and with diuerse other bishops, that he might remove the secular canons out of the colledge at Waltham, and place therein regular canons, so to saue monie in his costs, coffers, planting in another mans vineyard. Howbeit, because it should not be thought he did this of such a courteous meaning, he promised to give great possessions to that house, which he after but slenderly performed, though upon licence obtained at the bishops hands, he displaced the præfils, and brought in to their romes the canons as it were by waite of exchange.

The same yeare also he thrust the nunnes of Amesburie out of their house, because of their incontinent living, in abusing their bodies greatly to their reproch, and bestowed them in other monasteries to be kept in more straightlie. And their house was committed unto the abbess and countess of Founte-mered, who sent over certeine of their number to furnish the house of Amesburie, wherein they were placed by the archbishop of Canturburie, in the presence of the king and a great number of others.

Philip earle of Flanders by sending over ambassadours to king Henrie, promised that he would not bestow his two daughters to his brother Marthe earle of Bullongne, without consent of the same king: but shortly after he forgot his promise, & married the elder of them to the duke of Zaringes, & the younger to Henrie duke of Louaine.

John de Curcie lord chiefe iustice of Ireland discomfiting a power of Irishmen, wan the citie of Dun in Alneftre, where the bodies of S. Patrike and S. Colme confessors, and S. Brigit the virgin are buried, for the taking of which citie, Roderike king of Alneftre being sore offended, raised a mighty host, and coming into the field, fought with the lord chiefe iustice, and in the end received & took the overthow at his hands, although the lord chiefe iustice at that encounter lost no small number of his men. Amongst prisoners that were taken, the bishop of Dun was one, whom yet the lord chiefe iustice released and set at libertie, in respect of a request and suit made to him by a cardinall the popes legat that was there in Ireland at that time.

This cardinals name was Aluiano, intituled the cardinall of S. Stephan in Mount Celio; he was sent from the pope the yeare before, and coming into England, though without licence, was pardoned upon knowledge of his fault for his entring without the kings leave first obtained, and so permitted to go into Scotland, whither as also into other the north-west regions, he was sent as legat, authorized from the pope. Now when he had ended his businesse in Scotland, he passed over into Man, and there held his Christmas with Cathred king of Man, and after the feast of the Epiphanie, sailed from thence into Ireland, and chanced the same time that the Englishmen invaded that countrie, to be in the citie of Dun, where he was received of the king & bishops of that land with great reverence.

The invasion then of the Englishmen being signified to them of the countrie aforehand, they asked counsell of the legat what he thought best to be done in that matter; who straightwaies told them, that they ought to fight in defense of their countrie, and at their setting forward, he gave them his benediction in waite of their good speed. But they coming as ye have heard to encounter with the Englishmen, were put to flight, and beaten backe into the citie, which was herewith also wone by the Englishmen, so that the Romane legat was glad to get him into the church for his more safeguard, and like a wise fellow had provided afore hand for such haps if they chanced, having there with him the king of Englands letters directed to the captains in Ireland in the legats favour, so that by the assistance and authority of the same, he went to Dublin, and there (in the name of the pope and the king of England) held a councell.

But when he began to practise, after the manner of legats in those daies, somewhat largelie for his owne advantage, in the churches of that simple rude countrie, the English captains commanded him either to depart, or else to go forth to the wars with them: whereupon he returned into Scotland, having his bags well stuffed with Irish gold, for the which it seemed he greatly thirsted.

¶ There we have to note the drift of the pope and all popelings to be far otherwaies than they pretend. For who, unless he will be wilfullie ignorant knoweth not, that he and his never attempt any thing, but the same beareth the help and colour of holinesse and honestie: Hereto tend the sendings out of his legats and cardinals to make pacifications, to redresse disorders, to appease tumults, & I wot not what infinit enormities (for he must have his ore in euerie mans bote, his spone in euerie mans dish, and his fingers in euerie mans purse) but the end and scope of all his doings consisteth in this, namely, to set himselfe above all sovereignty, to purchase and assure to himselfe an absolute and supremement jurisdiction, to rob christian kingdomes, to impoverish churches, chapels, and religious places. Our chronicles are full of these his pranks, and here we have one practised by a lim of his, who as you see, verie impudentlie and licentiouslie preyed upon the church-goods, and converted the same to his owne profit and commoditie: which he had if not trembled, yet blushed to do, considering that the goods of the church are the treasure of Christ (or at leastwise ought to be) and that none ought to alienate or change the proprietie of such goods, as the canon law hath provided. Besides, the which ought to have remembered that which euen the verie pagans did not forget; namely,

Nudus ad infernas fultus vchererates.*

P. 117. b. 3.

But now to the doings of John de Curcie, and of those Englishmen that were with him, who did not onelie defend such places as they had wone out of the Irishmens hands against those kings and their powers, but also enlarged daile more and more their frontiers, and wan the towne of Armagh, wherein is the metropolitane see of all that land, with the whole prouince thereto belonging.

About the same time came ambassadours unto king Henrie from Alfonse king of Castile and Gasias king of Nauarre, to aduertise him, that in a controuersie risen betwixt the said two kings touching the possession of certeine grounds nere unto the confines of their realms, they had chosen him for iudge by compromise, promising upon their othes to stand unto & abide his order and decree therein. Wherefore they required him to end the matter by his authority, sith they had wholie put it to his iudgement. Furthermore, either king had sent a most able and valiant knight furnished with horse and armour ready in their princes cause to fight the combat, if king Henrie should hapilie commit the trial of their quarrell unto the iudgement of battell. King Henrie gladly accepted their request, so that thereby on calling his counsellors together, he consulted with them of the thing, and hearing euerie mans opinion, at length he gave iudgement so with the one, that the other was contented to be agreeable thereto.

Within a while after, Philip earle of Flanders came over into England to do his deuotions at the towe of Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, of whom the most part of men then had conceived an opinion of such holinesse, that they reputed him for a saint. The king met him there, and verie frendlie entertained him, and because he was appointed shortly after to go over into the holie land to war against Gods enemies, the king gaue him fine hundred marks in reward, and licenced William Handenile earle of Essex to go in that iourneie with other lordes, knights and men of warre of sundrie nations that were of his dominions.

The king then returning vnto London, toke order for the establishing of things touching the suertie of the realme, and his owne estate. And first he appointed the custodie of such castels as were of most importance by their situation, vnto the keeping of certeyne worthie capitaine. So sir William de Stuteville he assigned the custodie of Rochefburgh castell, to sir Roger de Stuteville the castell of Edenburgh, to sir William Penulle the castell of Porham, to sir Gessie Penulle the castell of Berwikke, and to the archbishop of Yorke he deliuered the castell of Scarborough, and sir Roger Conie. s he made capitaine of the tower of Durham, which he had taken from the bishop, because he had shewed himselfe an vnstedfast man in the time of the ciuill warre, and therefore to haue the kings fauour againe, he gaue to him two thousand marks, with condition that his castels might stand, and that his sonne Henrie de Putley alias Pudsey, might enioy one of the kings manors places called Wighton.

After this, the king went to Drenford, and there held a parlement, at the which he created his sonne John king of Ireland, hauing a grant and confirmation thereto from pope Alexander. About the same time it rained blood in the Ile of Wight, by the space of two daies together, so that linen clothes that hong on the hedges were coloured therewith: which vnused wonder caused the people, as the manner is, to suspect some euill of the said Johns gouernement.

Moreover, to this parlement holden at Drenford, all the chiefe rulers and gouernours of Southwailes and Northwailes repaired, and became the king of Englands liege men, swearing fealtie to him against all men. Whereupon he gaue vnto Rice ap Griffin prince of Southwailes the land of Merioneth, and to David ap Owen he gaue the lands of Ellesmere. Also at the same time he gaue and confirmed vnto Hugh Lacie (as before is said) the land of Meth in Ireland with the appurtenances, for the seruice of an hundred knights or men of armes, to hold of him and of his sonne John by a charter which he made thereof. Also he diuided there the lands and possessions of Ireland with the seruices to his subjects, as well of England as Ireland, appointing some to hold by seruice to find fortie knights or men of armes, and some thirtie, and so forth.

Vnto two Irish lordes he granted the kingdome of Corke for the seruice of fortie knights, and to other thre lordes he gaue the kingdome of Limerike for the seruice of the like number of knights to be held of him & his sonne John, reseruing to himselfe & to his heires the citie of Limerike with one cantred. To William Fitz Adeline his sewer, he gaue the citie of Waterford with the appurtenances and seruices: and to Robert de Poer his marshall, he gaue the citie of Waterford, and to Hugh Lacie, he committed the safe keeping of the citie of Ducline. And these persons, to whom such gifts and assignations were made, receiued othes of fealtie to beare their allegiance vnto him and to his sonne for those lands and possessions in Ireland, in maner and forme as was requisite.

The cardinall Adrian hauing dispatched his business in Ireland, came backe into England, and by the kings safe conduct returned againe into Scotland, where in a counsell holden at Edenburgh, he suspended the bishop of Whiterne, because he did refuse to come to that counsell: but the bishop made no account of that suspension, hauing a defense good enough by the bishop of Yorke, whose suffragane he was.

After the king had dissolved and broken vp his parlement at Drenford, he came to Harleborough, and there granted vnto Philip de Beause all the kingdome of Limerike for the seruice of fortie knights: for Hubert and William the bryethren of Keignold earle of Cornwall, and John de la Pomeray their nephue, refused the gift thereof, because it was not as yet conquered. For the king thereof, surnamed Monoculus, that is, with one eie, who had held that kingdome of the king of England, being latelie slaine, one of his kinsmen got possession of that kingdome, and held it without acknowledging any subiection to king Henrie, nor would obeye his officers, because of the losses and damages which they did practise against the Irish people, without occasion (as they alleadged) by reason thereof the king of Corke also rebelled against the king of England and his people, and so that realme was full of trouble.

The same season, queene Margaret the wife of king Henrie the sonne was deliuered of a man child which liued not past thre daies. In that time there was also through all England a great multitude of Jewes, and because they had no place appointed them where to burie those that died, but onelie at London, they were constrained to bring all their dead corpses thither from all parts of the realme. To ease them therfore of that inconuenience, they obtained of king Henrie a grant, to haue a place assigned them in euerie quarter where they dwelled, to burie their dead bodies. The same yeare was the bodie of S. Amphibulus the martyr, who was instructor to saint Albone found, not farre from the towne of S. Albones, and there in the monasterie of that towne buried with great and solemne ceremonies.

In the meane time, king Henrie passed oner into Normandie, hearing that the old grudge betwixt him & king Leloes began to be renewed vpon this occasion, that whereas king Henrie had receiued the French kings daughter Alice, promised in mariage vnto his sonne Richard, to remaine in England with him, till the were able to companie with his husband, king Henrie being of a dissolute life, and giuen much to the pleasure of the bodie (a vice which was graced in the bone and therefore like to sticke fast in the flesh, for as it is said, Quod natus res la caput inueterata capit) at leastwise (as the French king suspected) began to fantasie the yong ladie, and by such wanton talke and companie keeping as he used with hir, he was thought to haue brought hir to consent to his fleshlie lust, which was the cause wherefore he would not suffer his sonne to marrie hir, being not of ripe yeares nor viripotent or mariable. Wherefore the French king imagining (vpon consideration of the other kings former lose life) what an inconuenience & infamie might redound to him and his, be thought himselfe that Turpe senex miles turpe senilis amor, and therefore daemed iustlie that such a vile reproch wrought against him in his blood, was in no wise to be suffered, but rather prevented, resisted & withstood. Whereupon he complained to the pope, who for redresse thereof, sent one Peter a preest & cardinall intituled of saint Crisogone as legat from him into France, with commission to put Normandie and all the lands that belonged to king Henrie vnder interdiction, if he would not suffer the mariage to be solemnized without delaiue betwixt his sonne Richard and Alice the French kings daughter. The king aduertised hereof, came to a communication with the French king at Paris, vpon the 21. of September, and there offered to cause the marriage to be solemnized out of hand, if the French king would give in marriage with his daughter the cite of Burges, with all the appurtenances as it was accorded, and also unto his sonne king Henrie the countrie of Neulgeine, that is to say, all the land betwixt Bisoys and Bussie, as he had likewise coucnanted.

But because the French king refused so to do, king Henrie would not suffer his sonne Richard to marrie his daughter Alice: howbeit at this enterbrow of the two princes, by the helpe of the cardinall, and other noble men of both sides, they agreed to be friends, and that if they could not take order betwixt them, to end all matters touching the controuersies depending betwixt them for the lands in Auvergne and Berry, and for the fee of Chateau Kaoul; then should the matter be put to twelve persons, six on the one side, and six on the other, authorising them to compound and finish that controuersie and all other which might rise betwixt them. For the French king these were named, the bishops of Claremont, Preuers, and Trois; and three barons, erle Theobald, Robert, and Peter de Courtneie, the kings brethren. For the king of England were named the bishops of Pauns, Bergegozt, and Paunts; with three barons also, Maurice de Croume, William Paigot and Peter de Mountabell.

At the same time also, both these kings promised and undertooke to ioine their powers together, and to go into the holie land to aid Guido king of Ierusalem, whom the Saracen Saladine king of Aegypt did sore oppresse with continuall and most cruell war. This done, the French king returned home, and king Henrie came to Wernuell, where he made this ordinance, that no man should trouble the vassall or tenant, as we may call them, for his lords debt.

After this, king Henrie went into Berry, and toke Chateau Rour or Kaoul, and marching towards Castre, the lord of that towne came and met him on the waie, surrendering into his hands the daughter of Rafe de Dolis latelie before deceased, whom the king gaue unto Baldwine de Riuers, with the honour of Chateau Rour or Kaoul. Then went he unto Crauidemont, where Audebert earle of March came vnto him, and sold to him the whole countrie of March for the summe of sixtene thousand pounds Antonin, twentie mules, and twentie palfreys. The charters of this grant and sale made and giuen vnder the seale of the said earle of March, bare date in the moneth of September Anno Christi 1177. Then did the king receiue the fealtie and homages of all the barons and knights of the countrie of March, after he had satisfied, contented, and paid the monie vnto the earle according to the coucnants.

The king this yeare held his Christmas at Angiers, and meaning shortly after to returne into England, he sent to the French king for letters of protection, which were granted, and sent to him in forme as followeth.

The tenour of the French kings letters of protection.

*L*udovicus rex Francorum, omnibus ad quos presentes littere peruenierint salutem. Lewes king of France, to all those to whom these present letters shall come greeting. Know all ye that we haue receiued into our protection & custodie all the lands of Henrie king of England our deare brother, lieng and being in the parts of this side the sea, if it chance him to passe ouer into England, or to go any waie forth from home, so that when the bailiues of his lands on this hither side the sea shall require vs, we shall helpe them and counsell them faithfully and without male-engine for defense and protection of the same lands. Giuen at Nicens.

Shortly after, king Henrie returned into England from Normandie, and at Woodstocke made his sonne Geoffrey knight. This yeare pope Alexander sent into all parts legats to summon the bishops and prelates to a generall councell to be holden at Rome in the beginning of the Lent in the yere next following. Whereabout two legats came into England, the one named Albert de Suma, who had in commission to summon them of England and Normandie; and the other called Petro de Santa Agatha, who was appointed to summon them of Scotland, Ireland, and the Isles about the same: whereupon obtaining licence to passe through the king of Englands dominions, he was constrained to sweare vpon the holie euangelists, that he should not attempt any thing in his legatship that might be hurtfull to the king or his realme, and that he should come and visit the king againe as he returned homewards.

This yeare on the Sunday before the nativite of S. John Baptist, being the 18 of June, after the setting of the sunne, there appeared a marvellous light in the aire vnto certaine persons that beheld the same. For whereas the new mone shone forth verie faire with his hornes towards the east, straightwaies the upper horne was diuided into two, out of the mids of which diuision a burning bzard sprang vp, casting from it a farre off coles and sparkes, as it had borne of fire. The bodie of the mone in the meane time that was beneath, seemed to waxe and wryth in resemblance like to an adder or snake that had bene beaten, and anon after it came to the old state againe. This chanced about a dozen times, and at length from horne to horne it became blacke.

In September following, the mone being about 27 daies old, at six of the clocke, a partile eclipse of the sunne happened, for the bodie thereof appeared as it were horned, shooting the horns towards the west as the mone dooth; being twentie daies old. The residue of the compasse of it was couered with a blacke roundell, which comming downe by little and little, threw about the horned brightnesse that remained, till both the hornes came to hang downe on either side to the earthwards; and as the blacke roundell went by little & little forwarde, the hornes at length were turned towards the west, and so the blacknesse passing awaie, the sunne receiued his brightnesse againe. In the meane time, the aire being full of clouds of diuerse colours, as red, yellow, Greene, and pale, holpe the peoples sight with more ease to discern the maner of it.

The king this yeare held his Christmas at Winchester, at which time newes came abroad of a great wonder that had chanced at a place called Wrenhale, within the lordship of Derlington, in which place a part of the earth lifted it selfe vp on high in appearance like to a mightie towre, and so it remained from nine of the clocke in the morning, till the euen tide, and then it fell downe with an horrible noise, so that as such as were thereabout, were put in great feare. That peece of earth with the fall was swallowed ed by, leauing a great dēpe pit in the place, as was to be seene many yeares after.

Touching these celestiall apparitions, the common doctrine of philosophie is, that they be mere naturall, and therefore of no great admiration. For of eclipses, as well such as are proper to the sunne, as also those that are peculiar to the mone, the position is not so generallie deliuered, as it is konstantlie belieued. For the philosophers giue this reason of eclipses.

— radios Phœbi luna interiecta repellit, Nec sinit in terras clarum descendere lucem.
Quippe aliud non est quam terræ atque æquoris umbra, Quæ si forte ferit nocturnæ corpora lune, Eclipsin facit.

In so much as obseruing them to be ordinarie accidents, they are ouerpasse and nothing regarded. Howbeit Lucane maketh a great matter of eclipses, and of other strange sights preceeding the bloody battels betwene Pompeie and Cesar; intimating thereby, that prodigious wonders, and other rare and vnaccustomed accidents are significations of some notable euent ensuing, either to some great personage, to the common-wealth, or to the state of the church. And therefore it is a matter worth the marking, to compare effects following with signes and wonders before going; since they haue a doctrine in them of no small importance. For not many yeares after, the kings glorie was darkened on earth, nay his pompe and roiall state toke end; a prediction whereof might be imposed by the extraordinary eclipse of the sunne, a beautifull creature, and the ornament of the skie.

Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and Catholikus the archbishop of Tuam, with fise or six other Irish bishops, and diuerse both bishops and abbats of Scotland, passed through England towards the generall councill, and withall toke their oth, that they wuld not procure any damage to the king or realme of England. There went but onelie foure bishops out of England, to wit, Hugh Butley or Pudley bishop of Durham, John bishop of Norwich, Keigbold bishop of Bath, and Robert bishop of Hereford, beside abbats: for the English bishops firmed stood in it, that there ought but foure bish. onlie to go forth of England to any generall councill called by the pope. This yeare Richard de Lincle lord chiefe iustice of England gaue ouer his office, and became a canon in the abbey of Westwood or Leshos, which he had founded, and built vpon his owne ground, enuoluing it with great reuenues, and in Julie after he died there.

The mone eclipsed. The French is, commeth a madding to visit the archbishop Sec-kers towne.

King Henrie the father called a parlement at Windsoze, at the which was present king Henrie the sonne, and a great number of lords, earles and barons. At this parlement, order was taken for partition of the realme, so that it was diuided into foure parts, certeine sage personages being allotted vnto euerie part to gouerne the same, but not by the name of iustices, albeit that Ranulfe de Glanville was made ruler of Northshire, & authorized iustice there, as he that best vnderstood in those daies the ancient lawes and customes of the realme. The same yeare, Cestrey earle of Britaine by his fathers commandement leied an armie, and passing ouer into Britaine, wasted the lands of Guideron de Leons, and constrained him to submit himselfe vnto him.

The 18. day of August, the mone was eclipsed, which was seene of king Henrie and his companie as he rode all that night towards Douer there to meet the French king, who was coming towards England to visit the towne of archbishop Thomas Becket, as he had before time vowed. He landed at Douer the 22. day of August. There came ouer with him

Henrie duke of Louaine, Philip earle of Flanders, Baldwin earle of Guines, earle William de Span-deuille, and diuerse other earles, lords, barons and knights; whome king Henrie was readie to receiue at the water side, and the morow after brought them with great honoz to Canturburie, where they were with due reuerence and vnspokeable ioy receiued of archbishop Richard, and diuerse other bishops there assembled together with the couent of 10 Christes church, and an infinit multitude of Nobles and gentlemen. The French king offered vpon the towne of the said archbishop Thomas, a rich cup of gold; and gaue to the monks there an hundred tuns of wine to be receiued yearelie of his gift for euer at Poisse in France. Further he granted to the same monks, that whatsoever was bought in his dominions of France to their vse, should be free from toll, tallage, and paing any manner of excise for the same. These grants he confirmed with his charter thereof, made & deliuered to them by the hands of Hugh Butley, son to the bishop of Duresme that was his chancelor, king Lewes hauing performed his vot, and receiued manie rich gifts of king Henrie, returned home into France, and shortly after causing his sonne to be crowned king, resigned the gouernment to him (as by some writers appeareth.) About the same time, Cadwallon prince of Wales, being brought before the king to make his answer to diuerse accusations exhibited against him, as he returned toward his countrie vnder the kings safe conduct, was laid for by his enemies, and slaine, to the kings great slander, though he were not gilty in the matter. After this, king Henrie the father held his Christmasse at Nottingham, and William king of Scotland with him.

40 The same yeare fell discord betwixt the young king of France, and his mother and vncles, his bethzen, earle Theobald and earle Stephan, who thinking themselves not well bled, procured king Henrie the sonne to ioin with them in friendship, and to go ouer into England to purchase his fathers assistance in their behalfe against their nephue. Who being come ouer to his father, informed him of the whole matter, and did so much by his earnest suit therein, that before the feast of Easter, his father went ouer with him into Normandie, and immediatlie vpon their arrivall in those parts, the old French quene, mother to the young king Philip, with their bethzen the said earles, and manie other Noble men of France, came vnto him, and concluding a league with him, deliuered hostages into his hands, and receiued an oth to follow his counsell and aduice in all things.

Discord betwixt the French is, and his nobles.

Herevpon king Henrie assembled a great armie, in purpose after Easter to invade the French kings dominions: but before any great exploit was made, he came to an enteruue with the new king of France, betwixt Gisors and Treodfont, where partlie by gentle words, and partlie by threatnings which king Henrie bled for persuation, the French king relealed all his indignation conceiued against his mother and vncles, and receiued them againe into his fauour, coucnanting to allow his mother for euerie day towards his expenses seven pounds of Paris monie, during his father king Lewes his life time; and after his death, she should inioy all his dower, except the castles which king Philip might retaine still in his hands. Also at this assemble, king Henrie the father in the presence of the French king, receiued homage of Philip earle of Flanders, and granted to him for the same a thousand markes of silver, to be receiued yearelie out of the chequer at London, so that in consideration thereof he should find five hundred knights or men of armes, to serue the king of England for the space of 40. daies, when

Moreover, the two kings at this assemblie concluded a league together, and whereas certeine lands were in controuersie betwixt them, as the fie of Chateau, Raoul, and other small fees, if they could not agree among themselves concerning the same, either of them was contented to commit the order thereof, and of all other controuersies betwixt them vnto six bishops, to be chosen indifferentlie betwixt them, the one to chuse three, and the other three.

In this yeare, or (as the annales of Aquitaine say) in the yeare last passed, Richard earle of Poitou subdued the strong fortreffe of Tailbourg, which was iudged before that time inexpugnable: but earle Richard oppressed them that kept it so feze with strenght siege, that first in a desperate mood they issued forth, and assailed his people verie valiantlie, but yet nevertheless they were beaten backe, and forced to retire into their fortreffe, which finallie they surrendered into the hands of earle Richard, who caused the wals thereof to be rased. The like fortune chanced to diuers other castles and fortreffes that stood in rebellion against him within a moneth space.

Tailbourg belonged vnto one Geoffrey de Harcin, who of a proud and loftie stomach practising rebellion against duke Richard, took this enterprise in hand, and when he had atchiued the same to his owne contentation, he passed ouer into England, and was receiued with great triumph, pompe & magnificence.

King Henrie the father, whilst he was at Spaine after Christmase made this ordinance, that euerie man being worth in goods to the value of an hundred pounds Anouin, should keepe one horse able for service in the wars, and complet armour for a knight or man of armes, as we may rather call them. Also that such as had goods worth in value from 40. pounds to 25. of the same monie, should at the least haue in his house for his furniture an harbergeon, a cap of steele, a speare, and a sword, or bowe and arrowes. Further more he ordeined, that no man might sell or late to gage his armour and weapen, but should be bound to leaue it to his next heire. When the French king and the earle of Flanders were aduertised that king Henrie had made this ordinance amongst his subiects, they gaue commandement that their people should be armed after the like manner.

This yeare after Candlemasse, Laurence archbishop of Dublin came ouer to the king into Normandie, and brought with him the son of Roderike king of Conagh, to remaine with him as a pledge, for performance of covenants passed betwixt them, as the payment of tribute and such like. The said archbishop died there in Normandie, whereupon the king sent Geoffrey de Haie one of his chaplains, and chapleine also to Alerius the popes legat into Ireland, to seize that archbishops see into his hands. He also sent John Lacie constable of Chester, and Richard de Peake, to haue the citie of Dublin in keeping, which Hugh Lacie had in charge before, and now was discharged, because the king took displeasure with him, for that without his licence he had married a daughter of the king of Conagh, according to the manner of that countrie.

This yeare also, Geoffrey the kings bassard sonne, who was the elce of Lincolne, and had receiued the profits of that bishopricke by the space of seuen years, and had his election confirmed by the pope in the feast of the Epiphanie at Harlebridge, in presence of the king and bishops renounced that preferment, of his owne free will. Within a while after the pope sent a streit commandement vnto Richard archbishop of Canturburie, either to cause the same Geoffrey by the censure of the church to renounce his miter, or else to take vpon him the order of priesthood. Wherefore vpon good aduice taken in the matter with his father and other of his especiall friends, iudging himselfe insufficient for the one, he was contented to part with the other; and thereupon wrote letters vnto the said archbishop of Canturburie, in forme as followeth.

A letter of Geoffrey the kings base sonne elect of Lincolne to Richard archbishop of Canturburie.

Menerabili patri Richardo Dei gratia Cantuariensi archiepiscopo apostolica sedis legato, Galfridus domini regis Anglie filius & cancellarius salutem & reuerentiam debitam ac deuotam. Placuit maiestati apostolica vestre iniungere sanctitati, ut me certo tempore vocaretis ad suscipiendum ordinem sacerdotis, & pontificalis officij dignitatem. Ego vero considerans quamplures episcopos maturiores ac promouitiores prudentia & atate vix tanta administrationi sufficere, nec sine periculo animarum suarum sui officium pontificatus ad perfectum explere, veritus sum onus importabile senioribus mihi imponere iuniori: faciens hæc non ex leuitate animi, sed ob reuerentiam sacramenti. Habito itaque tractatu super eo cum domino rege patre meo, dominis fratribus meisque rege & Picuensi & Britannorum comitibus: episcopis etiam Henrico Baiocensi, Frogerio Sagienensi, Reginaldo Batoniensi, Sefido Cicestrensi, qui presentes aderant, aliter de vita & statu meo disposui, volens patris mei obsequijs militare ad tempus, & ab episcopatibus abstinerere: omne itaque ius electionis inde & Lincolniensem episcopatum spontaneè libere, quietè, & integrè, in manu vestra pater sancte resigno, tam electionem quam episcopatus ablationem postulans à vobis, tanquam à metropolitano meo, & ad hoc ab apostolica sede specialiter delegato. Bene vale.

The king for his maintenance, now after he had resigned his bishopricke, gaue him 500. markes of yearelie rent in England, and as much in Normandie, and made him moreover lord chancellor.

This yeare also after Easter, the kings of England and France came to an enteruew together, at a place in the confines of their countries called by some writers Vadum Sancti Remigij, on a mondaye being the 17. of April, in which assemblie of those two princes, the knights templers and hospitallers presented to them letters directed from pope Alexander vnto all christian princes, aduertising them of the danger wherein the holie land stood at that present, if of the holie speedie remedie were not the sooner prouided. Wherefore he exhorted them to aduise their helping hand towards the relese thereof, granting vnto all such as would enterprise to go thither in person (to remaine there vpon defense of the countrie against the infidels) great pardon, as to those that did continue there the space of two yeeres, pardon of penance for all their sins, except theft, extortion, roberie, and blurie; in which cases restitution was to be made, if the parties were able to do it; if not, then he should be absolved as well for those things as for other. And those that remained one yeare in those parties were pardoned of halfe their whole penance due for all their sinnes. And to those that went to visit the holie sepulchre, he also granted great pardon, as remission of their sinnes, whether they came thither or peradventure died by the waie. He also granted his free indulgence vnto those that went to waie against the common, the professed and open enemies of our religion religion in the holie land, as his predecessors the popes Urbanus and Eugenius had granted in time past: and he receiued likewise their iurors, their children, their goods and possessions vnder the protection of S. Peter and the church of Rome.

The two kings hauing heard the popes letter s read, and taken god aduice thereof, promised by Gods fauour hostlie to prouide conuenient aid for relæse of the holie land, and of the christians as yet remaining in the same. This was the end of their communication for that time, and so they departed, the French king into France, and the king of England into Normandie.

In the meane time, by the king of Englands appointment, William king of Scotland went ouer into Normandie, and by the aduice and good admonition of king Henrie, he granted licence vnto two bishops of his realme of Scotland, to wit, Aberdene and saint Andrewes, to returne into Scotland, whom he had lately before banished, and driuen out of his realme. Whereafter, as king Henrie laie at Warke set ready to saile ouer into England, disoord fell betwixt the king of France and the erle of Flanders, so that the king of England at desire of the French king returned backe, and came vnto Gilsons, where the French king met him, and so did the erle of Flanders, betwixt whom vpon talkes had in the matter depending in controuersie, he made a concord, and then coming downe to Chirburge, he and the king of Scots in his companie passed ouer into England, landing at Portesmouthe the 26. of Iulie.

In ordinance for armour.

The king now being returned into England, ordeined a statute for armour and weapon to be had amongst his subiects here in this realme, which was thus. Euerie man that held a knights fee should be bound to haue a paire of curasses, an helmet, with shield and speare; and euerie knight or man of arms should haue as manie curasses, helmets, shields and speares as he held knights fees in demaine. Euerie man of the laitie hauing goods or reuenues to the value of sixteen marks, should haue one paire of curasses, an helmet, a speare, and a shield. And euerie free man of the laitie hauing goods in value worth ten marks, should haue an habergeon, a Steele cap, & a speare; and all burgeses, and the whole communalte of free men should haue a wantbais, a cap of Steele, and a speare.

Further it was ordeined, that euerie man thus bound to haue armour, should be sworn to haue the same before the feast of S. Hilarie, and to be true vnto king Henrie fitz emper, in defense of whome and of his realme they should keepe with them such armour and weapon, according to his precept and commandement thereof had and made. And no man being furnished with such armour, should sell, pledge, lend, or otherwile alien the same, neither may his lord by any means take the same from him, either by waile of forfeiture, by distresse or pledge, nor by any other means: and when any man died, hauing such armour, he shall leaue it to his heire, and if his heire be not of lawfull age to weare it into the field, then he that hath the custodie of his bodie shall haue the armour, and find an able man to weare it for him, till he come to age.

There might have no ormour,

If any burgesse of any good towne haue more armour than he ought to haue by this statute, he shall sell it or giue it to some man that may weare it in the kings seruice. No Jew might haue armour by this statute: but those that had anie, were appointed to sell the same to such as were inhabitants within the realme, for no man might sell or transport anie armour ouer the sea, without the kings licence. For the better execution of which ordinance, it was ordeined, that inquests should be taken by sufficient iurors, what they were that were able to haue armour by their abilitie in lands and goods. Also the law would, that none should be sworn to haue armour, except he were a free man of birth and blood.

The same yeare, the king being at Waltham, assigned an aid to the maintenance of the christian souldiers in the holie land, that is to wit, 42. thousand marks of siluer, and five hundred marks of gold. Hugh Boson otherwile called Keucloche the sonne of Ranulfe the second of that name earle of Chester, died this yeare, and was buried at Leke. He left behind him issue by his wife the countesse Beatrice daughter of Richard Lacie lord iustice of England, a sonne named Ranulfe, who succeeded him, being the first erle of Chester, & third of that name after the conquest. Besides this Ranulfe he had foure daughters by his said wife; to wit, Maude married to Dauid earle of Angus, Huntingdon and Galloway; Pa-bell coupled with William Daubignie earle of Arundell, Agnes married to William Ferrers earle of Derby, and Hauise joined with Robert Quincie earle of Lincoln.

The 21. of Nouember, Roger archbishop of Yorke died, who (when he perceiued himselfe in danger of death by force of that his last sicknesse) deliuered great summes of monie vnto certeine bishops and other graue personages to be distributed amongst poore people: but after his death, the king called for the monie, and seized it to his vse, alleadging a sentence giuen by the same archbishop in his life time, that no ecclesiasticall person might giue any thing by will, except he deuised the same whilst he was in perfect health: yet the bishop of Durham would not depart with foure hundred marks which he had receiued to distribute amongst the poore, alleadging that he dealt the same awaie before the archbishops death, and therefore he that would haue it againe, must go gather it by of them to whom he had distributed it, which he himselfe would in no wise do. But the king toke no small displeasure with this indiscreet answer, inasmuch that he seized the castell of Durham into his hands, and sought means to disquiet the said bishop by diuerse maner of waies.

The king held his Christmasse this yeare at Waltham, and afterwards sailed ouer into Normandie, because he heard that the king his sonne was gone to his brother in law king Philip, and began to practice euillones new trouble, which was true indeed: but yet at length he came backe, and was reconciled to his father, and toke an oth, that from thenceforth he would neuer swaue from him, nor demand more for his maintenance but an hundred pounds Annuall by the daie, and ten pounds a day of the same monie for his wife. His father granted this, and also covenanted, that within the tearme of one yeare he would giue him the seruices of an hundred knights. Nevertheless all this did little amend the matter, for though he set a new copie of countenance thereupon, yet he retained his old peruerse purpose in his discontented mind, hauing learned that

Qui nescit fingere nescit regere.

After this, king Henrie the father as a mediator betwixt the king of France, and the earle of Flanders touching controuersies betwixt them did so much in the matter, that he set them at one for that time.

About the same season, king Henrie the father sent William de Mandeville earle of Albemarle, and other ambassadoes vnto the emperour Frederike, to intreat for his sonne in law the duke of Saxonie, that he might be againe restored into his land, which could not be obtained: for he was already condemned to erile, but yet thus much to pleasure the king of England the emperour granted, that so manie as went with him out of their countrie, might re-

Shortlie after his coming thither, he gaue licence to the Noble men that were come thither with him, to returne home, and then he himselfe went into Spaine to visit the bodie of S. James the apostle. His wife being great with child, remained with his father in Normandie, and at Argenton she was deliuered of a sonne. This yere the Welshmen sue Ranulfe Poer thirfe of Gloucestershire. King Henrie held his Christmasse at Caen, with his three sons, Henrie the king, Richard earle of Poitou, and Geoffrey earle of Britaine. There was also Henrie duke of Saronie, with his wife and their children, besides the archbishops of Canturburie and Dublin, with other bishops earles and barons in great number.

Here would king Henrie the father, that his son the king should receiue homage of his brethren Richard earle of Poitou, and Geoffrey earle of Britaine. The earle of Britaine did not staie at the matter, but the earle of Poitou refused, alledging that it was not conuenient so long as their father liued, to acknowledge any superiortie to their brother: for as the fathers inheritance was due to the eldest sonne, so he claimed the lands which he held due to him in right of his mother. This deniall so much offended his brother the king, that afterwards when Richard would haue done homage, he would not receiue it, whereupon Richard departed from the court in great displeasure, & coming into Poitou, began to fortifie his castles & towne, that he might be in a readinesse to stand vpon his safegard, if his father or brethren should come to pursue him. King Henrie the sonne followed him, set on by the earles and barons of Poitou, which for the sharpe and cruel government of earle Richard, hated him mortally. Againe on the other side, the fauourable courtesie, seemlie personage, and other noble qualities which they saw in the yong king, moued them to take part with him against Richard, and shortlie after their brother Geoffrey came with a great armie in aid of his brother the king, in so much that earle Richard not knowing how to shift off the present danger, sent to his father for aid, who being verie sorie in his mind to see such vnnaturall dealing among his sonnes, gathered an armie and set forward.

He had a little before travelled to see them at one, in so much that where earle Richard held a castle named Claveaux, which after the fathers deceasse ought to remaine vnto king Henrie the son, vpon his complaint thereof made, the father did so much with the earle, that he surrendered it into his fathers hands. Immediatlie after all the three sonnes came to Angers, and there swore to be obedient vnto their fathers will, and to serue him against all men: whereupon he appointed them a daie to meet at Spirabell, where the barons of Guien should also be, vnto whom king Henrie the sonne had sworne to aid them against earle Richard. Herewith was earle Geoffrey sent vnto them to persuaade them to peace and quietnesse, and to come vnto Spirabell according to king Henrie the fathers appointment: but in stead of persuaading them to peace (contrarie to his oth so oftentimes receiued) he procured them to pursue the warre both against his father and his brother earle Richard: and no maruell for Male facta gratia nunquam bene coalescit.

King Henrie the sonne remaining with his father, shewed outwardlie that he wished for peace, but his meaning was all contrarie, and so obtained licence of his father to go vnto Limoges, that he might labour to reduce both his brother Geoffrey, and the barons of Guien vnto quietnesse. But such dissembling was put in practise by king Henrie, that when the father followed with an armie, and came vnto Limoges, in stead of receiuing him with hono, as it had bene their duties to haue done, they shot at him, and perced through his uppermost armour, so that both he and his sonne Richard were constrained to depart. Whobbeit afterwards he entered that citie, and coming forth of it againe to talke with his sonnes, those within Limoges effronies rebelled, so that certeine of them within, shot the horse whereon king Henrie the father rode into the head. And if it had so chanced, that the horse in casting vp his head had not receiued the blow, the arrow had light in the kings brest, to the great danger & perill of his person. Neither did his sonnes the king and his brother Geoffrey go about to see such an heinous attempt punished, but rather seemed to like well of it, and to mainteine those most malicious enemies of their ouerlign lord and father, for they ioined with them against him, although king Henrie the sonne made countenance to be willing to reconcile his brother and the barons of Guien to his father by waie of some agreement: but his double dealing was to manifest, although indeed he abused his fathers patience for a while, who was desirous of nothing more than to win his sonnes by some courteous means, and therefore diuerse times offered to pardon all offences committed by his enemies, at the suit of his sonne the king, who in deed offered himselfe now and then as an intreatour, but that was onelie to win time that his brother with such Brabanders and other souldiers as he had with him in aid, beside the forces of the barons of Guien, might worke the more mischief against their father and their brother earle Richard, in waisting and destroientg their countreies that stood steadfast on their side.

In the meane time Richard the archbishop of Canturburie, and diuerse other bishops and abbats both of England and Normandie assembled together at Caen, and in the abbey church of S. Stephan pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all those that did hinder and impeach their purpose, which was to haue peace and concord concluded betwixt the king and his sonnes, the same sonnes onlie out of the said sentence excepted.

Diuerse gifts were made by king Henrie the sonne, and his brother earle Geoffrey also to get monie for the payment of their souldiers, as spoiling of houses, and such like. But at length when things framed not to their purpose, and that the harme which they could do against their father was much lesse than they wished, if power had bene answerable to their wishes, king Henrie the sonne through indignation and displeasure (as some write) fell into a grievous sickness in a village called Spertell, not farre from Limoges, where his father late at siege.

At the first he was taken with an extreme fever, and after followed a sore fluxe. Now perceiving himselfe in danger of death, and that the physicians had given him ouer, he sent to his father (better late than neuer) confessing his trespasses committed against him, and required of all fatherlie loue to come & see him once before he died. But for that the father thought not good to commit himselfe into the hands of such vngratious persons as were about his sonne, he sent his ring vnto him in token of his blessing,

The bodie of the young king being buried at Rouen.

And whereas in his life time he had vowed to make a iourneie into the holie land against Gods enemies, and taken upon him the crosse for that intent, he deliuered it unto his familiar friend William Parthall to go thither with it in his stead. Moreover when he perceived present death at hand, he first confessed his sinnes secretlie, and after openly before sundrie bishops and men of religion, and received absolution in most humble wise. After this, he caused his fine clothes to be taken from him, and therewith a heare cloth to be put upon him, and after tying a cord about his necke, he said unto the bishops and others that stood by him: I deliuer my selfe an vnwor-thy and greuous sinner unto you the ministers of "God by this cord, beseeching our Lord Iesus Christ, "which pardoned the these confessing his faults on the "crosse, that through your prayers and for his great "mercies sake it may please him to be mercifull vnto "my soule; whereunto they all answered, Amen.
Then he said unto them, Draw me out of this bed with this cord, and laie me on that bed strawed with ashes (which he had of purpose prepared) and as he commanded so they did: and they laid at his feet and at his head two great square stones. Thus being prepared to die, he willed his bodie after his deceasse to be conueied into Normandie, and buried at Rouen.
And so after he had receiued the sacrament of the bodie and bloud of our Lord, he departed this life as a foe is said, about the 28. yeare of his age.

His bodie after his death was conueied towards Rouen, there to be buried accordinglie as he had willed: but when those that had charge to conueie it thither were come vnto the citie of Mauns, the bishop there and the cleargie would not suffer them to go any further with it, but committed it to buriall in honourable wise within the church of saint Julian.
Whereof when the citizens of Rouen were aduertised, they were sore offended with that doing, and straightwaies sent vnto them of Mauns, requiring to haue the corpes deliuered, threatening other wise with manie earnest words to fetch it from them by force. Wherefore king Henrie, to set order in this matter, commanded that the corpes of his sonne the king should be deliuered vnto them of Rouen to be buried in their citie, as he himselfe had willed before his death. And so it was taken vp and conueied to Rouen, where it was at last buried in the church of our ladie.

Thus ended this young king in his flourishing youth, to whome though his owne iust deserts long life was iustlie denied, sith he delighted to begin his gouernment with vnlawfull attempts, as an other Absolon against his owne naturall father, seeking by wrongfull violence to pull the scepter out of his hand. He is not put in the number of kings, because he remained for the more part vnder the gouernance of his father, so that he rather bare the name of king as appointed to reigne, than that he may be said to haue reigned in deed. So that here by the waie a notable obseruation doth occurre and offer it selfe to be noted of vs; namely, that euen princes children, though borne to great excellencie, and in high degree of dignitie, are to consider with themselves, that not withstanding their statelie titles of souerainie, they haue a dutie to discharge vnto their parents, which if it be neglected, and that in place thereof disobedience is substituted, God himselfe (when politike lawes prouide not to punish such offenses) will take the cause in hand, & will potize vengeance vpon such vngenerous children. For he will be true of his word both in blessing and cursing, in blessing the dutifull child with long life and happie daies, and in cursing the obstinate and stoward with short life and vnfor-tunate daies, according to the tenure of his law. If this man had liued in the old Romans time, when aged persons were so reuerenced and honoured (much more parents) he had bene cut off in the prime of his disobedience, and present death had bene inflicted vpon him as a due and deserued reward; which Iudicial noteth excellentlie well in these words,

*Credebant hoc grande nefas, & morte piamdam, Si iuuenis vetulo non assurrexerat, & si Barbato cuiusq. puer licet ipse videret Plura domi farra, & maioris glandis acernus, Iuuen. sat. 13.

King Henrie (after his sonne the king was thus dead) enforced his power more earnestlie than before to winne the citie and castell of Limoges which he had besieged, and at length had them both surrendered into his hands, with all other castels and places of strength kept by his enemies in those parts, of the which some he furnished with garisons, and some he caused to be laied flat with the ground.

Limoges rendered to king Henrie.

There rose about the same time occasion of strife and variance betwixt king Henrie and the French king, about the enioieng of the countrie lieng vpon Gisors, called Neulquesne, on this side the riuer of Hept, which was giuen vnto king Henrie the sonne, in consideration of the marriage betwixt him and quene Margaret the French kings sister. For the French king now after the death of his brother in law king Henrie the sonne, required to haue the same restored vnto the crowne of France: but king Henrie was not willing to part with it. At length they met betwixt Trie and Gisors to talke of the matter, where they agreed that quene Margaret the widow of the late deceased king Henrie the son, should receiue yearelie during hir life 1750 pounds of Antouin monie at Paris, of king Henrie the father and his heires; in consideration whereof she should release and quit claime all hir right to those lands that were demanded, as Neulquesne and others. Shortly after, Westrey erle of Britaine came to his father, and submitting himselfe, was reconcil-led to him, and also to his brother Richard erle of Poitou. Also I find that king Henrie at an enter-taine had betwixt him and the French king at their accustomed place of meeting betwixt Trie and Gisors on saint Nicholas day, did his homage to the same French king for the lands which he held of him on that side the sea, which to do till then he had refused. The same yeare king Henrie held his Christmas at the citie of Mauns.

When the king had set the French king and the earle of Flanders at agreement for the controversie that chanced betwixt them about the lands of Mermendois, he passed through the earle of Flanders countie, and comming to Wiland, took ship and sailed ouer into England, landing at Dover the tenth day of June, with his daughter the dutches of Saronie, who was afterwards deliuered of a sonne at Winchester, and hir husband the duke of Saronie came also this yeare into England, and was iustlie receiued and honourable interteined of the king his father in law.

ding betwixt them, wherin the king did so much, that the archbishop forgave all injuries past, and so they were made friends. Also by the counsell of the same archbishop the king sent Hugh Poissant archdeacon of Liscur and others, ambassadours from him unto pope Lucius, that by his helpe there might be made some waie to obtaine a pardon for the said duke, and licence for him to returne into his countrie. Those that were sent demeaned themselves so discretly in doing their message, that the emperor comming where the pope then was, that is to say, at Verona in Italie, at the earnest suit of the said pope was contented to release all his euill will which he bare towards the duke, pardoned him for all things past, and licensed him now at length to returne home into his countrie, his condemnation of exile being clerlicke reuoked.

There died this yeare sundrie honorable personages, as Simon earle of Huntingdon son to Simon earle of Northampton, after whose decease the king gaue his earldome unto his brother Dauid, or (as Radulfus de Diceto saith) because the said Simon died without issue, the king gaue the earldome of Huntingdon unto William king of Scots sonne to earle Henrie that was sonne to king Dauid. Also the earle of Warwike died this yeare, and Thomas Fitz Bernard lord chiefe iustice of the forests, which came Alaine de Neuill had inioined before him. Now after the death of this Thomas Fitz Bernard, the king diuided his forests into sundrie quarters, and to euery quarter he appointed foure iustices, two of the spiritualtie, and two knights of the temporaltie, beside two generall wardens that were of his owne seruants, to be as surueyers aboue all other foresters of vert and venison, whose office was to see that no disorder nor spoile were committed within any grounds of warren contrarie to the assises of forests. Diuerse prelates died this yeare also, as foure bishops, to wit, Gerald surnamed la Buncelle bishop of Chester, Malcan bishop of Rochester, Joceline of Salisbury, and Bartholomew of Excester.

Besides these, diuerse abbats, & on the 16. of February died Richard archbishop of Canturburie in the 11. yeare after his first entring into the government of that see. His bodie was buried at Canturburie. He was noted to be a man of euill life, and was called the gods of that church inordinatlie. It was reported that before his death there appeared to him a vision, which said, Thou hast waisted the gods of the church, and I shall rot thee out of the earth. Whereupon he took such a feare, that he died within eight daies after. Then Baldwin who before was bishop of Worcester succeeded him, he was the 40. archbishop that had ruled the church of Canturburie. The king and bishops procured his election not without much adoe: for the monks pretending a right thereto, were soze against it. It is reported of him, that after he was made a white monke, he neuer eat flesh to his liues end. On a time an old woman met him, and asked him if it were true that he neuer eat any maner of flesh; It is true said he. It is false quoth she, for I had but one colw to find me with, and thy seruants haue taken hir from me. Whereunto he answered, that if it so were, he should haue as good a colw restored to hir by Gods grace as hir owne was. The same time also Margaret the wife of the late deceased king Henrie the son, returned into France to hir brother king Philip, and was after ioined in marriage with Bela king of Hungarie.

But after long digression to returne againe to our purpose. The king being aduertised of the destruction and spoile which the Welchmen daile did practise against his subiects, both in their persons and substance, assembled a mightie armie, and came with the same unto Worcester, meaning to inuade the enemies countries. But Kees ap Griffin fearing his puissance thus bent against him and other the leaders of the Welchmen, came by safeconduct unto Worcester, and there submitting himselfe, swore fealtie to the king, and became his liegeman, promising to bring his sonne and nephues unto him as pledges. But when (according to his promise) he would haue brought them, they refused to go with him, and so the matter rested for a time.

After this, king Henrie held his Christmasse at Windsor, and the same yeare Heraclius the patriarch of Jerusalem, and Roger master of the house of St. Johns of Jerusalem came into England, to make suit unto king Henrie for aid against the Saracens that daile wan from the christians, townes and holds in the holie land, taking and killing the people most miserable, as in the description of the holie land may more plainelie appeare, where the doings of Saladine the Saracen are touched. The patriarch made earnest request unto the king, proffering him the keies of the citie of Jerusalem, and of the holie sepulchre (with the letters of Lucius the thirde then pope of Rome) charging him to take vpon him the iourne, and to haue mind of the oth which before time he had made.

The king deferred his answer for a time, and calling a counsell of his lords together at Clerkenwell, on the 15. of Aprill, asked their aduise in this matter: who declared to him, that as they took it, he might not well depart so far out of his realme and other dominions, leaving the same as a prey to his enemies. And whereas it was thought by some, that he might appoint one of his sonnes to take vpon him that iourne, yet because they were not as then with in the realme, it was iudged that in their absence there was no reason why it should be so decreed.

Notwithstanding in the meane time vpon licence granted by the king, that so manie might go as would, Baldwin the archbishop of Canturburie preached, and exhorted men to take vpon them the crosse to effectualie, that a great number receiuing it, fullie purposed to go on in that iourne. At length the king gaue answer to the patriarch, excusing himselfe in that he could go, for he declared that he might not leaue his land without keeping, being in danger to remaine as a prey to the robberie and spoile of the French men: but he offered to giue large summes of gold and siluer to such as would take vpon them that voyage. With this answer the cardinall was nothing pleased, and therefore said, We seeke a man and not monie: euery christian region well nere sendeth vs monie, but no countrie sendeth vs a prince; and therefore we require a prince that needeth monie, and not monie that needeth a prince. But the king still alledged matter for his excuse, so that the patriarch departed from him comfortlesse, and greatlie discontented in his mind: whereof the king hauing knowledge, and intending somewhat to recomfort him with sweet and pleasant words, followed him to the sea side. But the more the king thought to satisfie the patriarch with words, the more wroth and discontented he shewed himselfe to be; in so much that at the last he said unto him, Whitherto hast thou reigned gloriouslie, but hereafter shalt thou be forsaken of him, whom thou at this time forsakest. Consider of him, and remember that he hath giuen thee, and what thou hast yeilded to him againe, how first thou wast false to the king of France; and after succeeded archbishop Becket, and now lastlie thou forsakest the protection of Christes faith.

The king was stirred with these words, and said unto the patriarch, Though all the men of the land were one bodie, and spake with one mouth, they durst not utter such words against me. No wonder (said the patriarch) for they love thine and not thee; that is to say, they love thy temporal goods, and stand in feare of thee for losse of promotion, but thy soule they love not. And when he had so said, he offered his head to the king; saying, Do by me even as thou diddest by archbishop Becket, for all is one to me, either to be haine here in Europe of a wicked christian, or in the holie land by a Saracen, for thou art worse than a Saracen, and thy people follow the prey and spoile and not a man. The king kept his patience, and said, I may not go out of my land, for if I should, mine owne sonnes would rise and rebell against me. No maruell (said the patriarch) for of the diuell they came, and to the diuell they shall. And thus he departed from the king in great displeasure. ¶ Thus haue some written: but by others it appeareth that the patriarch remained here till the king went ouer into Normandie himselfe, in companie of whom the patriarch went also (as after shall appeare.)

This yere the last of March, king Henrie made his sonne John knight, and shortly after sent him ouer into Ireland, of which countrie he had made him king. At his comming into Ireland, he was honourable receiued of the archbishop of Dublin, and other noble men that had bene sent thither before him. The king allowed him great abundance of treasure, but he hauing learned that keeping it in his coffers (as one now come into a strange place, and not knowing what he shuld want) would not depart with it so freely amongst his souldiers and men of warre as they looked for: by reason whereof their seruice was such, that in diuerse conflicts he lost manie of his men, and at length was driuen through want of conuenient aid, to returne againe into England, hauing appointed his capteins and souldiers to remaine in places most expedient for the defense of that countrie. ¶ But hereof ye may read more at large in the historie of Ireland.

The day next after this terrible wonder, the king and the patriarch with the bishop of Durham and a great sort of other noble men of this realme, passed the seas from Douer to Wiltand, and so rode forth towards Normandie, where immediatlie upon his comming thither he raised a power, and sent word to his sonne Richard earle of Poitou (which had fortified the townes and castles of Poitou against him, and taken his brother Geoffrey prisoner) that except he deliuered vp into his mothers hands the whole countrie of Poitou, he would surely come to chastise him with an iron rod, and bring him vnder obedience smallie to his ease. Upon this message earle Richard being somewhat better aduised, obeyed his fathers commandements in all points, rendering vp into his mothers hands the earldome of Poitou, and comming to his father as an obedient sonne, shewed himselfe readie to serue him at commandement with a glad and willing mind. Some after this, and about the seauenth houre of the day, the sunne suffered a generall eclipse, so that no part of it appeared, and therewith folloved great thunder with lightning and sore tempest, with the violence whereof both man and beaſt were destroyed, and manie houses burned.

Shortly after this, the kings of England and France met and communed together for the aiding of them in the holie land, and they promised indeed to send thither both men and monie: but the patriarch made small account thereof, for he was much deceiued of that which he hoped to haue brought to passe, which was, either to haue got the king of England, or one of his sonnes, or some other man of great authoritie with him into the holie land: but because that would not be, he departed from the court verie sorrowfull and sore displeased, so that it may be thought, that then (and not before his departure out of England) he spake his mind so plainlie vnto the king (as before ye haue heard.)

Moreover, about this time king Henrie obtained of pope Urbane the third, that he might crowne which of his sonnes it shoulde please him king of Ireland, in token of which grant and confirmation, the said pope sent vnto him a crowne of peacocks feathers, after a feat maner woven in with gold.

Anno Reg. 32.

This yere the king held his Chiffmalle at Danfrount, and shortly after came to a communication with the French king, at the which he took a solemne oth that he would deliuer the ladie Alice the French kings sister (whome he had as yet in his custodie) vnto his sonne Richard erle of Poitou in mariage. For the which mariage to be had and solemnized, the French king granted to deliuer vnto the said Richard the towne of Cisors, with all that which his father king Lewes promised vnto king Henrie the sonne (latelie deceased) in mariage with queene Margaret the wife of the same Henrie, receiuing an oth thereto, neuer to make anie claime or chalenge to the same towne and lands.

King Henrie (after he had thus concluded and finished his affaires with the French king) returned backe into England in Maye, and then was Hugh prior of Wiltsham instituted bishop of Lincolne after that the see there had bene void and without any lawfull gouernour almost the space of seauenteene yeres. This Hugh was reputed a verie godlie and vertuous man. Before him Walter Constance was nominated to that see, but because he was made archbishop of Rouen before he was inuested in the church of Lincolne, he is not accounted in number of the bishops of Lincolne.

Moreover king Henrie shortly after his returne at this time into England, assembled a great armie, and went with the same to Caerleill, in purpose to haue entred Galloway, and there to haue chastised Rouland lord of that countrie, who was sonne to the sonne of Fergus, for the iniuries done to his cosine germains, namelie to Duncane sonne to Gilbert, who was sonne to the same Fergus, in spoiling him and the residue (after the deceasse of the said Gilbert) of their parts of inheritance, vsurping the whole to himselfe. But as the king was now readie to invade his countrie, Rouland came to him, and vsed such meanes vnder pretense of satisfaction, that he made his peace with the king, who thereupon brought backe his armie, and did no more at that time.

About the same time came newes to the king, that Hugh Lacie was slaine in Ireland by an Irish gentleman that was his confederate (or rather by a labourer, as in the Irish historie you may read) whereof the king was nothing sorie, because the same Hugh was growne to so high degree of puissance in that countrie, that he refused to obey the kings commandement when he sent for him.

¶ It is to be noted, that when king Henrie had conquered the most part of Ireland, and set the countrie in some good order, after his comming from thence, such capteines as he left there behind him, were were not idle, but still did what they could to inlarge the confines which were committed to their gouernance: but amongst them all this Hugh Lacie was the chiefeft, in fomuch that after the death of Richard earle of Strigule, the king made him gouernour of the countrey in place of the faid earle, by reafon whereof he fo inlarged his poffeffions, that within a while he became dreadfull, not onelic to the enimies, but alfo to his affociats, as to fuch Englifh capteins as were abiding in Ireland vpon gard of the Eng-10 lifh frontiers. For if any of them difobeyed his commandement, he would not ftrike to chaftife them at his pleafure, fo that by fuch meanes he feared rather to conquer the countrey to his owne vfe, than to the kings. Wherein he dealt not fo directlie or discretlie as he might; for,

Homines volunt allici non impelli.

He had alfo ioined himfelfe in marriage with a daughter of the king of Unneffer, not making king Henrie partie to the fame. Wherevpon the king ha-20 uing fundrie informations prefented to him of fuch his prefumptuous demeanour, commanded him by his letters to returne home, and come before his prefence, which to doe (as before I haue faid) he refufed, by reafon whereof he confirmed the fufpicion which was conceiued of him, to rife vpon no vaine con-futes, and therefore the euill that came to him was nothing lamented of king Henrie, who with good caufe was highlie offended towards him for the contempt and confiderations aforefaid.

This yeare Geffrey the kings fon who was earle of Britaine died at Paris, and was buried in the fame citie, leauing behind him (befides two daughters) one onlie fonne as then in his mothers wombe, of whom fhe was deliuered in the night of the feaft of Eafter next infuing his hufbands death: he was named Arthur, and fucceeded his father in the earlefioned (as men iudge) by a fall which he caught at a iour-nie, for he was foze buyffed therewith, and neuer had his health, but finally fell into a flir and fo died.

About this feafon pope Urbane wrote vnto Bal-win archbifhop of Canturburie, granting him licence to build a church at Alkinton, in honour of S.
Stephan and Thomas Becket now reputed a martyr, and that the fourth part of the offerings which came to the boz of Thomas the martyr fould be af-to the buildings of that church, and an other fourth part to be giuen to the poze, and the other fourth part remaining he might referue to himfelfe to beftow mentioned church, becaufe the building thereof would be prejudiciall to the church of Canturburie.

The French king required to haue the cuftodie of thereto. Wherefore he fent Walter archbifhop of Philip about that matter, fo that king Philip hauing heard them, was contented to ftale from attemptmeane time it chanced, that one fir Richard de Wal-ple, and to saue his castell from the hands of his enihe pitcht downe his tents ouer against the one side of the french campe, and earle Richard on the other, so that they were readie to assaile the french king on both sides at once, but before they came to ioine battell, by the mediation of a cardinall (as some write) or (as other saie) through meanes made by the earle of Flanders, the matter was taken vp. For earle Richard through perswasion of the said earle of Flanders came to the french king, and agreed with him, before that his father king Henrie was resolu'd of any such matter for his part, so that he was now in a marvellous perplexitie, & almost to take what was best to do, as a man fearing his owne suertie, by reason of mistrust which he had in his sonne Richard: but yet at the length through humble suit made by his said sonne vnto the french king, a truce was granted by the space of two yeares.

Carle Richard, after the matter was thus taken vp, went into France with the french king, of whom he was so honoured whilst he was there, that they kept one table at dinner and supper in the daie time, and (as was said) one bed serued them both to sleepe on in the night.

In the meane time king Henrie hearing of all this, fell into great suspicion thereto this great familiaritie betwixt the french king and his sonne would tend, and doubting the likeliest, sent for him to returne vnto him. But earle Richard perceiuing his father to mistrust his loialtie, gaue faire words, and promised to returne with all conuenient speed.
Howbeit he ment an other matter, and so departing from the french court, came to Chinon, where he got into his hands a great portion of his fathers treasure that was kept there, against the will of him that had the custodie of it, and taking it thus auaile with him, he began to fortifie his castels and towne within his countrie of Poitou, and cleaue refused to come backe to his father for a time, although at length forsaking the counsell of naughtie men, he turned home vnto him, and humbly submitted himselfe, in such wise as to his dutie appertained. And for the more assurance therof, he renewed his fealtie, in receiuing an oth vpon the holie euangelists.
Which done, king Henrie went into Britaine with an armie, and tooke the castell of Mountreleis by siege, which one Henrie de Lions, and one Gui-nemer his brother had gotten into their hands, after the decesse of Geoffrey earle of Britaine.

This yeare the twentie of October, the citie of Chichester was almost wholie consumed to ashes by mischance of fire. The head church with the bishops palace, and the houses of the canons were burnt euen downe to the ground. After this king Henrie held his Christmalle at Caen, from whence he went to Harfleur, and there taking the sea passed ouer into England. The french king hearing by and by of his departure, assembled a great armie, and threatned to despoile the countrie of Normandie, and other lands on that side the sea, except king Henrie would deliuer into his hands the towne of Gisors, with the appurtenances, or cause his sonne Richard earle of Poitou to take to wife his sister Alice, according to his promise.

When king Henrie was aduertised hereof, he turned with all speed into Normandie, that he might prouide for timely resistance, if the french king came forward to inuade his dominions. About the selfe same time came newes out of the holie land, that Saladin after the winning of Jerusalem, pursued his victorie with such successe, that he had taken from the christians the more part of all other towne and strengths within the land. These newes were no thing pleasant to the christian princes, and namelie the two kings Henrie and Philip seemed sorrowfull for the same, and therefore came to an enterbiew together on the 21. day of Iannuarie betwixt Erie and Gisors, where the archbishop of Erie was present, through whose earnest exhortation the two kings were made friends, and the same day receiued the crosse at his hands in purpose to make a iourneie together against those Saracens that had done such injuries to the christian name. And for a difference that one nation might be knowne from an other, the french king and his people toke vpon them to weare red crosses, the king of England and his subiects white crosses: but the earle of Flanders and his men wore greene.

Herewith they departed asunder, each one repairing to their countries to prouide their armies, and make them in a readinesse to set forward by a day towards this necessarie iourneie. King Henrie com-ming to Chinon, by aduise of his counsell, ordeined that euerie one of his subiects should yeld a tenth part of his reuenues and moueable goods for that yeare towards the aid of them in the holie land (coyne of that yeares growth excepted, and also all armour, horses, bookes, apparell, ornaments of chappels, and precious stones, which should not come in the rate of goods now taxed, nor be charged with this payment.) Moreover those knights and men of warre that were appointed to go in this iourneie paid nothing, but had that monie also towards their furniture, which were gathered of their tenants and farmers, holu-beit burgeses and others that toke vpon them the crosse without licence of their lords, paid his tenth, so that none of them went free.

There were also good orders devised, both for the aduancement of Gods glorie, and the reliefe of the common wealth, as that no man should sweare in any outrageous maner, that no man should plaie at cards, dice or tables, and that no maner of person after Easter should weare any costlie furs or cloth of scarlet, nor that men should vse to haue their tables serued with more than two dishes of meat at one meale, nor should haue their apparell cut, tagged, or laced: and further, that none of them should take any women forth with them in this iourneie, except such a landresse, of whome there might not growe anie suspicion of wanton life. It was also ordeined, that the monie of such as died in this iourneie, should go towards the finding and maintenance of their seruants and of poore people, and towards the aid of the christians in the holie land. Moreover, the pope granted that all those that went forth in this iourneie, repenting and confessing their sinnes, should be absolved and pardoned of the same. The king having thus taken order for his businesse in the parts on the further side the sea, came now ouer into England again, landing at Winchelsey on a saturday the thirtieth day of Iannuarie, and calling a counsell together at Caistering, which is eight or nine miles from Northampton, he there declared what orders he had taken for his iourneie into the holie land. Wherevpon the bishops of Northwich and Lincolne, and a great number of other people toke vpon them the crosse at the preaching of the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Rochester.

This done, king Henrie toke order also for the leuieing of the tenth, as well here in England, as he had done in the parts subiect to him on the further side the sea. He also sent Hugh bishop of Durham, and other both spirituall and temporell persons, vnto William king of Scots, to gather the tenth like wise within his countrie, but he met them betwixt Mark and Wightham, and would not suffer them to enter into Scotland, but he offered to giue vnto the king of England in recompense of the tenths, and for to have againe his castels, the summe of 5000. marks of silver, which could not be accepted. The French king likewise gathered the tenths in his countie towards this intended iourne. But by the working of some wicked spirit (as we may well thinke) which enuied the advancement of the chastian commonwealth, that good meaning of the two kings was broken and disappointed: for the peace latelie concluded betwixt them continued not long unviolated.

The French writers impute the fault thereof vnto Englishmen, and the English writers laie it to French men. The French writers say, that earle Richard the son of king Henrie in breach of the league, made warre vpon Reimond earle of Tholouze. The English writers reprove the French king as a wicked man, in that he should of purpose breake the peace and moue warre against king Henrie, to with draw him from going to make warre against the Saracens, to the which enterpryse he was wholly bent and inclined. Such is the manner of manie writers, who more affectionat to the loue of their countie than to the truth, do not obserue the law of histories in their writings, but rather inuie one against another in a bialling and reproving manner.

¶ Examples hereof are more than by any possible may be remembred, and namelie for bzenitie sake George Buchanan in the 8. booke of his Scottis historie berie reprochfullie speaketh of Richard Craiton (a right reuerend man whiles he liued and of enter name also being dead) charging him with ignorance, and the report of a shamelesse lier. Whose case, because it is not so conuenient to be handled in this place as els where, we will remit to the reigns of Edward the third, in whose time John Ballioll was king of Scots, and claue him (as well as we can) from a Scotis slander. Another example also we haue, and that most notozious, of Gabriel Praecolus the Iesuit, who hauing neuer bene in England, nor yet vnderstanding the English tong, blashphemy not to say that the translation of the English bible hath in it a thousand faults. A singular and insufferable impudencie, when men passe not what they haue and cast by out of a full gorge surfetting with malice and rancour! But what shall we say, Omne superuacuum pleno de pectore manat.

In deed (as Roger Houeden and other do witness) the first earle Reimond, and also Rimer earle of Angouleme, Cestrey de Racon, and Cestrey de Lusignan, with the most part of all the nobles of Poitou, made warre against earle Richard, and he held tache against them all, and in the end ouercame them. Amongst other of earle Reimonds part whom he took, was one Peter Seille, by whose counsell earle Reimond had taken diuerse merchants of Poitou that were subiects to earle Richard, & done manie other displeasures to him and to his countie, therefore earle Richard kept this Peter in berie close prison, and would not put him to his ransom: in somuch that earle Reimond took two of the king of Englands knights, sir Robert Doer, and sir Richard Fraser, as they were returning from Compostella, where they had bene to visit the bodie of S. James, but they were quicklie set at libertie by the French kings commandement, for the reuerence of S. James whose pilgrims they were.

After this, earle Richard entred with a great armie into the lands of earle Reimond, wasted the same, and took by siege a castell of his situate nere vnto Tholouze, called Poissac: whereof the French king hearing, sent out of hand to the king of England, requiring to know if the damages done by his sonne earle Richard vnto him & his people in Tholouze, were done by his commandement, for the

which he demanded restitution. Herevnto the king of England answered, that his sonne earle Richard did nothing in that behalfe, either by his knowledge or commandement: but that as he had signified to him by the archbishop of Dublin, what focuer he did therein, was done by the counsell of the French king himselfe.

Now after his coming to land, he repaired vnto Alencon, increasing his power by gathering by souldiers and men of warre out of Poimandie and other his countie on that side the sea. In the meane time his sonne Richard earle of Poitou entred into Berrie with a mightie armie, and the French king deliuering Chateau Raoull vnto the keeping of sir William de Berres returned into France, so that earle Richard spoiled and wasted the lands of those earls and barons which took the French part exceedingly. The French king kept him as yet within France, and durst not come forth now after the arrival of king Henrie, but manie enterprises were attempted by the capteines on both sides. Philip bishop of Beauuois invading the frontiers of Poimandie, burned Blangeuille, belonging to the earle of Angi, and the castell Albemarle (that belonged to William de Mandeuille, whereof he bare the title of earle) and wasted the countie round about. The French king also came to the towne of Trow and burned it, and took 40. men of armes there, but the castell he could not win. On the other part, Richard earle of Poitou took a strong place called Les Roches, beyond Trow towards Wandosme, with 25. men of armes, and 60. peomen.

About this time king Henrie sent ambassadours vnto the French king, as Walter the archbishop of Rouen, John bishop of Cureur, and William Marshall, to require restitution for the damages done to him and his people. And furthermore, that if the French king refused to make restitution, then had they in commandement to declare defiance against him. Wherevnto the French king answered, that he would not giue over to make warre till he had Berrie, and the countie of Meurin or Menigesme wholie in his possession. Wherefore king Henrie with a mightie armie (on the tuesday after the feast of the decollation of S. John) entred into the realme of France, and burned manie towne and villages, approaching the same day nere to the towne of Gaunt, where the French king was thought to be. Now as it chanced, William de Berres and Drogode Perlo encountered with Richard earle of Poitou and William de Mandeuille earle of Albemarle, so that William de Berres was taken by earle Richard, but by negligence of them that should haue taken had to him, he escaped awaie vpon his pages horse. The morrow after also, earle Richard departed from

But see, when the English were fullie bent to pro-there came messengers vnto king Henrie from the French king, requiring him that he would grant a peace to be had betwixt them, with promise that if he would condescend therevnto, that he should receiue by way of restitution all that the French king had now taken from him in Berrie. Herevpon they came to a communication betwixt Trie & Cisors, and when they could not agree, the French king caused a great elme standing betwixt those two places to be cut downe, at which the kings of England and France were accustomed to meet when they treated of matters in controuersie betwixt them, swearing that from thenceforth there should neuer be anie more meetings holden at that place.

Afterward, when the earle of Flanders and the earle of Blois with diuerse other earles and barons of the Realme of France, laid their armes aside, protesting openlie that they would not put on the same again to make warre against any christian, till they should returne from their iourne which they had bolved into the holie land, the French king bestitute of men to serue him, made sute once againe to king Henrie, that they might meet and talke of peace, which was hardlie granted, and so they met on the morrow after saint Faithes daie, or the seauenth of October, at Castellon, where they entreated of a forme of peace, so that the French king should haue restored all that he had taken within the countries belonging to king Henrie, and likewise Richard earle of Poitou should deliuer by vnto the earle of saint Giles (otherwise called earle of Tho-loue) all that he had taken from him since the breach of the last truce. But when king Henrie would not deliuer the castell of Palsie in pledge to the French king, they departed in sunder (as before) without any thing concluded. The king of France after this toke the castell of Valuel.

Another treatie betwixt
the two kings

Vpon the eighteenth day of August the two kings came againe together about a new treatie of peace betwixt Bonsemlance and Sukennie, where the French king offered king Henrie, to restore to him all that he had taken by his last warres, if his sister Alice might be ioined in marriage with Richard erle of Poitou, now eldest sonne aliuie to king Henrie, and that all king Henries subiects might doe homage and sweare fealtie to the same Richard. But king Henrie after the old prouerbe, Uetus piscator sapit, having bought his experience with the feeling of smart, & bearing in memorie the iniuries done to him by his sonne Henrie, after such his aduancement to king-lie degree, would not grant the French kings request herein. Wherevpon a further mischefe happed, for his sonne earle Richard (taking displeasure that his father should denie him that honour, which made altogether for his more assurance to succeed him as king) fell from his said father manifestlie, and became the French kings man, doing homage to him also without consent of king Henrie, for all those lands that belonged to his said father on that further side the sea. The French king for his homage and fealtie gaue him Chateau Maoull and Poldur, with all the honour thereto belonging.

Some write, that the chiefe cause which moued king Henrie to refuse to ioint his sonne earle Richard and the ladie Alice, daughter vnto the French king in marriage together, was, for that he was linked in the comberfome chaine of hot burning loue with the same ladie, and therefore he sought all the shifts of excuses & delaies that might be imagined; so that it appeared he had no mind to part with hir.

The truth was (as writers affirme) he had alreadie persuaded hir to satisfie his lust, insomuch that he liked hir so well, that he ment to be diuorced from his wife quene Eliano, and to marrie this yong ladie, which if he might bring to passe, and haue children by hir, he purposed to disherit those which he had by Eliano, and to make the other which he should haue by Adela his legitimat and lawfull heires. Yet before they departed from this communication, a truce was taken to endure till the feast of S. Hilarie. And Henrie bishop of Alba a cardinall that was sent from the pope to end this controuersie betwixt these two mightie princes, accused Richard earle of Poi-tou, for that by his meanes the troubles rose and were continued betwixt them.

The tostone of Wenerley, with the church of saint John the archbishop, was in manner wholie consumed with fire, on the 20. of September. Also the same yeare died William of Sempzingham, the author and first founder of the religious order of Sem-pzingham. Moreover Gilbert de Ogerstan a knight templer put in trust by king Henrie, with others, to gather the tenths towards the reliefe of the holie land, was proued to vse falshood in the receipt, and so was deliuered vnto the maister of the temple at London to be punished according to the statutes of his order. Also this yere in the vigill of S. Laurence, there was sene at Dunstable by diuerse persons a figure of the crosse verie long and large in the aire, with the shape of a crucifix thereon, and streames of blond to their sight seemed to run out of the wounds of the feet, hands and sides. This strange appearance continued in sight from none till almost night.

Some will deeme this a mere fable, and saie it fauoureth of grosse superstition and idolatrie, where-vpon they will conclude that no such fragments powdered with papistrie should be inserted into a choncle. But (to auoid all suspicion of iustificing the fansies of men) note you this, that in the ecclesiasticall hystorie, no small number of things no lesse strange and true than this seemeth vaine and false, are recoded; yea euen touching the verie crosse. But considering that this our age is verie nice and deintie in making chosse of matter pleasing their owne humors, we will not waide too farre in this kind of argument, which we know may as some offend as it is taken, as a thorne may prick, or a nettle sting when it is touched. Neuerthelesse, we would not wish that the forme of a thing should be quite condemned, for some scandalous peoples pleasures, whome nothing will please, vnlesse it come out of their owne dis-uat or casket of conceits.

King Henrie held his Christmas at Saumur in Aniou, but manie of his earles and barons were gon from him, and toke part with the French king, and with his sonne Richard earle of Poitou. Now when the day was come, in which the truce expired, the Britains (which had a charter of couenants of the French king and earle Richard, that if they concluded any peace with king Henrie, the Britains should be partakers in the same) entred into the confines of those countries, which still continued their due obedience towards king Henrie, spoiling and wasting the same on each side with barbarous crueltie. At which time also a legat came from the pope named John de Anagnia, who assaied both by courteous meannes and also by threats and menactings to reduce the parties vnto peace and concord: insomuch that by his procurement they met this yeare after Easter nere

Muth. Paris. The last time of those their meetings was in the Whitsuntwike, at that time the French king required not onlie to haue his sister Alice deliuered unto earle Richard for wife, according to the former covenants, but also some assurance giuen unto the same earle Richard, that he should inherit his fathers lands after his decesse. Also he required that earle John might take vpon him the croise to passe ouer into the holic land also, for otherwise earle Richard would not go. R. Houed. Holobest king Henrie would in no wise consent to any of these demands: but yet as some write, he offered thus much unto king Philip, that if he could be so content, his sonne John should marrie his sister Alice, and intoy with hir all such things as he demanded in preferment of his sonne Richard, and that in more large maner than he had requested the same. But king Philip would none of that.

Thus how soeuer it was, whilst the one demanded that which the other thought no reason to grant, they departed without concluding any agrément, so that king Philip hauing got by this meanes a good occasion to further his enterprises, with all his whole puissance entred into Spaine, where he destroyed a great part of that countie, and approached to the cite of Mauns, where king Henrie as then laie, in purpose to besiege it. But king Henrie being warned of his coming set the suburbs on fire, because his enemies should haue no succour in them. King Philip entereth the countie of Spaine. Holobest it the flame of the fire was by force of the wind driuen so directlie into the cite, that what with heat and assault of the enimie, the king being without any force of souldiers to defend it longer, was constrained to forsake it. Herewith he was so moued, that in departing from the cite, he said these words of his sonne Richard to himselfe: With thou hast taken from me this daie the thing that I most loued in this world, I will requite thee, for after this daie, I shall deplete thee of that thing which in me should most please thee, even mine owne hart.

Being thus driuen to leaue the defaced cite of Mauns, he repaired vnto Chinon, the citizens whereof being left destitute of aid, yielded themselues to the French king, who taking a great prize in his doings for that victorie, passed ouer Loire, and wain the cite of Tours, wherein he placed a garison, and so hauing sped his businesse with good successe, brought home his armie laden with prizes & booties. Mauns yielded to the French king. Wil. Parisus. King Henrie being thus put to the worse, and not perceiuing anie readie meane how to recouer his losses, began to despaire in himselfe, and therefore of necessitie thought it best to seeke for peace, but his suit was in vaine: for the enimie hauing now the aduantage, would not grant to agree vpon any reasonable conditions.

Polydor. At the last Philip the earle of Flanders and William archbishop of Reims, with Hugh duke of Burgoine, came to king Henrie to moue waies of agrément, and to conclude the same betwixt him on the one partie, and the French king and earle Richard on the other partie. Earle Richard had the Bretaines and them of Poitou confederate with him, vnder such conditions, as he might not agree with his father, unless they might be compassed in the agrément. At length they agreed vpon conditions, not altogether aduantageable to the king of England, yet in the end, Chateau Maoul was restored to king Henrie with all that had bene taken from him since the time that the French king & he took vpon them the croise: on the other part king Henrie did homage to the French king, which in the beginning of this warre he had surrendred and renounced. He was bound also to paie to the French king 20 thousand markes for the aid which earle Richard had receiued of him: moreouer to resigne and acquite unto the French king, all that which either he or his predecessours held or possessed within Auergne. Other articles there were which king Henrie agreed vnto for against his will, as the deliuerie of the labie Alice or Adela, and such other, which (as not much materiall) we passe ouer.

This peace was concluded not farre from Tours, in a place appointed conuenient for both the kings to meet in, about the feast of the apostles Peter and Paule. And (as writers record) there chanced great thunder and lightening at the verie time when the two kings came to enterueiw and talke together, so that the thunderbolt did light betwixt them two: & yet (notwithstanding such thunder & lightening) the aire was cleare and nothing troubled. The two kings parted a sunder through feare thereof for that day, and on the next day the like chance happened, greatlie to the terrour of them both. Which moued king Henrie the sooner to condescend to the agrément.

Moreouer this is not to be forgotten, that when all matters were quieted and accorded amongst them, king Henrie required to haue all their names deliuered vnto him in writing, which had promised to take part (and were ioined as confederates) with the French king and earle Richard. This was granted, and when the roll was presented vnto him, he found his sonne John the first person that was named in that register, wherewith he was so troubled and disquieted in his mind, that coming to Chinon he felt such gréefe hereof, that he cursed euen the verie date in which he was borne, and as was said, gaue to his sonnes Gods curse and his, the which he would neuer release, although he was admonished to doe it both of sumrie bishops and other religious and good lie men. Thus saith Houeden.

Holobest, it is not like that earle Richard at this time had procured his brother John to be confederate with him in his rebellious dealings, but rather because earle Richard had some suspition, least his father would make John his heire and successor in the kingdom, it might be a policie wrought by the French king and earle Richard, to alienate his fathers mind from the said John.

¶ These evils were esteemed to fall vnto king Henrie by the iust iudgement of God, for that being admonished diuerse waies, as well by diuine reuelation, as by the wholesome aduise of graue men, as Hugh bishop of Lincoln and others, he would not reforme his licentious appetite of heaping by sinne vpon sinne, but still wallowed therein to his owne destruction. Wherevpon being brought to such an extremite as ye haue heard, he was taken with a grievous sicknesse, which bringing him to utter desperation of recouering of health, he finallie departed this life, though more through verie anguish and gréefe of his late losse and troubles sustained, than by the force of his bodilie disease (as writers haue affirmed.) But howsoeuer it was, he ended his life the first of Iulie in the 61. yeare of his age, and after he had reigned 34. yeares, nine moneths, and two daies, which was in the yeare after the birth of our saviour 1189. and of the creation of the world 5155. His bodie was buried at founteuerard, which is an abbeye situate not farre from the towne of the eagle within the dutchie of Alanson.

Immediatlie vpon his death, those that were about him, applied their market so busilie in catching and filching awaie things that laie readie for them, that the kings corps laie naked a long time, till a child couered uered the nether parts of his body with a short cloke, and then it seemed that his surname was fulfilled that he had from his childhood, which was Shortmantell, being so called, because he was the first that brought short clothes out of Anion into England. As his sonne Richard met the corps going towards the buriall, suddenly there issued bloud out of the dead bodies nostrilles, which was taken for a signification that it abhorred the presence of so wicked a son, which in his life time had so persecuted the father. His death was signified by a marvellous strange wonder, for a few daies before he died, all the fishes in a certaine mere or pool in Fozmandie, leapt forth on land in the night season, and fought together with such a noise, that a great multitude of men came running thither to behold the wonder, and could not find one fish alive in the mere.

He had issue by his wife quene Elianoꝝ (as may appere by that which already is rehearsed) foure sonnes, Henrie, Richard, Geoffrey, and John, besides two other that died young, as some authoꝝ haue recorded: also thre daughters, Maude, married vnto Henrie the duke of Saronic; Elianoꝝ the wife of Alphonse the eight of that name king of Castile, and Joane giuen in marriage vnto William king of Sicill. He had also two bastard sonnes by a concubine, the one named William, & the other Geoffrey. He was of bodie fleshye and strong, and could abide verie patientlie the displeasures both of cold and heat, he had a large head, a broad heaull, a broken voice, and was furthermore verie spare of diet, cheselie because he would not be too fat; and therefore when he was at quiet without any trouble of warres, he would exercise himselfe in hunting or trauelling abroad. He was of a good stature and verie well furnished, of a comelic countenance, partlie red beared, with grate eyes, of wit quicke, and of a perfect good memorie, so that he would long remember those things which he had either read, heard, or sene. He was stout of stomack, and more constant in time of aduersitie than in time of prosperitie, except at the time of his death, when being destitute in manner of all his friends, he fliew himselfe almost in despair. He was liberall towards all men, oftentimes giuing rewards to his souldiers ouer and besides their wages.

Moreouer, of nature he was pitifull towards the poore, as it well appeared by diuerſe his charitable deeds; as for example. When in the yeare 1176. there was a great dearth & ſcarſitie of bread in the parts of Anjou & Maine, he ſed euerie daie with ſufficient ſuſtenance ten thouſand perſons, from the beginning of Aprill, till the time that new cozne was inned: and what prouiſion ſoeuer was laid by in garners, cellers and ſtorehouſes, for the kings neceſſarie uſes, he cauſed the ſame to be imploied towards the reliefe of religious houſes, and poore people. He toke of his ſubjects but ſildome times any great tributes. He was verie expert in feats of warre, and right fortunate therein. He praiſed his captaines and men of warre when they were dead, and lamented their loſſe more than he ſhelued to loue them when they were alieue. And this did he of policie, that they might vnderſtand that they ſhould be honoured after death, and the reſore feare it the leſſe. He was ſomewhat learned, and alſo knothome to be wiſe.

This care to haue iustice duly ministered in his realme was exceeding great, inasmuch that finding how the shreiftes were rather inclined to take their owne gaine, than to deale vprightlie with his subjects, he appointed other officers to haue a regard to their doings, as if they had bene controllers, that they knowing how there were such appointed to haue a sound oversight in their dealings, might be the more circumspect in their duties . He ordered also punishments for hunters in forests and grounds of warren , either by fining them , or by imprisonment .

Howeuer, he ordeined that murderers should suffer death by hanging: and so for other transgressours he appointed other kinds of punishments, as some to be condemned to exile, and other to losse of limbs, &c. according to the qualitie of the offense committed. And to haue the lawes duly executed, and iustice by rightlie ministred on all hands, he was so careful that he tried all orders of men, in placing them in roones of iustice. And lastlie, trusting to find among the cleargie such as would not be corrupted with bribes, nor for respect of feare or friendship decline from right iudgement, he chose forth the bishops of Winchester, Elye, and Norwich to be principall iustices of the reline, so as they might end and determine all matters, except in certaine cases referred to the hearing of the vniue himselfe.

His biwes were these, as they are remembred. In time of aduerse fortune no man could shew himselfe moze courteous, gentle, make, and promising moze largelie than he would. But when fortune once began to smile, no man was moze sharpe, hard to deale with, nor moze redie to breake his promise and faith.
He was also partie noted of countenances: for although he was liberrall towards souldiers and strangers, yet was he strict inough towards his owne people, and namelie towards his sonnes, which caused them to estrange themselves and their good wils from him. He was not so zealous toward the execution of right and equitie as to the furtherance of his owne vniuat commoditie.

He was out of measure giuen to fleshly lust, and satisfieng of his inordinate concupiscence. For not contented with the vse of his wiue, he kept manie concubines, but namelie he delisted most in the com-panie of a pleasant damsell, whom he called the Rose of the woold (the common people named hir Rosemund) for hir passing beautie, propernesse of person, and pleasant wit, with other amiable qualities, being verelie a rare and puerlesse péece in those daies.
He made for hir an house at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, like a labyrinth, with such turnings and windings in & out as a knot in a garden called a maze, that no creature might find hir nor come to hir, except he were instructed by the king, or such as were secret with him in that matter. But the common repoyrt of the people is, that the quene in the end found hir out by a silken thread, which the king had drauene after him out of hir chamber with his foot, and dealt with hir in such sharpe and cruell wise, that he liued not long after. She was buried in the nunrie of Woodstow beside Oxford, with these verses upon hir tombe:

Hic iacet in tumulo, Rosa mundi non Rosa munda, Non redolet sed olet, quæ redolere solet.

The meaning whereof may be found in Graftons large chronicle, page 77. in an English septenarie.

Long time after the death of this damsell, in the said abbeye was shewed a cofer, that sometimes was hers, of the length of two foot, in the which appeared giants fighting, startling of beasts, swimming of fishes, and shewing of foules, so liuelie, that a man might behold at the fine deuise thereof.

Moreover, king Henrie was noted not to be so fauourable to the liberties & freedoms of the church as he might haue bene. For besides the persecuting of the foresaid Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, he would not suffer the legats sent from the pope, to enter within the bounds of his dominion, till they had sworne that they should doe nothing prejudiciall to the customes of his kingdom, neither by prescribing orders, nor any other manner of act or meanes. he was thought to be negligent in aiding the christian common-wealth in the holie land. For though he had appointed twice or thrice to go thither in person, yet being letted by light occasions, he staid at home, and sent small relafe thither, though he was earnestlie called vpon for the same. His estimation was such amongst foren princes, that Philip king of France being newlie entred into the gouernment of that realme after his fathers decesse, committed himselfe and his kingdome to the disposition and order of king Henrie, as if he had bene regent of his realme, and gouernour of his person.

Bale.

There liued in the daies of this king Henrie the second, diuerse honourable personages and capteins of great fame, for their appointed valiancie and experience in warlike enterpises, as Robert earle of Leicester, Hugh Bigot earle of Northfolke, Ricgbold earle of Cornuwall, Robert Ferrers earle of Derby, Richard Lacie, Roger Mowbray, Rafe de Fulgiers, Humfrey Bohun constable of England, Ranulfe Glanville, William Clesey, & Bernard de Ballioll. Also there flourished in his time here in this land, men of singular learning in arts and sciences, as Nicholas Breakespeare, Serlo surnamed Grammaticus, William Rheualensis, Adam de Cuesham, Thomas of Spunmouth, Adelbertus Leuita, Seruasius Cicestrensis, Odo Cantianus, Calred Rheuellensis, Iohannes Sarisburicensis, Clemens Lanthoniensis, Walter Daniell, Robert Knought alias Camitus, Robert Folioth, William Ramsay, Senatus Brauonus, Robert the Scribe, Odo Wircmuth, Hugh of Reading, Richard of Doner, William of Peterborough, Cicerciensis, Bartholomeo Acanus, and Gilbert de Hemppingham, with others.

¶ And here to make an end with this high and nightie prince Henrie the second, I haue thought god to make you partaker of an epitaph, which we find in Matthew Paris and others wrytten of him as followeth.

*Epitaphium in Henricum secundum

An epitaph vpon king Henrie the second dead and heere intoomed.

OF late king Henrie was my name, which conqured manie a land, And diuerse dukedoms did possesse, and earledoms held in hand.
And yet while all the earth could scarce my greedie mind suffice, Eight foot within the ground now serues, wherein my carcase lies.
Now thou that readeest this, note well my force with force of death, And let that serue to shew the state of all that yeeldeth breath.
Doe good then here, forefslow no time, cast off all worldlie cares, For brittle world full soone dooth faile, and death dooth strike vnwares.

An other.

Small epitaph now serues, to decke this toome off statelie king:
And he who whilome thought whole earth could scarce his mind content, In little roome hath roome at large, that serues now life is spent.

¶ Here may be thought that the reigne of the Normans and French men ouer the realme of England toke end, a hundred thientie two yeares after the coming in of the Conquerour; for those that reigned after this Henrie the second, we may rightlie esteeme to be Englishmen, because they were borne in England, and vsed the English tong, customes, and maners, according to the nature and qualitie of the countrie.

Richard the first of that name, and second sonne of Henrie the second, began his reigne ouer England the first day of Julie, in the yere of our Lord 1189, in the seauen and thirtie peare of the emperour Frederike the first, in the eleuenth yere of the reigne of Philip the second king of France, and king William surnamed the Lion as yet lining in the gouernement of Scotland.

This Richard, immediatlie after the solemnities of his fathers funerals were ended, made hast to Rouen, where he was iustillie receiued, and proclaimed duke of Normandie, receiuing the inuesture according to the custome, on the twentieth day of Julie. Then studieng to set all things in good order on that side the sea, he made searck where his fathers treasure was preserued, and thereupon attached Stephan de Turnham, who was seneeschall or gouernour (as we may call him) of Anion, and committing him to prison, compelled him to make deliuerie of all such summes of monie as he had hid and laid up in certeine castels by the commandement of the late king his father.

Whilist he was thus occupied, his brother John came to him, to whom he iustillie gaue the welcome, and besides all other things which his father had bequeathed vnto him by his testament in England, amounting to the value of foure thousand pounds of ycarelie rent, with the earldome of Mortaigne, he procured a marriage for him (being now a widower) for his further aduancement with the ladie Isabell, daughter to Robert earle of Gloucester, which earle had appointed the said John to be his heire as before is mentioned, although Baldwine the archbishop of Canturburie forbade the marriage, because they were cosens in the third degree of consanguinitie. To Robert earle of Leicester also he restored all his lands which had bene taken from him, and such persons as his father had disherited, he restored likewise to their former rights and possessions, holobest those had forsaken his father, and taken part with him against his said father, he seemed now so much to mislike, that he remoued them vtterlie from his presence, and contrariwise preferred such as had continued faithfull vnto his father in time of the troubles.

At length, king Richard remembriug himselfe of his mother queene Elianor, who had bene separated from the bed of hir husband for the space of fiftene yeares, and was as yet deteined in prison in England, wrote his letters vnto the rulers of the realme, commanding them to set hir againe at libertie, and withall appointed hir by his letters patents, to take vpon hir the whole gouernment of the kingdome in his absence. The queene being thus deliuered, and hauing now the cheefe authoritie & rule in hir hands, rode in progresse about the realme, to see the estate thereof; and as she passed from place to place, the shewed gladsome countenance to the people whersoever she came, doing also what she could to please them, that she might thereby win their good willes to hir, and to hir sonne: but speciallie remembriug by hir late experience and tast thereof, what an irksome & most greuous thing imprisonment was, she caused the gailes to be opened, and forthwith set no small number of prisoners at libertie by the way as she passed through the countries, according to the verse of Virgil, Non ignara mali miseris succurreve disco.

In the meane time, king Richard concluding a league with Philip king of France, receiued all those places againe which were taken from his father by the same Philip, together with his wife Adela, whom vpon suspicion that she had bene dishonested in hir person before, without anie sufficient proofe thereof had, he forsooke, & sent hir home with hir dowrie, and otherwise with great and princelie gifts, most bountifullie enriched, hauing already concluded a marriage with the ladie Berengaria, daughter to Garcias king of Nauarre, who was sent into Sicill vnto hir sister Joane, that he might marrie hir there, as he passed that waie towards the holie land.

Whilist these things passed thus in these parties, the christians in the holie land dailie sent hither for aid, whereupon the two kings of France and England tooke counsell together, and determined with all conuenient speed to ioine their powers, & with ships prepared for that purpose to saile into Syria. Hauing thus concluded, they went about to prepare themselves of necessarie prouision for so long a iourne. Now when king Richard had set in order his affaires in Normandie and France, he came ouer into England, landing at Portsmouth the 13. of August. With him also came his brother John, vnto whom he assigned the castels of Warlebridge, Lutegreshall, Beake, Bolefour, the honoz of Wallingford, Wakehill and Cie, with the earldoms of Mortaigne, Dorset, Sumnerfet, Rottingham, Werbie, Deuonshire, and Cornewall, with the earldome of Lancaster, intituling him earle of the same, whereby he was so exalted in state and degree, that he seemed in manner of a tetrarch, hauing as it were a fourth part of the realme in gouernance: but yet the king held some of the castels (in those counties and honozs thus giuen to his brother) in his owne hands. Moreover, vnto William Marshall he gaue in marriage the daughter of Richard earle of Chepstote, together with the earldome which hir father possessed; and to Gilbert Fitz Roger the sonne of Rainsfey he gaue the daughter of William de Lancaster. After he was landed (as before ye haue heard) he halted to Winchester, where his mother queene Elianor, with the most part of the English nobilitie had laine a good space to attend his comming, and there on the euen of the assumption of our ladie, the king was by them receiued with great ioy and triumph.

¶ Here is to be noted, that whilist the queene and lords laie in Winchester waiting for the kings arrival,

But to let this passe, some after the kings coming into England, he was informed that the Welshmen had broken into the English marches, and destroyed certeine towines; to repress whole presumptions attempts he made towards them, but was yet failed for that time, & reuoked by his mother. At Salisburie he found his fathers treasure, highlie reioicing, for that the summe was far greater than he thought it would haue pceded, for besides the pretious stones, apparell, and iewels, it was reported he had there the sum of nine hundred thousand pounds in readie coine. With this god hap king Richard not a little aduanced, came to London on the first of September, where he had appointed prouision to be made for his coronation, and so calling a counsell of the Nobles of the realme, he received the crowne with all due and accustomed solemnitie, at the hands of Baldwin the archbishop of Canturburie, the third daie of September.

At his coronation, first the archbishops of Canturburie, Roan, Trier, and Dublin, which were present, with all the other bishops, abbats and cleargie, apparelled in rich copes, and hauing the crosse, holie water and censures carried afore them, came to fetch him vnto the doye of his priuie chamber, and there receiuing him, they led him vnto the church at Westminister, till he came before the high altar with a solemn procession. In the middle of the bishops and cleargie went foure barons, bearing candlesticks with tapers, after whom came Cestrey de Lucie bearing the cap of maintenance, and John Warthall next to him, bearing a great and masseine paire of spurs of gold: then followed William Warthall earle of Striguill alias Pembroke, who bare the roial scepter, in the top wherof was set a crosse of gold: and William de Patrike earle of Salisburie going next him, bare the warder or rod, hauing on the top thereof a dove. Then came three other earles, David brother to the king of Scots, the earle of Huntingdon, John the kings brother earle of Portaigne, and Robert earle of Leicester, ech of them bearing a sword byright in his hand with the scabbards richlie trimmed and adorned with gold.

The earle of Portaigne went in the midd of betwixt the other two. After them folloved six earles and barons, bearing a checker table, vpon the which was set the kings scochens of armes, and then folloved William Mandeuill earle of Albemarle, bearing a crotune of gold a great heighth before the king, who followed the same, hauing Hugh bishop of Durham on the right hand, and Reignold bishop of Bath on the left, ouer whom a canopy was borne: and in this order he came into the church at Westminister, where before the high altar in the presence of the cleargie & the people, laicng his hand vpon the holie euangelists and the reliques of certeine saints, he took a solemn oth, that he should obserue peace, honour, and reuerence to almighty God, to his church, and to the ministers of the same all the daies of his life. Also that he should exercise byright iustice to the people committed to his charge, and that he should abrogate and disannull all euill lawes and wrongfull customes, if anie were to be found within the precinct of his realme, and mainteine those that were god and laudable.

This done, he put off all his garments from the middle vptwards, his shirt excepted, which was open on the shoulders, that he might be annointed. The archbishop of Canturburie annointed him then in three places, to wit, on the head, on the shoulders, and on the right arme, with praiers in such case accustomed. After this, he couered his head with a linnen cloth hallowed, and set his cap aloft thereon; and then when he had put on his roiall garments and uppermost robe, the archbishop took vnto him the sword wherewith he should beat downe the enemies of the church; which done, two earles put his shoes vpon his feet, and hauing his mantell put on him, the archbishop forced him on the behalfe of almighty God, not to presume to take vpon him this dignitie, except he faithfullie meant to performe those things which he had there sworne to performe. Wherevnto the king made answer, that by Gods grace he would performe them. Then the king took the crotune beside the altar, and deliuered it to the archbishop, which he set vpon the kings head, deliuering to him the scepter to hold in his right hand, and the rod roiall in his left hand, & thus being crowned he was brought backe by the bishops and barons, with the crosse and candlesticks, and three swords passing forth before him vnto his seat. When the bishop that sang the masse came to the offertorie, the two bishops that brought him to the church, led him to the altar, and brought him backe againe.

Finallie when masse was done, and all things ended in order as was requisit, he was brought with solemn procession into his chamber, where he put off his heauie rich apparell, and put on a crowne and other garments more light and easie, and so went to dinner, whereat wanted no store of meats & drinks, which were serued out in most princelie and bountifull wise.

Vpon this daie of king Richards coronation, the Jewes that dwelt in London and in other parts of the realme, being there assembled, had but soie hap, as it chanced, for they meaning to honour the same coronation with their presence, and to present to the king some honorable gift, wherby they might declare themselves glad for his aduancement, and procure his friendship towards them, for the confirming of their priueleges & liberties, according to the grants and charters made to them by the former kings: he of a zealous mind to Christs religion, abhorring their nation (and doubting some sorcerie by them to be practised) commanded that they should not come within the church when he should receiue the crowne, nor within the palace whilst he was at dinner.

But at dinner time, among other that pressed in at the palace gate, diuerse of the Jewes were about to thrust in, till one of them was stricken by a chrisitian, who alledging the kings commandement, kept them backe from comming within the palace. Which some of the unrulie people perceiuing, and supposing it had bene done by the kings commandement, took lightlie occasion thereof, and falling vpon the Jewes with staves, bats and stones, beat them and chased them home to their houses and lodgings. Wherewith rose a rumour through the citie, that the king had commanded the Jewes to be destroyed, and therevpon came running together, to assault them in their houses, which when they could not easilie breake vp nor enter, by reason the same were strongly builded, they set fire on them, so that diuers houses were consumed, not onlie of the Jewes, but also of their neighbours, so hideous was the rage of the fire. Here we see that of the outrageous people, sent some of his counsellours, as Ranulfe de Glanville lord iustice, and other officers to appease the tumult: but their authoritie was nothing regarded, nor their persuasions any whit reuerenced, but their thretnings rather brought themselves in danger of life among the rude sort of those that were about to spoile, rob, and sacke the houses and shops of the Jewes: to the better accomplishment of which their unlawfull act, the light that the fire of those houses which burned, gaue after it was once night, did minister no small helpe and occasion of furtherance. The Jewes that were in those houses which were set on fire, were either smolzed and burned to death within, or else at their coming forth most cruellie receiued vpon the points of speares, billes, swords and gleaues of their aduersaries that watched for them verie diligencie.

Jewes burnt to death.

This outrage of the furious and disordered people continued from the middell of the one day, till two of the clocke on the other; the commons all that while neuer ceassing their furie against that nation, but still killing them as they met with any of them, in most horrible, rash and vnrasonable manner. At length, rather wearied with their cruell doings, than satisfied with spoile, or moved with respect of reason or reuerence of their prince, they withdrew themselves from their riotous enterprise, after they had executed manie unlawfull and horrible enormities. This great riot well deservede soe and greivous punishment, but yet it passed ouer without correction, in respect of the great number of the transgressors, and for that the most part of men for the hatred generally conceived against the obstinate frowardnesse of the Jewes, liked the doings hereof well enough, interpreting it to be a good token, that the iollull daie of the kings aduancement to the crowne should be dolefull unto the Jewes, in bringing them to such slaughter and destruction. Finally, after that the tumult was ceased, the king commanded that no man should hurt or harme any of the Jewes, and so they were restored to peace, after they had sustained infinit damage.

The occasion of this tragedie and bloudie tumult (redounding to the Jewes great veneration and pittifull distresse, but to the satisfieng of the peoples furious and vnbidded prouesse to crueltie) sprang principallie from the king, who if he had not so lightly esteemed of the Jewes when they repaired vnto him with their present, in signe of submission and hope of obtaininge their sute then purposed to be exhibited; this hurle burlie had not ensued. For it was a violent crample & a mightie motiue to the people to maligne the Jewes; as also a hart-graefe to them in respect of their reietion, when the prince gaue them so discourteous a repulse. Here therefore is to be observed, that the people is the princes ape, as one verie well saith. For looke whereto he is inclined, note wherein he delighteth; the same is the practise of the people: in consideration whereof the mightie ones of the world haue speciall cause to haue an eye to their course of life, & to set caueats befoze their actions, that the people may in them see none but good signes of commendable & vertuous imitation. A council at Westwell.

Shortly after, to wit, the 15. day of September, a counsell was holden at Westwell, where the bishops and abbats being assembled, there were in presence of the king and of the archbishop of Canturburie elected certeine bishops and abbats to such places as then were vacant: and amongst other, William de Longchampe the kings chancelor was elected to the see of Elic, Gessrey the kings bassard brother vnto the archbishopricke of Poike, who was the 32. in number that had gouerned the same, Gessrey de Lucie to Winchester, one Hubert Walter to Salisbury, and Richard archdeacon of Elic, and the kings treasurer to the see of London. The abbies that were prouided of abbats were these, Claffenburie, Shirborne, Perfore and Feuertham. In like manner, John the elect of Whitherne was consecrated bishop of that see, by the hands of the archbishop of Dublin. Also in this counsell the king ordeined Hugh bishop of Durham, and William Handeuille earle of Albemarle, lord chiefe iustices of England, hauing deposed Ranulfe de Glanville from that come.

Moreouer, the king being thus established in the estate of the kingdome, did not forget his iourne which he had promised into the holie land, but with all diligence made his prouision, and namelie he sought to gather monie to furnish his charges, and so there vpon leuied a tax, engaged, sold, and let to farme his lands, tols, customs, and other his reuenues, with certeine counties and offices, so that he made an exceeding summe of monie. He also found, that Ranulfe de Glanville lord chiefe iustice, and other of the head magistrates had not behaued themselves by rightlie in the administration of their offices; so that he both deposed the said lord chiefe iustice as is aforesaid, and almost all the shiriffes and their deputies within the realme of England, putting them to greivous fines for their offences and transgressions, and so by that meanes he got no small deale of monie.

30

Here note by the waie, how William Parus affirmeth, that where this Ranulfe Glanville, being a man of high wisdome and steep into age, saw that manie things were done by the new king, not so aduisedlie, nor with such foresight as they ought to be, sought of his owne accord to be discharged of his office, that he might the better prepare himselfe to go in that iourne to the holie land, as by taking vpon him the crosse he had vowed in the daies of king Henrie, and so he solemnely renounced his office, which other (nothing so worthy of it) did afterwards intop.

40

Moreouer, the king vnderstanding that Hugh Butley or Budley bishop of Durham, being a verie aged man, had much monie, he sold to him the manour of Seggesfield or Sadberge, with the wapentake belonging to the same, and also found meanes to persnade him to buy his owne prouince, which he did, giuing to the king an inestimable summe of monie, and was therevpon created an earle by the king for the same: wherevpon he was intituled both bishop and earle of Durham, wherewith the king would iest afterwards and saie; What a cunning craftie man am I, that haue made a new earle of an old bishop.

50

Furthermore, the same bishop gaue to the king a thousand markes to be made chiefe iustice of England, and that he might tarrie at home, and not go into the holie land. And because he would not be reprobated of any person, he obtained of the apostolike see (which faileth no man that is surcharged with white or red mettall, and would be rased) a licence for a summe of monie to be dispensed with for that iourne. The king thus being earnestlie bent to make commoditie of those things, for the which he might get any monie at all, the citizens of London presented vnto him a great summe towards the furnishing forth of his enterprise. Wherevpon to acquitte their courtelie, he granted them large priuileges, and ordeined that the citie should be ruled by two head officers, which they should chuse amongst themselves remouable from yeare to yeare by the name of bailiffes. The names of the two first bailiffes chosen by force of that ordinance, wrote Henric Cornehill, and Richard Fitz Kemer.

The citie before those daies euer since the coming in of William Conquerour, and a good while before his time, was gouerned by certeine officers or rulers named Port Greues (which word is deriued of two Saron words, as Port and Greue. By Port is meant a tolowe, and by Greue a gardian or ruler, as who should saie, A keeper or ruler of a tolowe.) These rulers with the lawes & customes then vsed within this citie, were registred in a booke called (as some haue said) Dome daie, but through negligence after these lawes and customes were changed and altered, the booke was lost, so that the remembrance of such rulers as were before the daies of this Richard the first, are not to be had. These bailiffes euer entred at Michaelmasse, and so continued forth their yeare.

Thus began the citie first to receiue the forme and state of a common-wealth, and to be diuided into fellowshipes, which they call craftes or corporations. Such also are admitted to the fellowshipes of these companies, as haue true liege seruice as apprentices a certeine number of yeares, as seuen at the least, vnder which time of seruice expired, there is none made free, nor suffered to enioy the liberties of that citie, sauing such as are borne free, that is to saie, of freemen with in the citie, of whome at this time, it is not much materiall to make any further report. The citie thus consisting of the said craftes or occupations, chooseth out of the same a senat or companie of graue counsellours, whom they name Aldermen (E) changed into (A) according to the old Saron pronuntiation. It is also diuided into 26. tribes or wards, of the which euerie one hath his fenerall Alderman, or ouerser, who haue both authoritie sufficient, and large priuileges to mainteine the good gouernement of their positions withall. Out of the number of these, there is another officer pearelie chosen and appointed, called the Mayor, who ruleth all the rest.

But now to returne vnto the further doings of king Richard before his departure out of England towards his iournie into the land of Palestine, commonlie called Holie land, it is said, he made such sale of things appertaining to him, as well in right of the crowne, as otherwise, that it seemed to diuerse he made his reckoning neuer to returne againe, in so much that some of his counsellours told him plaine lie, that he did not well in making things alwaie so free, to the dishonoring of his maiestie, and preiudice of his successour; vnto whom he answered, that in time of need it was no euill policie for a man to helpe himselfe with his owne, and further ioined “ hereto these words, that if London at that time of need would be bought, he would surelie sell it, if he might meet with a conuenient merchant that were able to giue him monie enough for it.

Another way he had also to gather riches, and that was this. He had a licence of pope Innocent the third, to dispense with such as pleased him within his realme, for their vobies made to go into the holie land, although they had taken on them the crosse for that purpose, namelic such as he should appoint to remaine behind him for the defense of his countrie: and of these also he took abundance, and diuerse other he compelled to fine, namelic, to the end that he might get their monie likewise, that hereby he obtained no small summe toward the furniture of his iournie. But both pope & prince forgot in the meane while, that Boni pastores est tondere pecus non excoicare.

This yeare also in the month of Nouember, as Matthew Paris saith, Johannes de Anagnia a cardinall and legat from the pope arriued here in England, comming on land at Douer, and because the king was as then in the north parts, the same cardinall was prohibited on the behalfe of the kings mother queene Elianor, to passe any further without the kings commandement. And so he staid there thirtene daies at the charges of the archbishop of Canturburie, till the king came to those parties, by whose wisdome a direction was taken for the quieting of the controuersie betwixt the archbishop, and the monkes of Canturburie, for the chapell church of Hakinton now called S. Stephens.

In the same moneth of Nouember, by the kings appointment, Geoffrey the elect of Poike, who was the kings brother, with other barons and lords of Poikehire, receiued William king of Scotland at the water of Tweed, and from thence with all due reuerence and honour they brought him vnto Canturburie, where the king had called a counsell of the lords of his realme both spiritiuall and temporall, in the which euerie of them took an oth to be true to the king, and to continue in due obedience vnder him and his lawes, which oth also the king of Scots receiued, being there present, and likewise king Richards brethren earle John and Geoffrey the archbishop of Poike.

The king of Scots therefore hauing receiued this oth, and thinking the time to serue his purpose for redeming of those castels, which were deliuered to king Henric as gages for his ranfome, paid now vnto king Richard ten thousand markes, and had restitution of the same, that is of Berwikke, Roxburgh, Sterling, and Edenburgh. But William Paruus saith, that Edenburgh was restored to him in the daies of king Henric, by reason of his wife which he took in the parties beyond the seas: and herewith agreeth the Scotish chronicle. King Richard also assigned to queene Elianor his mother, the accustomed doluer, with manie lordships and honours beside, as an augmentation thereof. About which time died William de Mandeuille earle of Albemarle at Rouen, and Hugh de Dutsey the nephue of the bishop of Durham died at Alet, and was buried at Durham. Also Formalis archbishop of Trier died at Southampton, and was there buried in the church of S. Andrewes.

In the meane time, king Richard still desirous to furnish himselfe with monie, deuised yet another shift, and feigned that he had lost his seale; therefore he commanded a new to be made, which being done, he caused it to be proclaimed and published in euerie countrie, that those to whome he had granted any thing by his deed or charter, meaning to enioy the same in fuertie, should not thinke it much to come and haue it confirmed by his new seale, least afterward the other being lost, their lawfull titles might be called into question. Whereupon manie that could not come to him whilest he was in England, were glad to follow him, and saile ouer into Normandie, and there to fine at his pleasure for the new seale, to the end that their writings might be confirmed thereby, and made so much the more sure to them and their successours. For the same businesse also Remigius the prior of S. Albons, and manie other went ouer to their great costs, charges, and trouble, after he was transported into France.

I find moreover about the same time, that the kings brother earle John exhibited a soxe complaint against the Romaine legat and other bishops; for that the archbishop of Canturburie, after the appeale made vnto the apostolike see, had put his lands vnder interdiction for his marriage made with the earle of Glocesters daughter: which when the legat heard, he forthwith confirmed the appeale, and released the earles lands of the aforesaid interdiction. The same time also, the tenth part of all the mourable goods through

After all this, R. And with these two he joined in commission Hugh Bardulfe, William Marshall earle of Hereford, or rather Penbrooke, Geoffrey Fitz Peter, & William Brewer, men of great honour, wisdom, and discretion.

Furthermore, about the purification of our ladie, Elianor the queene mother, and the ladie Alice sister to the French king, Baldwine archbishop of Cantuarburie, John bishop of Poze, Hugh bishop of Durham, Geoffrey bishop of Winchester, Reigold bishop of Bath, William bishop of Elie, Hubert bishop of Salisbury, and Hugh bishop of Chester, with Geoffrey the elect of Poze and John earle of Poze, the king's two brethren, by commandement of the king passed ouer into Normandie, to conuenient with him before his setting forward.

H. Houed.

Some write, that now at this present, the king should ordeine or rather confirme the bishop of Elie his chancellour to be lord chiefe iustice ouer all England, and the bishop of Durham to be lord iustice from Trent northwards. But whensoever they were thus aduanced to such dignities, howsoever they came by them, discordie or inditrectie, frise it is, that immediatlie thereupon, strife and discord did arise betwixt them: for waiving proud and insolent, they disdaind each other, contending which of them should beare most rule and authoritie, inasmuch that whatsoeuer seemed good to the one, the other misliked, as in cases where parteners in authoritie are equall, it often happeneth. The like hereof is noted before betwixt the archbishops of Cantuarburie and Poze in diuerse kings reignes. For the nature of ambition is to delight in singularitie, to admit no peers, to giue place to no superiour, to acknowledge no equall. Whence alldieth the poore people needless, and exemplifieth it in the old Romans, the error of whose actions is continued at this day, as by the words ensuing may be gathered, and ordinarie observed both here and elsewhere;

Moreover, at the same time he caused his two brethren, earle John, and Geoffrey the elect archbishop of Poze to take an oth not to returne into England during the terme of thre yeares next ensuing, without his consent and licence first had. This he did, foreseeing what might happen, providing as it were against such practises as his brethren might happilie attempt against him. But yet his mother queene Elianor procured him to reuoke that decree immediatlie, least it might seme to the world, that his sonnes should stand in feare one of another. And so the earle of Poze, being licenced to returne into England at his pleasure, swearing an oth at his departure to obeye the kings behest, and truelie to serue him, according to the dutie of a good and loiall subject. The bishop of Elie lord chancellour and chiefe iustice of England was also sent backe hither into this realme, to set forward things behouefull for the kings iourne.

In like maner the king sent to Rome to obtayne that the said bishop of Elie might be constituted the popes legat through both the prouinces of Cantuarburie and Poze, and likewise through Wales and Ireland. Which was sone granted by the bulles of pope Clement the third, bearing date the 5. of June. For the which office the bishops gaue him 1500. marks, to the great offense of the king, as he shewed afterward to cardinall Otavian that came to visit him when he arrived in the riuier of Tiber, being vpon his iourne towards Messina, as after may appeare. But in the meane time, calling together the lords and peeres of those his dominions on that side the sea, to wit, Normandie, Britaine, Anton, Poitou, and Guien, he consulted with them what number of soldiers and how manie ships it should be conuenient for him to take with him and furnish into Fla: and herewith he did command them also to chere Robert earle of Leicester, whome he appointed to remaine amongst them as his lieutenant or vicegerent of those parts during his absence.

But here to leaue King Richard in consultation for matters appertaining to his iourne, and shew briefly what happened (by the waie) to the Jewes, which as then dwelt here in England, after that King Richard was passed ouer into Normandie: we haue heard how after the riot against them at London, when the king was crowned, he took order that they should remaine in peace vnder his protection, and commanded that no person should in any wise molest them. But now after that he was gone ouer, and that the soldiers (which prepared themselves to follow him) began to assemblie in roades, the heads of the common people began to war with, and saue would they haue had some occasion of raising a new tumult against the Jewes, whome (for their vniuersall blaspemy practised to the vndoing of manie an honest man) they much deadly hated, wishing most earnestlie their expulsion out of England. Whereupon by reason of a riot committed lastlie against them, at the towne of Mar in Dorsetshire, where manie of them were slaine, other people in other parts of the realme, taking occasion hereat, as if they had bene called by by the sound of a bell or trumpet, arose against them in those towne where they had any habitations, and robbed and set them after a disorder and most riotous manner.

one at an others hands, he himself cutting his wiues thot first, whose name was Anna, then his childrens, one after another, and last of all sue himselfe, onlie rather than he would fall into the hands of the christians, that had thus long besieged them. The rest perceiuing that their great Rabbi had done, set fire vpon all their goods and substance, which they had gotten into the tower with them, and so consuming the same, would haue burnt also the residue of their fellowes which would not agree to the Rabbies counsell, in the cruell murthering of themselves, if they had not taken a strong turret hard by within that tower, and defended themselves both from the fire and crueltie of their brethren, who had made awaie themselves in such manner as I haue said: and that to the number of foure hundred, or (as some write) sue hundred at the least.

On the morow, those that were saued, called out to the people, and not onelie shewed how and after what sort their fellowes were dispatched, but also offered to be baptised, and forsake their Iudaisme, if they might haue their liues saued from the imminent & present danger wherein they saw themselves to be wrapped, through the furie of the people. To be short, this thing was granted, and they came forth, howbeit they were no sooner entred into the prease, but they were all slaine, and not one man of them persecuted.

After this also, the people ran to the cathedra-ll church, and broke into those places where their bonds and obligations laie, by the which they had diuerse of the kings subsidies bound vnto them in most unconscionable sort, and for such detestable vsurie as (if the authours that write thereof were not of credit) would hardlie be belueued. All which euidences or bonds they solemnly burned in the midst of the church. After which, ech went his waie, the souldiers to the king, and the commons to their houses, and so was the citie quieted. This happened at Poyke on Palmesundaye eue, being the 17. of March: and vpon the 15. of that moneth, those that inhabited in the towne of S. Edmundsburie in Suffolke, were set vpon, and manie of them slaine. The residue that escaped, through the procurement of the abbat then named Samson, were expelled, so that they neuer had anie dwellings there since that time.

Thus were the Jewes vnnmercifullie dealt with in all places in manner through this realme, the first beginning whereof chanced at London (as before ye haue heard) and the next at Lin, of which I thinke it good to note some part of the maner therof, although breedie, and so to returne to my purpose. The occasion therefore of the tumult at Lin chanced by this meanes: it fortuned that one of the Jewes there was become a christian, wherewith those of his nation were so moued, that they determined to kill him where soeuer they might find him. And herevpon they set vpon him one daie as he came by, through the streets: he to escape their hands fled to the next church; but his countrymen were so desirous to execute their malicious purpose, that they followed him still, and enforced themselves to breake into the church vpon him. Herewith the noise being raised by the christians that sought to saue the conuerted Jew, a number of iudicars being foreiners, that were arrived there with their vessels out of sundrie parts, and diuerse also of the townesmen came to the rescue, and setting vpon the Jewes, caused them to flee into their houses.

The townesmen were not verie earnest in pursuing of them, because of the kings proclamation and ordinance before time made in fauour of the Jewes: but the mariners followed them to their houses, &e diuerse of them, robbed and sacked their goods, and finallie set their dwellings on fire, and so burnt them vp altogether. These mariners being enriched with the spoile of the Jewes goods, and fearing to be called to accompt for their vnlawfull act by the kings officers, got them forthwith to shipboard, and hoisting vp sailes, departed with their ships to the sea, and so escaped the danger of that which might haue bene otherwise laid to their charge. The townesmen being called to an accompt excused themselves by the mariners, burdening them with all the fault. Vntil although they of Lin were thus excused, yet they of Poyke escaped not so easilie. For the king being aduertised of such outrage, done contrarie to the order of his lawes and expresse commandement, wrote ouer to the bishop of Elie his chancellour, charging him to take cruell punishment of the offenders.

The bishop with an armie went to Poyke, but the cheefe authours of the riot hearing of his comming, fled into Scotland: yet the bishop at his comming to the citie, caused earnest inquirie to be made of the whole matter. The citizens excused themselves, & offer-red to proue that they were not of counsell with them that had committed the riot, neither had they aided nor comforted them therein in anie manner of wise.
And in deed the most part of them that were the offenders, were of the countreies and townes nere to the citie, with such as were crossed into the holie land, and now gone ouer to the king, so that verie few or none of the substantiall men of the citie were found to haue ioined with them. Howbeit this would not excuse the citizens, but that they were put to their fine by the stout bishop, euerie of them paying his portion according to his power and abilitie in substance, the common sort of the poore people being pardoned, and not called into iudgement, sith the ringleaders were fled and gone out of the waie: and thus much by waie of digression touching the Jewes.

Now to returne vnto the king, who in this meane time was verie busie to prouide all things necessarie to set forward on his iourneie, his ships which laie in the mouth of the riuer of Saine, being readie to put off, he took order in manie points concerning the state of the common-wealth on that side, and cheeflie he called to mind, that it should be a thing necessarie for him, to name who should succeed him in the kingdom of England, if his chance should not be to returne againe from so long and dangerous a iourneie. He therefore named (as some suppose) his nephew Arthur, the sonne of his brother Gestebroke of Britaine, to be his successeur in the kingdome, a yong man of a likelie proue and princelie forwardnesse, but not ordeined by God to succeed ouer this kingdome.

About the same time the bishop of Elie, lord chan-cellour and cheefe iustice of England, took vp to the kings vse, of euerie citie in England two palstres and two sumpter hazzles, & of euerie abbey one palstrie and one sumpter hazzle; & euerie manour within the realme found also one palstrie and one sumpter hazzle. Moreover, the said bishop of Elie deliuered the gouernment of Poykeshire to his brother W-bert de Longchampe: and all those knights of the said shire, the which would not come to make answer to the laie vpon summons giuen them, he commanded to be apprehended and by and by call in person.
Also when the bishop of Durham was returned from the king and came ouer into England to go vnto his charge, at his meeting with the lord chancellour at Elie (notwithstanding that he shewed him his letters patents of the grant made to him to be iustice from Trent northward) the said lord chancellour taking his iourneie to Southwell with him, there dete-ned him as prisoner, till he had made surrender to red to him his sonnes, Henrie de Bussley, and Gilbert de la Ley, as pledges that he should keepe the peace against the king and all his subiects, untill the said prince should returne from the holie land. And so he was deliuered for that time, though shortly after, and whilst he remained at Poueder, there came to him Thibert de Longchampe the lord chancelloz brother, and William de Stuteuille, the which caused the said bishop to find sufficient suertie that he should not thence depart without the kings licence, or the lord chancelloz, so long as the king should be absent. Hereupon the bishop of Durham sent knowledge to the king how and in what sort he had bene handled by the chancelloz.

In the meane time the king was gone into Gascoigne, where he besieged a castell that belonged to one William de Giff, and took both the castell and the owner, whome he caused to be hanged for the spoiles and robberies which he had committed vpon pilgrims that passed by those parts toward Compostella, to visit the bodie of saint James. After this, the king came backe vnto Chinon in Anion, and there took order for the setting forth of his naue by sea, ouer which he appointed chiefe gouernours Gerard archbishop of Aux, Bernard bishop of Baieur, Robert de Sablins, Richard de Camuille, and William de Foz de Ulerun, commanding all those that should passe forth with his said naue, to be obedient vnto these persons as his deputies and lieutenants. Herewith they were appointed to prouide victuals to serue all those that should go by sea for the space of 60. daies.

The king also made the same time certeine ordinances to be obserued among the seafaring men which tended to this effect:

1 First, that if any man chanced to slea an other on the shipboard, he should be bound to the dead bodie and so throwne into the sea.

2 Secondlie, if he killed him on land, he should yet be bound to him as before, and so buried quick together.

3 Thirdlie, if any man should be conuicted by lawfull witness, that he drew any weapon to strike any other, or chanced by striking at any man to draw bloud of him that was smitten, he should lose his hand.

4 Fourthlie, if he gaue but a blowe with his fist without bloudshedding, he should be plunged thre severall times ouer head and eares in the water.

5 Fiftlie, if any man reuiled another, he should for euerie time so misusing himselfe, forfeit an ounce of siluer.

6 Sixtly, that if any man were taken with theft or pickerie, and thereof conuicted, he should haue his head polled, and hot pitch powred vpon his pate, and vpon that, the feathers of some pillow or cushion shaken aloft, that he might thereby be knowne for a theefe, and at the next arriual of the ships to any land, be put forth of the companie to sake his aduenture, without all hope of returne vnto his fellowes.

These were the statutes which this famous prince did enact at the first for his naue, which stithens that time haue been verie much enlarged. About the same time John Bishop of Whiterne in Scotland, suffragane to the church of Yorke, ordained Geoffrey archbishop of Yorke, preest. At the same season also the election of the same Geoffrey was confirmed by pope Clement, who among other things that he wrote to the chapter of Yorke on his behalfe, in the end he addeth these words: We do therefore admonish you all, and by the apostolicall bulles command you, that you exhibit both reuerence and honour vnto him as vnto your prelat, that thereby you may appeare commendable both before God and man. Given at La-teran in the nones of March and thirde yeare of our gouernment.

Whilst these things were in doing, there came into France legats from the said Clement, to moue the two kings to make all the speed possible towards their iourneie, because of the great danger wherein things stood in Palestyne, requiring present helpe. Hereupon king Richard (his men and prouision being ready) commanded that his ships should set forth, and to coast about by the streits of Giberaltre to come vnto Marseilles, where he appointed to meet them, and so with a chosen companie of men he also set forth thitherwards by land, and comming to Toloz, receiued the scrip and staffe as a pilgrime should, at the hands of the archbishop there.

After this, both the kings of England and France met at Wizeley in the octaues of the natiuitie of S. John Baptist, and when they had remained there two daies they passed forth to the citie of Lion; where the two kings departed in sunder, and each one kept his iourneie, the one toward Cuenes, where his naue was appointed to come to him, and the other to Marseilles, there to meet with his fleet, according to his appointment. But the English ships being let and staied by the way by contrarie winds and rigorous tempests, which tossed them to and fro vpon the coasts of Spaine, could not come in any conuenient time vnto Marseilles, so that king Richard thinking long to tarrie for them, and perceiuing they could not keepe their appointed time, he hired ships from all places thereabouts, and embarking himselfe and his men in the same, vpon saint Laurence euen, sailed forth towards Sicille, where he was appointed to meet with king Philip.

Here is to be noted, that king Richard made not all that iourneie from Marseilles to Messina by sea, but sundrie times comming on land, hired horses, and rode forth alongst the coast, appointing with his ships and galleies where to meet him, and sometimes he rested certeine daies together in one place or other as at Portdelphin, at Naples, and at Salerne, from whence there departed from him Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie, Hubert bishop of Salisburie, and the lord Ranulfe de Glanuille, the which taking vpon them to go before, with prosperous wind and weather in short space landed at Acon, which was then besieged, as you shall heare hereafter.

At Rome the king came not, but being within the streame of the riuer of Tiber, there came to him a cardinal named Otauianus, bishop of Hostia, to whom he spake manie reprochfull words of the couetousnesse vled in the court of Rome (a vice reputed the common nurse of all mischances, as one verie well noteth,

Pbi auaritia est, habuit ferme omnia ilidem Flagitia, impietas, periuia furta, rapina, Fraudes atq; doli, insidiaq; pradiationes, Iurgia et infandae cedes, &c.)

Because they had receiued seauen hundred marks for the consecration of the bishop of Pauns, and 1500. marks for the confirming of the bishop of Elie the popes legat. And againe no small summe of monie they had receiued of the archbishop of Burdeaux, when vpon an accusation brought against him by the cleargie of his prouince he should haue bene depofed. In the meane time whilst king Richard thus passed forward towards Messina, the naue that was appointed to coast about Spaine and to meet him at Marseilles, was tossed (as before is said) with wind and tempests, and a part thereof, that is to wit, ten ships driuen here and there on the coasts of Spaine, of which number nine arriued at Lisbon and the tenth being a ship of London arriued at the citie of Sylua, which was then the uttermost citie of Spaine, Spain, that was inhabited with christians.

The Saracens at that time made warres against the king of Portingale, so that the Portingales stood in need of aid, in so much that they of Spina did not onelie intreat the Englishmen to staie with them for a time, but also got grant of them to breake their ship, with the timber whereof they might the better fortifie their towne, promising that their king should recompense them with an other as good as theirs, and also further satisfie them for their seruice, during the time of their abode there in defense of that cite. Likewise of those that arrived at Lisbon there went to the number of five hundred unto saint Francis, where the king of Portingale then was, looking to be assaulted by his enemies: but by the counterfet death of the great K. of the Saracens named Bosac Almiraminoli (who feared these new succours, and doubted the sequels of his doings, to the end he might depart with honour, he fained himselfe dead) the king of Portingale was for that time peacefully deliuered out of danger.

Whereupon he returned to Lisbon, where he found three scope and three other ships of king Richards name there newlie arrived, ouer the which were chiefe captains Robert de Sabuville, and Richard de Camuille: which at their comming to land could not so gouerne their people, but that some naughtie felowes amongst them fell to breaking and robbing of orchards: some also entring into the cite, behaued themselves verie disorderlie. But yet by the comming of the king, their lewdnesse was staied, so that he seemed not to take reuenge of the pilgrims, but rather with courteous meanes to brydle their lawlesse attempts: whereunto the diligence of the English captains not a little preuailed for a while, but yet for all that could be done on both sides, within three daies after, a new tumult was raised betwixt the English pilgrims and the townesmen, and diuerse hurt and killed on either part.

Whereupon the king caused the gates of the cite to be shut, and all those that were come from the ships into the cite to eat and drinke (being in number about seauen hundred) were apprehended and committed to ward: and before they could be released, sir Robert Sabuville and sir Richard Camuille were glad to agree with the king, so as all former offenses being remitted, and things taken by either part restored, the Englishmen promised to obserue the peace against the king of Portingale and his people; and he likewise couenanted for him and his subjects, that they should keepe the peace against all pilgrims that went forth in this boiage, and vse them like his friends, and thus the quarrell ceased.

Some after, the English nauie departed from Lisbon, and came vnto the mouth of the riuer of Taie, betwene Caprico and Belem, where the same date on saint James eue the lord William de Forzoulerun arrived also with three and thirtie other ships, and so then they were in all about an hundred and six sailles verie well furnished and manned, and so from thence taking their course towards Garfcelles, finally they arrived there in the octaues of the assumption of our ladie; and staing there an eight daies (till they had repaired such things about their ships as were needfull) they set forward againe, and came to Messina in Sicilie in the feast of the exaltation of the crosse. On the sunday following also came the French king thither, hauing lost no small part of his nauie by tempests of weather.

King Richard as then remained at Saleru, and hearing that his nauie was gone towards Messina, he departed thence on the thirtieth day of September, and halied forth towards Messina, passing by Melphi and Cocenza, and so at length comming to Farro de Messina, he passed the same, and on the 23. day of September arrived at Messina with great noise of trumpets and other instruments, to the wonder of the French king and others that beheld his great puissance and roiall behauiour: now at his comming. The same time he went vnto the French kings lodging, to commen with him of their business: and immediatlie the French king took the sea, in purpose to haue passed forward on his iournie but by contrarie wind he was staied and kept backe within the hauen, whereupon both the kings determined to winter there, and in the meane time to prouide themselves of all things necessarie for their iournie, against the beginning of the next spring. On the 30 of September he receiued his sister the quene of Sicilie, the widowe of William late king of that Ile, whom he placed in a strong fortresse, which he took the same day, and left therein a conuenient garrison of men of armes and demilances for the safeguard of the place and of his said sister.

¶ But now for the better vnderstanding of the cause of such quarelling as fell out betwixt the Englishmen and the Sicilians, we shall vnderstand that a little before the arrivall of the kings of England and France in those parts, king William of Sicilie was departed this life, leauing no issue behind him. Whereupon the lords of the Ile elected one Tancred to their king, a bastard sonne of Roger sometime king of that land, and grandfather to this last deceased king William. This Tancred though he receiued king Richard verie courteously: yet he greatly trusted him not, because he demanded the dowrie of his sister quene Joane, wife to the late king William to be restored, whereas he had not readie monie to discharge it.

Furthermore to depart with the cite of Mount Achaire of saint Angelo, with all the countie therunto belonging, which was indeed assigned to him for his dowrie, he thought in no wise profitable: but king Richard did not onelie require that cite and countie with a chaire of gold, according to the custome of that kingdom in right of his sister, as due to him by way of his dowrie, but also he required to his owne vse a table of gold containing twelue foot in length, and one foot and an halfe in breadth, & two tressels of gold to beare by the same table, with 24. silver cups, and as manie dishes of silver, with a tent of silke of such largenesse that two hundred knights might sit at meat within it: also forty thousand measures of wheat, with as manie of barlie, and as manie of wine, beside one hundred armed gallies, with all furniture and vittels sufficient to serue the gallie-men in the same for the terme of two yeares. These things he demanded as due to him being heire to his father king Henrie, accordinglie as was deuised by king William in his last will and testament, which demands seemed intollerable to the said Tancred: so that if he could haue thifted the matter, he was loth to haue heard thereof.

Moreover, because pope Clement in right of the church pretended a title to the realme of Sicilie, now that king William was dead without heires, he doubted of some practise that might be made against him betwixt king Richard and the pope. Whereupon he thought to prouide against all attempts that might be made, fortifying his townes & castels with strong garrisons, and took counsell with the citizens of Messina, by what meanes he might best dispatch his countie of that present danger, and procure K. Richard to get him forward on his iournie.

Whilste these things were in hand, there was misfired to the English men occasion of displeasure: for as it oftentimes chanceth (where an armie is) certaine of the vnrulie souldiers within Messina bled them themselves somewhat riotouslie, whereupon the citizens offended therewith, got them to armour, and chased all the souldiers out of the cite. King Richard who laie in campe without the walles nere to the cite, was so highlie displeased herewith, that he caused his men to arme themselves, and to prepare ladders and other necessarie things to assault the cite: but by the mediation of the French king & courteous excuse of king Tancred (allegging the fault to rest onlie in a sort of rude citizens, whom he promised to punish) the matter was taken by, and staid for a time, till at length it was perceived, that the Sicilians subtilie went about to sed king Richard with faire words, till he should be readie to set forwards on his iourne, and so should the matter passe without further punishment.

Whereupon king Richard, not minding to be so mocked at their hands, approached one daie to the wals and gates with his armie in god arraie of battell to give the assault, which was done so earnestlie, and so well maintained, that finallie the cite was entered by force, and manie of the citizens slaine, but the slaughter had bene much greater, if king Richard had not commanded his men to spare the sword, moved with the lamentable noise of poore people crieng to him for mercie and grace. The Englishmen having got possession of the cite pight by the banners with the armes of the king of England round about the wals, wherewith the French king was sore displeased, and required that the same might be taken downe, and his set by: but the king of England would not so agree. Nevertheless to pacifie the French kings mood, he deliuered the cite of Messina into the custodie of the knights Templers and Hospitallers, till he might be satisfied of such things as he demanded of king Tancred.

The two kings of England and France receive a solemne oth.

After this on the 8. daie of October, the two kings of England and France, before a great number of earles, barons, and others, both of the cleargie and temporallie, took their sollemne othes, that the one should defend the other, and also either others armie in this iourne, both comming and going, without fraud or deceit: and the like oth was received by the earles and barons on both parties. Then the two kings by aduise and consent of both their armies deuised these ordinances.

Ordinances
deuised.

1 That all pilgrims which chanced to die in this iourne might dispose at their pleasure all their armour, hories, and apparell, and halfe of those things which they had with them, so that they sent nothing home into their countries, and the other halfe should be at the discretion of Walter archbishop of Rouen, Spaner bishop of Langres, of the maister of the temple, and of the maister of the Hospitall, of Hugh duke of Burgoigne, of Rafe de Coucie, of Diego de Harloun, of Robert Sabuill, Andzew de Chauernie, and of Gilbert Malcoille, which should implore the same towards the support of the wars in the holie land against the infidels as they thought most expedient.

Plaine forbad-den.

2 That no man should plaie at anie game within the armie for monie, except knights and chapleins, the which should not lose in one daie and night above 20 shillings, they to forfeit an 100 shillings so oft as they lost above that summe: the persons ascertained to haue the same to be distributed as afore is said. The two kings might plaie, and command their seruants in their presence likewise to plaie, so that they exceeded not the summe of 20 shillings. And also the seruants of archbishops, bishops, earles and barons, by their maisters commandement might play, not exceeding that summe: but if anie seruants or mariners, or other of like degree, were found to play without licence, the seruants should be whiped naked thre daies round about the campe, except they ransomed forth themselves, at the pleasure of the persons aboue named: and the mariners should be plunged ouer head and eares in the sea thre monings together, after the vse of seamen, except they redeemed that punishment, at the discretion likewise of the said persons: and those of other like meane degrees being neither knights nor chapleins should be punished as seruants.

3 That if anie pilgrime borrowed anie thing of an other whilst he was on his iourne, he should be bound to paie it: but if he borrowed it before his setting forth, he was not bound to answer it till his returne home.

Borrowing.

4 That if anie mariner or seruant, retained in wages with anie man in this iourne, departed from his master without licence, no other person might receive him, and if he did, he should be punished at the discretion of the forenamed persons.

Souldiers or mariners de-

5 That no vitteler or other should buy any bread to sell againe, nor any meale within the compasse of the campe, except the same were brought by a stranger, neither might they buy any paast or other thing to sell againe in the campe, or within a league of it.

Vittelers.

6 That if anie man bought coine therof to make bread, it was appointed how much he should gaine in one measure beside the bran.

7 That other occupiers, which used buying and selling of wares, should gaine one penie in 10 pence, neither should anie man refuse anie of the kings coine, except it were broken within the circle.

8 That no man should buy anie flesh to sell it againe, except a liuing beast, which he should kill with in the campe.

9 That no man should make bread to sell, but after the rate of penie loanes. Wherin the penie English was appointed to go for foure pence Antouine. All these ordinances with other were decreed and ordeined to be obserued and kept by the counsell, consent, and agreement of the kings of England, France, and Sicile.

But to returne now to the dissention betwixt the Englishmen and them of Messina: ye shall understand that the tumult being once ceassed, and diuers of the chiefe offenders in the late commotion put to death, king Tancred shortly after came thither, and sought to auoid all suspicion out of king Richards head, that he might conceiue of him for being in anie wise culpable in that which his subjects of Messina had attempted against him, and therefore hauing recovered monie of his friends, he restored vnto king Richard the dowrie of his sister quene Joane, and further offered vnto him to ioine in new alliance with him, offering his daughter in mariage vnto Arthur duke of Britaine, the kings nephew, with a great summe of monie for his dowrie, if it so should please him.

Polydor.

King Richard accepted the offer, and so ioined in peace and affinitie with the king of Sicile, receiving of him twentie thousand ounces of gold for the same mariage to be had, and an honorable dowrie assigned forth of the lands that belonged to the said Arthur for the said ladie to enjoy during his life, in case she suruiued his husband. And if it so chanced, that by the death of either of them the mariage could not take place, then should king Richard restore the same twentie thousand ounces of gold againe. But beside these twentie thousand ounces of gold thus given by king Tancred for the mariage of his daughter, he gaue other twentie thousand ounces to king Richard for an acquittance and quite claime of all manner of duties, rights, and demands, which either he or his sister might pretend, either by reason of anie bequest, dowrie, or anie other manner of waie.

Here

There is to be noted, that before this coronation of prince was had, king Richard provided for his crown defence, in case that king A. second and his people would have attempted force against him, in such that he furnished certain places, and built a strong castle abut upon the top of an hill call'd by Spelina, which castle he call'd Spetragration. Also whereas the admiral of Sicile call'd Spargaret, and one Joy-dant del Pomer, men of great authority under king Canard, fled out of Spelina with all their families and riches, which they had either in gold or silver, king Richard seized upon their houses, their galleys, and possessions, so that he made himself as strong as he could, to resist all attempts that might be made against him by his enemies. But now to proceed.

The variance being thus appeared between them, great debates came to arise between king Richard and king Philip, who was much offended with king Richard, for that he had thus used violence against them of Spelina, and compelled king Canard to agree with him for money, to the great offence and breach of the lances of Herberborough, with the Sicilians were liberal aid and furnished the chas-tles with munition and necessary provisions.
 The Frenchmen also had much cause to be angry, after upon a small occasion they picked a quarrel against the Englishmen, and from thence fell to strokes on both sides, so that there had been much hurt & slaughter committed, if the two kings had not done their best to appease the strife begun.

But this business though it was quiet as then taken up and slain, yet had it such influence because the princes and their people, that it turned to the great hurt and hindrance of their good proceedings in their whole enterprise, so that the occasion of a full and perfect treaty could slip out of their hands, as you shall hereafter see.

An other also of the special causes of grudge between the two kings was, for that king Richard in favour of the countess of Flanders, that he had married the king of Flanders daughter, and claimed for her his sister Aude: which grieved king Philip not a little, though he understood the matter for a time, and rather alleged other causes of displeasure, especially to accuse king Richard to the countess, as one that sought his own commodity in spoiling those whom he ought rather to have defended. And to proceed.

Which the English and French armies thus instructed all the winter there in Sicile, notwithstanding the troubles abroad, to the hindrance of king Richard's purposes, for the making of his provisions ready for his journey, he yet could not be drawn, his ships to be armed, rigged and repaired of such parts as they had received both in their long voyage which they had made, and also by certain breaches, the which during the time of their being there, had in many places grown and came upon through to the great danger of their life, and utter decay. Wherefore at the same time he purchased all vessels by sea through all his dominions, extracting for now all his right to the same, as they had for certain purpose making ready by sea, and commanding also to land, should have all his goods fire and clothe to himself. Furthermore he decreed, that if he should be perished in the ship, then his sons and daughters, with all his officers, that could power themselves to be men of arms to him, should have the same goods, but if he had neither son nor daughter, brother nor sister, then should the king have those goods by way of his prerogative.

This ordinance made by king Richard, was confirmed by his charter given at Spelina on the 10th month of October and second year of his reign. Also upon a good repentance for having so far please the merciful God to touch his heart, he called all those prelates together which were then with him at Spelina into the chapel of Margaret or Anne, & there in presence of them all falling down upon his knees he confessed the sin which he had in his own last before that time led, and humble request penance intended him by the same bishops, and so became a new man, fearing God, and desirous to live after his fathers.

Furthermore hearing of the great loss of saint Joachim, he sent for him out into Calabria, who came to Spelina, and being asked sundry questions by king Richard, he made wonderful answer thereto: as in Howeden and other histories it may appear, which for brevity I pass over. About the same time he gave unto his nephew Aude, the count of the sister Aude, sometime bishop of Bayonne, the coun-tie of Perche. But although some were contented to receive him as their lord, and to do homage to him, yet other refused him, alleging that they would not renounce their fealties due to the king, till they might see him again, & talk with him face to face.
 Whereupon the king changing his purpose, gave unto the said Aude the countie of Poitou in stead of the said countie of Perche, as after shall appear.

The two kings of England and France held their Christmas this year at Spelina, and still the king of England took great libel in his brothering his traitors for the mourning brought in and other means of warre, so that it was thought he spent more in a month than some of his predecessors ever spent in a whole year. In the month of February he sent his galleys to Naples, there to receive his mother and his wife that should be, to wit the lady Berengaria daughter to the king of Navarre, and Philip count of Flanders that came with them. But his mother queen Eleanor and the lady Berengaria went to Vienne in Dauphine, where they were honorably received of Spargaret king Canard's admiral. Whereafter the count of Flanders coming to Naples, and finding there the galleys of king Richard burnt about the same, and so came to Spelina, at the first following the king of England in all things, till the French king having much threatened him, and then he being altogether on his knees. The last day of March the king of England departed from Spelina, to go to the care of California, there to remain with king Canard, who came thither to meet him.

Here king Richard understood, that the French king had intended king A. second to let him the king of England and his army, so that they out of his realm: and for the more cause accomplishment thereof he had promised him his aid, wherefore he would give the advantage. King Canard's admiral also to king Richard his letters as the French king had written to him concerning this matter. Whereupon at his return to Spelina, king Richard therefore his following countenance, that he was no thing pleased with the French king, but sought means to get him out of his company.

The French king perceiving it, required to know what the cause of this his sudden departure was: whereupon king Richard nothing fearing his question, declared the truth plainly: that there by the countie of the count of Flanders: and when the other heard the reason, he for good of the thing, spread from the same letters which king Canard had delivered unto him. The French king was not a little troubled hereat, and well not what to do, nor what to make, the matter was so plain. But yet at length he said: what more I perceive the king of England seeketh to haue some quarell whie he may refuse to marrie with my sister. For these are but forged matters, and no truth resteth in them.

When the king of England vnderstood this manner of answer, he replied in this wise; That as for the French kings sister, he might not marrie, for as much as he was able to produce good witnesse to proue that his father had lien with hir and got a child of hir. And as for his priue proceeding and practise with Lancered, he needed no further testimonie than his owne hand and his seale, the partie himselfe being present who receiued them, the messenger also being not far off that carried them betwene both the parties.

When the French king was throughlie informed of the first point, through counsell of the earle of Flanders and others, he pacified himselfe, and was contented to release the king of England of his faith given by oth for the contract made with his sister Alice: in consideration of which releasement and deliverance, the king of England couenanted to giue yereleie to the French king two thousand marks of sterling coine for the terme of five yeares together: and at his returne home, it was agreed, that he should also deliuer vnto the French king his sister the said ladie Alice, with the towne of Gisors, and all other things which the French king had granted to him with his said sister. On the other part, the French king granted, that the dutchie of Britaine should appertene to the dominion of the dutchie of Poymandie, so as the duke of Britaine should be accompanied the liege man of the duke of Poymandie, and that the duke of Poymandie should answer the French king for both the dutchies, as well of Britaine as Poymandie. These agreements were ratified and confirmed with solemne oths receiued, and charters giuen vnder their hands and seales, vpon the 30. of March.

The French king setteth forth from Messina towards the holie land.

Queene Elianor returneth by Rome.

March. Paris. 1100 ships and 110000 men sailth by the Helles.

About this time the French king (now that the season of the yeare was come) set forthward toward the holie land, leaving king Richard behind him in Sicile: and the two and twentieth day after his setting forth from Messina, he arrived at the siege of Acres or Acon. The same day also that the French king departed from Messina, queene Elianor the mother of king Richard arrived there, bringing with hir the ladie Berengaria the daughter of Sanctus the king of Nauarre, and the fourth day after queene Elianor took leave of hir sonne king Richard, and departed homeward towards England, taking hir tourney by Rome about the businesse of Geoffrey the elect of Poike, as to intreat the pope that he would confirme and consecrate him archbishop, or to authorize some other to do it in his name. The ladie Berengaria remained behind with the kings sister Joane queene of Sicile.

After this in the moneth of Aprill, on the Wednesday in the passion weeke, king Richard (after he had finished and made an end of all conclusions with king Lancered) did also set forthward with his sister Joane, who toke with hir the ladie Berengaria daughter to the king of Nauarre, affianced to him long before, as aboue is partly mentioned. His nauie consisted in thirtene mightie great ships, with triple sails, an hundred carlikes or rather hulkes, and fiftie gallies. He was no sooner abroad in the maine sea, but a great tempest arose, wherewith his whole nauie was fore tossed and turmoiled vp and downe the seas, and at length driuen on the coast of Cyprus, where seeking to take harbour, & to come on land, the Cypriots would not suffer him, but shewed countenance to driue him backe, and to resist his landing. Also wheras sir of his ships were so driuen by force of tempest from the residue, that they of them perished, and they being cast vpon the shoare of Cyprus before the kings arrival there, the souldiers and other people in the same were compelled to come on land for sauing their liues, where otherwise they stood in danger of drowning, the people of the Ile assailing them in right cruell sort, slue diuerse, and toke the residue prisoners, and so detained them for a certeine season.

King Richard then vnderstanding this iniurie to him done by the Cypriots, & perceiuing they would resist his landing, prepared himselfe and his people to enter vpon them by force. The king of Cyprus Isakius or Cursach (whome Houeden nameth emperor of Cyprus) had assembled the most part of all the power of men that he might make (though few of them were armed, or had any great skill in feats of warre) and caused them to set boards, logs of wood, benches, fornes, and great chests afore them, as a defense, and as it were in stead of a wall, that by succour thereof they might the better keepe off their enimie from landing.

But k. Richard so encouraged his men by his presence, & hartened them with such comfortable words as he uttered vnto them, that rowing to the shoare with their gallees and small botes, hauing the archers afore them, they easilie got to land, driue their enimies backe, and so farre pursued them (being but footmen, weatherbeaten, wearie, and weat) as conuenientlie they might, for the shortnes of time. King Richard hauing thus got fot on land, approached the towne of Limezun, which he with his souldiers entered, and finding it emptie of people (which were fled aboate) but full of riches and great plentie of victuals, as cozne, wine, oile, and flesh, he seized there vpon.

The same day also the kings sisters and the ladie Berengaria with the residue of the kings nauie entered the haven of Limezun. In the meane time the king of Cyprus (hauing escaped from the battell) got together his men which were fled and dispersed sundrie waies, and incamped within six miles of king Richard, threatening that the next day he would encounter giue battell: which when king Richard vnderstood, he caused his people to be armed the next morning long before day, and so comming by guides vnto the place where the Cypriots with their king were lodged, suddenly they assailed them yer they had a nie warning of his marching towards them, by reason wherof they were slaine like beasts in great numbers. Howbeit, their king and a few other escaped and fled away naked, hauing no time to put on their apparell, his treasure, horse, armour and standard were taken, which standard king Richard strait waies determined to send vnto saint Edmunds spire, and so did.

Hauing thus vanquished his aduersaries, he came backe to Limezun: and the third day after, Cile king of Jerusalem and his brother Geoffrey de Lusignan with the prince of Antioch Raimond and his sonne named also Raimond earle of Tripoli, with other noble men, arrived at Limezun aforesaid, to visit king Richard, and to offer him their seruices, and so became his men, in swearing fealtie to him against all other persons whatsoeuer.

The same day the king of Cyprus perceiuing himselfe vnable to resist the great puissance of king Richards armie, sent ambassadours, and offered to king Richard the summe of twentie thousand marks of gold, in recompense of the monie which his men that were drowned had about them, and also to restore those to libertie which he had taken prisoners, and to make deliuerie to their hands of all their goods. Furthermore, he offered to go with him into the holie land personallie, and to serue him with an hundred knights, 400 light horsemen, and 500 well armed footmen. & also to deliver to king Richard his daughter and here in hostage, and to acknowledge him his sovereign lord, by swearing to him fealty for his kingdom, as for that which he should confesse to hold of him.

King Richard accepted these offers, and so the king of Cyprus came in and swore fealty to king Richard, in presence of the king of Jerusalem, the prince of Antioch, and other barons, and promised upon his oath then received, not to depart till all things covenanted on his part were performed. Then king Richard assigned tents for him and his to lodge in, and appointed certaine knights and other men of warre to have the custodie of him. But the same day after dinner upon repentance of that which he had done, he decreed his keepers and scale away, sending knowledge backe to the king that he would not stand to the covenants, which were concluded upon betwixt them.

King Richard feared to like the matter well enough, and forthwith delivered a part of his armie unto the king of Jerusalem and to the prince of Antioch, appointing them to pursue the king of Cyprus by land, whilst he with one part of his galleys and Robert de Turnham with the other might search about the coast by sea, to prohibit his passage by water. In euery place where they came, such ships and galleys as they found they seized into their hands, and no resistance was made against them, by reason the people fled to the woods and mountains, leaving the cities, townes and castles void in all speeds, where the king or the said sir Robert de Turnham with their vessels began to appeere. When they had taken their pleasure thus alongst the coasts, they returned againe unto Limasun. The king of Jerusalem and the other that went forth by land, when they could not speed of their purpose, returned also, in which meane time a great number of Cypriots came in, and submitting themselves to king Richard, were received as his subjects.

On the 12. daie of Maie, the ladie Berengaria daughter to the king of Nauarre was married according to a precontract unto king Richard at Limasun as before said in the Ile of Cyprus, one of the kings chaplains executing the order of the marriage. The same daie also she was crowned by the bishop of Cuneo, the archbishops of Apania and Atr, with the bishop of Baton ministering unto him. After the solemnitie of this marriage and coronation ended, king Richard set forward with his armie into the countrie of Cyprus, and first wan by surrender the citie of Nicosia, and after the strong castell of Cherrin, within the which was the daughter of the king of Cyprus, which ladie humbly yielded hir selfe unto Is. Richard, who counting it reproch to be criticame with such as submit themselves, and speciallie the female sex, according to the old saying,

Parere subest inuilibi sit in leoni had pittie of hir case, and sent hir to his wife the next quene, willing that she might be honorable used. From thence passing forward, these castles were delivered into his hands, Basses and Buffent, Den, Amur, Candace, and afterwards all the other castles and cities, townes and places of strength within that Ile one after an other. Finallie, hearing that the king of Cyprus was inclosed in an abbey called Cap S. Andrew, he marched thitherwards: but when the king of Cyprus heard of his approach, he came forth and submitted himselfe wholly into his hands. The king first appointed him to the keeping of his chamberlaine Rafe Fitz Cestre, and after sent him unto the citie of Tripoli, there to be kept in close prison. Who when he heard he should be committed to close prison, and remaine in fetters, said, that if he lay in irons, he should shortly end his life. Whereunto king Richard when he heard of it, answered: He saith well, and therefore because he is a noble man, and our mind is not to haue him dead, but onely to be kept safe from starting any more away, and doing new hurt, let him be chained in gins and fetters made of siluer, and so he was.

But to proceed. After the king had set the countrie of Cyprus in god state, he delivered the keeping thereof unto Richard de Cammille and Robert de Turnham. This done, upon the wednesday in the Whitsun weeke he toke the sea againe, and passed oner to the citie of Acres, which as then was besieged by the christian armie, as ye may read in the description of the holie land, onely giuing pon to understand, that such was the valiancie of king Richard shewed in manfull constringing of the citie, that his praise was greatly bzuted both amongst the Christians and also the Saracens.

Notobrit the secret enimitie betwixt him and the French king effones renewed, by occasion of such discord as chanced betwixt Guido king of Jerusalem, and Conrade the marques of Tirc, so that parties were taken, and whereas both the Pisans and Genoiois did offer their seruice unto king Richard, yet because the Genoiois were confederat with the French king, who toke part with the marques, he refused them, and receiued the Pisans, joining himselfe with king Guido to support him against his enemies.

Here is to be remembred, that before king Richard arrived at the siege, he encountered on the sea a mightie great ship called a Diamond, which one Saphaldine the brother of Salabine a prince of the Saracens had sent, to refresh them with vittels. This ship king Richard caused sercelie to be assailed with his galleys, and at length bologed hir with all the vittels and prouision within the same, as with fire, barrels of fire serpents, armour and weapons of sundrie sorts, besides all the martiners and men of warre, except such as were taken to merrie and saved aliuie, being about 200 in the whole, whereas there were aboard the same ship 500 men of warre, as some write, though other haue but 800.

But now to other accidents that chanced this yere. On Whitsunmer ere there was such an eclipse of the sunne, the more being the same time 27. daies old, that for the space of three houres, so long it lasted such darkness came ouer the face of the earth, that euen in the daie time (for this eclipse began about nine of the clocke in the morning) the stars appeared plainelie in the element.

In the same moneth of Iune, Richard de Cammille, whom the king had left as ye haue heard governing in Cyprus, chanced to fall sick, and coming without licence to the siege of Acres, there died. After whose death the Cypriots and those called Cristiones and Crimians reuolted from the English obedience, and chose to them a king, one that was a monke of the familie of Iacobus their former king: but Robert de Turnham, who after the decease of Richard Cammille remained sole gouernour of the Ile, gathered a power of men together, and giuing battell to the new king (whom Iobeden nameth Isos emperor) vanquished him with his complices, toke him prisoner, and hanged him on a paire of gallows. The same moneth also died Rafe Fitz Cestre, who had the other king Isac in custodie, and then king Richard delivered him to the knights of the hospitall, who sent him to the castell of Bargent, there safe to be kept as prisoner to the vse of the king of England.

land and make some mention of the doings there. We shall understand, that after king Richard was set forward on his journey, William Longchampe lord chancellor and bishop of Ely, appointed (as we have heard) governor of the realme, began to exercise his authoritie to the uttermost, taking upon him the state of a prince, rather than of a subiect. He had of late (as before we have heard) procured such favour at the hands of pope Clement, that he was instituted by him legat of the apostolicke see here in England, so that pretending a rule both over the clergie and temporallie, and by reason that he had both the authoritie of pope and king in his hands, he used the same to his most advantage, as well in causes ecclesiasticall as temporall, whereby he wrought manie oppressions both against them of the clergie and temporallie. He maintained such a power and countenance in his doings, that he would ride with a thousand hostes, by meanes whereof when he came to lie at abbeys and other places (bringing with him such a traine) he was verie burdalous unto them, specially when he laie at their houses any space of time.

This man called a convocation at Westmynster, wherein at the suit of Hugh Bonant bishop of Chester, it was decreed, that the monks of Conventrie should be displaced, and secular canons brought into that house to supplie their rooms. Which was done by the authoritie of the said lord chancellor, being bid by the foresaid bishop of Chester (as some writers have recorded) for displeasure which he bare to the monks, by reason of a fraine which they had made upon the said bishop in their church at Conventrie, and drawne blood of him before the altar there, as he alleged.

But some have written, that the bishop of Chester procured a licence of the pope, to alter the state of that church in fort above mentioned, which is most likelie, furnishing against the monks, that they were most manifest and stubborn disturbers of that peace and quietnes which ought to remaine amongst churchmen: and yet he himselfe solved the strife and dissention amongst them, and namelie betwene the prior and his convent. Moreover, the said lord chancellor deprived such rulers of their administrations and governments, as the king had appointed to beare any high authoritie within the realme, pretending not onlie the kings commandement, but also alleading a reason which moved him so to do, as thus, that he might thereby take awaye all occasions of grudges from the people, which otherwise might thinke, and would not sticke to saie, that they were oppressed by the rule of manie kings in stead of one king. He did also deprive Hugh the bishop of Durham of all his honour and dignitie, and put the bishop of Winchester to great trouble. Moreover, doubting least the Nobles of the realme would rise against him, and put him out of his place, he sought to keepe them lowe, and spoiled them of their monie and substance. Likewise pretending a colour of doubt, least earle John the kings brother should attempt any thing against his brother the king now in his absence, he sought also to keepe him under. To be briefe, he played in all points the right part of a tyrant, and shewed himselfe such a one in all respects as maintained his title,

Non disceptando aut subtilibus argumentis Pincere, sed ferro manu sua iura tueri, Fonsifices nunc bella incitant, sunt cetera nuga, Nec precepta patrum nec Christi dogmata curant, Iactant se dominos rerum & sibi cuncta licere.

At length the king received advertisement from his mother quene Elianor of his demeanour, and that there was great likelihood of some commotion to ensue, if speedie remedie were not in time provided.

Whereupon being then in Sicilie, he sent Walter the archbishop of Rouen into England with commission, to joine in administration of the kingdom with his chancellor the said bishop of Ely. But the archbishop coming into England was so slenderly entertained of the chancellor, and in effect so little regarded, that notwithstanding his commission and instructions brought from the king, he could not be permitted to beate any rule. But the chancellor detaining the same wholie in his hands, ordered all things at his pleasure, without making the archbishop, nor Rouen, or any other of counsell with him, except such as it pleased him to admit for the serving of his owne turne.

¶ He certeinly beleaved (as manie other did) that king Richard would never returne with life into England againe, which caused him to attempt so manie unlawfull enterprises, and therefore he got into his hands all the castles and fortresses belonging to the crowne, and furnished them with garrisons of souldiers, as he thought necessarie, depriving such captains of their rooms as he suspected not to favour his proceedings.

One Gerard de Camuille had bought of the king the keeping of the castle of Lincolne, unto whom also the shiriffewike of the shire was committed for a time, but the lord chancellor, perceiving that he bare more good will unto earle John the kings brother than to him (which John he most suspected) he took from him the shiriffewike, & demanded also to have the castle of Lincolne delivered into his hands, which Gerard refused to deliver, and perceiving that the chancellor would practise to have it by force, he fled unto earle John, requiring him of competent aid and succour.

The chancellor on the other part, perceiving what hatred diuerse of the Nobles bare him, thought good to provide for his owne libertie the best that he could, and therefore sent for a power of men from beyond the sea: but because he thought it too long to staie till they arrived, he came to Lincolne with such power as he could make, and besieged the castle. Earle John the kings brother advertised hereof, raised such numbers of men as he might make of his friends, servants and tenants, and with small ado won the castles of Nottingham and Tickhill within two daies space. This done, he sent to the lord chancellor, commanding him either to breake up his siege, or else to prepare for battell. The chancellor considering with himselfe that there was small trust to be put in deviance of those lords that were with him, bearing good will to earle John, and but hollow harts towards him, raised his siege and departed with dishonour.

Not long after, one of his houses was broken off by the death of pope Clement, whereby his power legantine ceased: wherewith being somewhat abashed, he came to a communication with earle John, and upon certein conditions made peace with him. Shortlie after the souldiers which he had sent for, arrived in England, and then he began to go from the agreement made with earle John, affirming that he would either drive the same earle out of England, or else should earle John do the like to him: for it was not of sufficient largenesse to hold them both. Holdbeit shortlie after, a peace was effones concluded betwixt them with condition, that if it chanced king Richard to depart this life before his returne into England, not leaving any issue of his bodie begotten, that then the chancellor renouncing the ordinance made by king Richard (who had instituted his nephew Arthur duke of Britaine to be his heire and successor) should consent to admit earle John for king of England, contrarie to the said ordinance.

But in the meane time it was agreed, that earle John

Philip. John

John should deliver by the castles of Nottingham and Tickhill, Nottingham to the hands of William Marshall, and Tickhill to the hands of William de Lendenall, they to keepe the same unto the use and behoofe of king Richard, that upon his returne he might doe with them as should please him: provided that if it so chanced, that he should die before he could returne from his boiage, or that the chancelour went from the agreement now taken, then immediatlie should the foresaid castles of Nottingham and Tickhill be restored unto earle John.

Moreover, the other castles of such honour as were assigned to earle John by the king his brother were committed unto the custodie of certeine persons of great trust and loialtie, as the castell of Wallingford to the archbishop of Rouen, the castell of Wythorn to the bishop of Lincoln, the castell of the Peake to the bishop of Couentrie, the castell of Wolesores unto Richard de Beake (or if he refused, then should the bishop of Couentrie have it in keeping the castell of Cic was committed to Walter Fitz Robert, the castell of Hereford to Roger Bigot, and to Richard Beuell the castell of Excester and Lannston. These persons to whom these castles were thus committed to be kept, receiued also an oth, that they should faithfullie keepe them to the kings behoofe, and if he chanced to die, before he should returne, then the same should be deliuered unto earle Johns hands. Also there were these castles that pertained to the crowne, deliuered likewise in trust, as the castell of Wundor unto the earle of Arundell, the castell of Winchester unto Gilbert de Lacie, and the castell of Portsmouth unto Simon de Patershill.

Castles delivered in trust to the keeping of certeine persons.

It was also agreed, that bishops, abbats, earles, and barons, valuafores, and freeholders should not be distressed of their lands, goods or cattels, otherwise than by order of the iustices or officers of the king, so that they should be iudged in the kings courts according to the lawfull customes and ordinances of the realme: and likewise that earle John should cause the same orders to be obserued through all his lands. Provided that if any man attempted to do otherwise upon support or maintenance of earle John, he should stand to be reformed by the archbishop of Rouen if he chanced then to be in England, and by the kings iustices, and by those that had sworn to obserue this peace: and also earle John himselfe at their request should see such reformation to be had.

Moreover, it was agreed that all those castles that had bin built or begun to be builded since the kings passage ouer towards his iourne, should be razed, and new made or fortified till his returne, except in manors pertaining to the kings demaine, if need required, or by his speciall commandement, either by letters, or sufficient messengers. That the shiriffeslike of Lincolne, which the lord chancelour had assigned unto William de Stutenille should be restored to Gerard de Camulle, who had a daie appointed him to appeare in the kings court, to heare what might be laid against him: and if such matter could be proued, for the which he ought to lose the said shiriffeslike and the castell of Lincolne, then he should depart from them by the iudgement of the court, or else not. Neither should earle John mainteine him against the iudgement of that court, nor should receiue any outlawes, or such as were notoriouslie known for enemies to the king, and so named, nor should suffer them to be receiued within the precinct of his liberties.

To hold, mainteine and obserue this peace, the said earle and chancelour swore in the hand of the archbishop of Rouen with seven barons on either part. On the part of earle John these were the names of them that receiued the oth: Stephen de Bell his chancelour, William de la Mare, Robert de la Mare, Philip de Excester, William de Bakenes, Gilbert de Lannston, William de Pontfacte. On the chancelours part, the earles of Arundell and Bakenes, earle Roger Bigot, and the earle of Clare, with William Fitz Robert, William de Beke and Roger Fitz Alan. These things were concluded in this sort, the authoritie and commandement of the king yet in all things said and reserved: but so, that if before his returne he should signifie his pleasure to the contrary of the conditions above mentioned, then should the castles of Nottingham and Tickhill be restored unto earle John, notwithstanding what sauer the king should command touching the same: Thus was the peace concluded between earle John and the chancelour.

In this meane while, Geoffrey the elect archbishop of Poike, after long suit and manie delays contriued, speciallie by the chancelour, obtained his pall, being consecrated by the archbishop of Eborac, by vertue of his bulls obtained from pope Celestine. The chancelour aduertised herof, and understanding that he meant to come hostile into England to be installed, was in a great chafe, because that during the time of the vacation, he had used the reuenues of that see at his pleasure, and therefore now to forgo them he was nothing contented. Whereupon he wrote his letters unto Matthew de Clere shiriffe of Kent in this forme.

Anno Reg. 1. Matth. West. Polydor. Geoffrey the archbishop of York. Rog. Houed.

Matth. Paris.

The lord chancellours letters to the shiriffe of Kent.

Recipimus tibi quod si Eboracen. electum ad aliquem portum in balliua tua applicuerit, aut aliquis nunciatorum eius, eum retineri facias, donec mandatum nostrum inde receperis. Et similiter precipimus, quod omnes literas pape aut magni alicuius viri que illic venerint, facias retineri. The English wherof is thus.

We command you that if the elect of Yorke shall arrive at any port or haven within your bailiwick, or any messenger of his, that you cause them to be arrested and kept, till you haue commandement from vs therein. And we command you likewise, to stay, attach, and keepe all letters that come from the pope, or any other great man.

Likewise, whereas Baldwine archbishop of Canturburie, having taken his iourne into the holie land, and arriving there before the king, chanced to depart this life at Tyros, the last yere, upon the feast daie of S. Edmund, the chancelour found meanes to keepe that see also vacant, that he might receiue the profits thereof, during the vacation, and find meanes to be prepared to it in the end. But as touching the see of Poike, although he had (as before is said) made his hand of the reuenues belonging to the same from time to time at his pleasure, yet now after that he heard how Geoffrey had receiued the pall, he made haucke, waisting & spoiling all that would yield him any monie, without respect of right or wrong. Moreover, he caused the hauens to be watched, with commandement given to the townes on the sea coast, that they should not suffer the archbishop Geoffrey to take land. At length yet he arrived at Dover, where he was by the foresaid Matthew de Clere first staied, and after taken out of the abbete by the chancellours commandement, and committed to prison within the castell, where a Noble man that that had married the chancelloz's sister was capteine.

The newes of whose imprisonment was anon bruted thorough the realme, wherewith the Nobles fretted, and the commons cursed: finally all men detested such tyrannie in the chancelour. But namely the kings brother earle John stomed at the matter, and with all speed assembled an armie out of those places where he bare rule, increasing the number with a power of Welshmen. There came to him the bishop of Winchester, with manie earles and barons, also the bishop of Bath and Gleser, which latelie before had bene these fauourers of the chancelour in all his doings: but now that the world was changed, they shewed themselves the most earnest enemies he had, as well in words as dedes.

In an assemble of all the bishops of England, all those were excommunicate in solemne wise, with candles light, and other such ceremonies, which had either given commendement, or were present as partakers, to pull out of the church the archbishop of Dozke, or his people by violence, and had imprisoned them in maner (as before we haue heard:) but this was after the archbishop was set at libertie, as shuld appeare by Matthew Paris, for the chancelour repenting himselfe (though now too late) of his cruell dealing against the archbishop of Dozke, wherewith he had kindled such a brand against him, commanded the said archbishop (namelie at the instant sute of the bishop of London, or rather at the commendement of earle John, as Houeden saith) to be set at libertie. But the displeasure once kindled in the hearts of the Nobles, could not so easilie be quenched with his deliuerie, as it was speedilie set on fire by his imprisonment, so that they being now in armour, purposed to abate the pride of the chancelour, and to deliuer the common-wealth of such an vglie tyrant. And to begin, they summoned and assigned him a peremptorie day to appeare at Reading, to make answer vnto such injuries as he had done against the archbishop of Dozke, and the bishop of Durham, sithens the depature of his soueraigne lord the king.

At which day there came to Reading earle John, and the archbishop of Rouen, with manie other bishops, earles, and barons, abiding there all that day, to see if the chancelour would appeare or no; but he came not: whereupon they prepared to march forth towards London, and therewithall set forward in like maner. He on the other side being a man of a great courage, had gathered an armie of such strangers and other his friends as he could make, and therewith went forth, and encamped nere to Wind- so, there to abide his aduersaries, and to giue them battell, if they came forward and would abide it. But when they approached, and he perceived also how diuerse of his friends shanke from him, and went to his enemies, he durst not attempt the hazard of a field, but fled backe to London, and there withdrew into the tower, with all his host, because he durst not commit himselfe to the doubtful fellowship of the citizens. Through his great pride and statelie port which he maintained, as partlie we haue heard, he had procured to himselfe no small hatred amongst all degrees of men, and namelie such as by the kings appointment ought to haue bene parteners with him in gouernment of the realme sore repined at his presumptuous proceedings, for that he disdaind (as it seemed) to vse their aduise, or to ioine them with him in the administration of things, so that now in time of his trouble he wist not in whome he might put his trust.

After he was thus retired into the tower of London, earle John the archbishop of Rouen, and the other bishops, earles, and barons associated together against him, followed him at the heeles, entered the citie, and besieged the tower on each side. On the morrow after, being the fourth day after the octauies of saint Michael, they came together into Pauls churchyard, where they publickly declared the inuious wrongs done and practised by the chancelour; namelie against the archbishop of Dozke, and the bishop of Durham. Those also that had bene appointed as associats with him, accused him, in that he had taken vpon him to rule and gouerne all things after his owne will, not boushaling to haue their aduise or counsell in such sort as had bene conuenient.

The archbishop of Rouen and William Marshall earle of Pembroke shewed there before all the people the kings letter which he had sent from Messina, appointing that they shoulde be associats with him in gouernment of the kingdome; and that without the counsell and aduise of them and others assigned thereto, he shoulde not meddle with the rule of the land, and that if he shoulde do any thing to the hinderance of the common-wealth, or seeke to meddle with the affaires of the realme, without their good aduise, that then he shoulde be deposed. Whereupon it seemed good to earle John, and to all the bishops, earles and barons of the realme, and to the citizens of London there assembled, that the said chancelour shoulde be deposed, and so they proceeded, and deposed him in deed, appointing the archbishop of Rouen in his place, who would not take vpon him to do any thing touching the rule of the land, without consent of his associats assigned to him, and the barons of the checker.

The same day, earle John, and the archbishop of Rouen, and other of the kings iustices, granted to the citizens of London the priuilege of their communalitie; and the said earle and archbishop, and in maner all the bishops, earles and barons of the realme sware to mainteine the said priuilege firme and stable, so long as shoulde please their soueraigne lord. And the citizens of London sware to be true, and to do their faithfull seruice vnto king Richard and his heires, and if he chanced to die without issue, then to receiue earle John the brother of king Richard for their king and soueraigne lord, and thereupon sware fealtie to him against all men, sauing that which they owed vnto his brother king Richard.

The chancelour perceiuing the multitude to be such which he had with him in the tower, as the place was not able to hold them any long time, after he had remained within it one night, he came forth vnto earle John, and to the other that were thus entered the citie, and now readie to besiege him, of whome he got licence for them that were inclosed within the tower, to depart without damage, and therewith deliuered by the tower vnto the hands of the archbishop of Rouen, with the castell of Wind- so, and certeine other castels, which he held within the realme, but not all: notwithstanding he couenanted to make deliuerie of the residue, which yet remained in the hands of them whome he had appointed to the keeping of the same. And for assurance of that couenant to be performed before he departed the realme, he deliuered his brethren, and one that was his chamberleine, to remaine with the lords as hostages.

This done, he hasted to Canturbrie, where he promised to receiue the crose of a pilgrime to go into the holie land, and to render up the crose of his legathie, which he had vsurped a yeare and a halfe after the death of pope Clement, to the prebiter of the church of Rome, and to the detriment and great hinderance of the English church, for there was not any church within the realme, which had not bene put to fine and ransom by that crose, nor any ecclesiasticall person went free, but the print of the crose appeared in him and his purse. From Canturbrie he got him to Douer to his brother in law, and finally seeking means to passe ouer into France, and doubting to be discouered, he apparelled himselfe in women's raiment, & got a web of cloth on his arme, as though he had bene some housewifely woman of the countre: but by the vntowardly folding and vncunning handling of his cloth (or rather by a lewd fisherman that took him for an harlot) he was suspected and searched so narrowly, that by his pyrric incumbers he was proued to be a man, and at length knowne, attached, and committed to prison, after he had bene reprochfullie handled by them that found him, and by the wiles of the towne, in such vnseemly apparell.

Carle John would haue had him punished, and put to some open reproche for his passed tyrannicall doings; but the bishops, and other of the barons, for reuerence of his order, procured his deliuerance, with licence to passe ouer into Normandie where he was borne. Thus was the bishop of Elie a man full of pride and couctousnesse ouertholone with shame, and receiued for his declining a reprochfull dolourfall: for none are more subiect to ruine and rebuke, than such as be aloft and supereminent ouer others, as the poet noteth well, saying:

Summa petit luor, perflant altissima venti, Summa petunt dextra fulmina missa Iouis.

In time he was deposed from his office of being chancellor, and not without warrant, for in vertie deed, king Richard hauing receiued aduertisements from the lords and peeres of the realme, of the chancellor's presumptuous and haucie demeanour, with wrongs offered to diuerse persons, wrote to them againe as followeth.

A letter of king Richard directed to the States of the land for the deposing of the bishop of Elie from his office of lord chancellor.

Richard king of England sendeth greeting to William Marshall, to Gilbert Fitz Peter, and Henrie Berdulse, and to William Brewer, peeres. If it so chance that our chancellor hath not faithfullie handled the affaires and businesse of our realme (committed vnto him) by the aduise and counsell of you, and others to whom we haue also assigned the charge of gouernement of the same realme: we command you, that according to your disposition in all things to be doone concerning the gouernement thereof, you order and dispose as well for eschetes, as all other things, &c.

By force of this commission, the lords were the bolder to proceed against him as ye haue heard. Now after his comming into the parties beyond the seas, he ceased not with letters and messengers to present his complaint to the pope of Rome, and to king Richard of the iniuries receiued at the hands of earle John and his complices. Hereupon pope Celestine wrote in deed to all the archbishops and bishops that were within the realme of England, in behalfe of the said bishop of Elie, declaring, that for so much as the king of England was gone into the holie land to warre against the enemies of our faith, leauing his kingdome vnder the protection of the apostolike see, he could not but haue speciall regard to see that the state, rights and honour thereof were preserved from all danger of decaye.

Wherefore, vnderstanding that there had bene certaine attempts made by John erle of Mortaigne and others, both against the king and the bishop of Elie, that was not onelie legat of the apostolike see, but also gouernour of the land appointed by the king, which attempt sounded greatlie to the reproch of the church of Rome, and danger of damage to infuse to king Richard, if remedie were not the soner found: therefore he commanded them by the vertue of their obedience, to excommunicat the earle of Mortaigne, or any other that was knowne to haue laid any violent hands vpon the said bishop of Elie, or deteined him as captiue, or enforced him to any oth, or else had changed the state of rule in the kingdome of England to other forme, than king Richard had ordeined at his setting forward towards the holie land: and that not onelie all the counsellours, authors, aiders and complices of those that had committed such outrage, but also their lands should stand interdicted, so that no diuine service should be vsed within the precinct of the same, except penance and chistening of infants. This to remaine till the said bishop & kingdome were restored into the former estate: and that the parties excommunicated should present themselves with letters from the bishops vnto the apostolike see to be absolved, &c.

Hereupon also the bishop of Elie himselfe wrote vnto the bishop of Lincolne and other, touching this matter: but the bishops did neither any thing in accomplishment of the effect of the popes letters, nor at his owne supplication. And therefore perceiuing small helpe to come that waie, he sought to obtaine the fauour and friendship of earle John, and of his mother queene Elianor. In the meane time, the lords, barons and prelates of the realme, after they had depeiued him of all authoritie, and banished him out of the land, ordeined the archbishop of Rouen in fauour of the kings commission, to haue the cheefe rule and administration of things touching all the affaires of the common-wealth; but yet so as earle John had the doings in manie points, so that he might seeme in manner an associat with him, whereof sprang much inconuenience. For this John being a man (as he is noted by some writers) of an ambitious nature, was suspected to aspire vnto the kingdome: in somuch that he had ioined with the French king, after the same king was returned forth of the holie land, against his brother king Richard, if his mother queene Elianor had not persuaded him to the contrarie.

Whilste these things were a doing, on the twelfth daie of Iulie, the citie of Acres was surrendered into the christian mens hands, for the Soldan Saladine (being approached nere to the siege of the christians with a puissant armie, in hope to haue raised their siege) when he perceiued it laie not in his power to worke any feat to the succour of his people within the citie, and that they were so constrained that they must needs yeld, he holpe to make their composition, and promised to performe certeine couenants on their behalfe. Hereupon, the Saracens within Acres couenanted not onlie to deliuer the citie vnto the christians with five hundred prisoners of christians which they had within the same, but also to procure that the holie crosse should be to them deliuered, with a thousand other christian prisoners, such as the christian princes should appoint out of those numbers which Saladine had in his custodie, and further, to giue them two hundred thousand Besans. And till these couenants were performed, it was agreed, that the Saracens, which were at that present left within the citie, should remaine as pledges, vnder condition, that if the same couenants were not performed within fortie daies, then should they stand at the mercie of the christian princes as touching life and lim.

These things thus concluded, and the citie yelded vnto the christian mens hands, the French king upon envie and malice conceived against king Richard (although he pretended sicknesse for excuse) departed homewards, setting from Acres the last day of Julie. Now then, after the departure of king Philip, when the day approached, in the which the Saracens should performe the covenants; or else stand to the judgement of life and death at the pleasure of the christian princes: it was perceived that the covenants would not be fulfilled according to the agreement. For Saladine, as it well appeared, meant not to performe that which for the safeguard of his men he had undertaken, and did but dally with the christians to prolong the time: whereupon sentence was given forth, that for default in such behalfe, the Saracens remaining as pledges should lose their heads.

Saladine
causeth the christian prisoners to be beheaded.

Saladine having knowledge thereof, sent word to king Richard and to the whole christian armie, that if his people that were in the christian mens hands lost their heads, he would not faine but cause the heads of all those christians which he had in captivittie to be cut off also. Notwithstanding which answer, on the fourteenth day of August king Richard issued forth of the citie, passing the bittermost ditches, and incamped himselfe nere the armie of Saladine, who the same daie sent rich presents unto king Richard, requiring of him a longer day for performance of the covenants, but that would not be granted. Wherefore upon the said deniall, Saladine caused all those christian prisoners which he had in his hands to be beheaded on the eighteenth day of August, on which day king Richard advanced forth towards the lodgings of the Saracens, and skirmished with them verie hotlie, so that manie were wounded and slaine on both parts: and amongst other one of king Richards companions at all exercises named Peter Signot lost his life there. Furthermore, although king Richard knew that Saladine had put the christian prisoners to death in such wise as you have heard, yet would not he prevent his terme appointed for the execution of the Saracens that were in his custodie, but abiding unto the twentieth day of August, he then caused those Saracens which fell to his lot, at the time of the surrender of Acres, being in number about 2600. to be brought forth of the citie, and nere to the walles in the sight of Saladine and all his host they had their heads chopped off. The duke of Burgoigne caused execution to be done within the citie upon those which fell to the French kings share, the number of the which rose to two thousand and foure hundred, or thereabouts: for the whole number was reckoned to be about five thousand that thus lost their lives through the inconstancie of their prince: yet diverse of the principall had their lives saved. The Saracens themselves also spake much euill of Saladine for this matter, because that refusing to performe the articles of covenants, he had occasioned the enimie to slea those that had so valiantlie served in defense of the citie, to the bittermost icopardie of their lives. And here is verified that kinowme verse,

Strive be-and the bishop of Durham.

But now to leaue sojren matters, and to returne home into England: we find, that on the second of December, the monks of Canturburie chose to their archbishop Beignold bishop of Bath, who within fiftene daies after his election, departed this life, and lieth buried at Bath. Also this yeare, or (as Ger. Dor. saith) in the yeare following, the bishop of Durham sought meanes to withdraue his subiection from the archbishop of Yorke, for which attempt the archbishop of Yorke, upon trust of the popes grant, did not excommunicate the said bishop, notwithstanding that he appealed to the popes consistorie three seuer-all times, putting his owne matter and his churches to be examined and tried by the pope, whereupon he obied not the excommunication: and signifying the cause unto Rome, obtained such fauour, that the pope and his cardinals reuerled the sentence, and iudged the excommunication to be of none effect. And further they decreed, that if the archbishop of Yorke had broken the altars and chalices, as information was given, in which the bishop of Durham had celebrated after his appeale made to the court of Rome, that then should the said bishop of Durham be acquitted from owing any subiection to the said archbishop so long as they two should liue together.

True it is, that the archbishop had not onelie broken the altars and chalices which the bishop had used in deed for the celebration of masse, but also held his owne brother John earle of Mortaigne for excommunicate, because he had eat and dronke in companie of the said bishop, and would not communicate with him, till he came to receiue absolution, and to make satisfaction for his fault. In the end the bishops of Lincolne and Rochester, with the abbat of Peterburroin, were appointed by the pope to haue the hearing of this matter, as iudges authorized by his buls, who sat thereupon at Rosythampton, upon S. Calist his day, where after they had heard both parties argue what they could in either of their cases, they gaue a longer day, to wit, untill the feast of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist next after, to see if by arie good meane there might some agreement haue bene had betwixt them, or (if that could not be) that then the popes leters should stand in force as before, & the helpees of either part saued, as though no delat had bene used. And to this, both parties were agreeable, speciallie at the motion of the bishop of Lincolne.

This yeare also, Roger de Lacie constable of Chester toke Alan de Lec and Peter de Bouencourt, and upon despite hanged them, for that being put in trust amongst other with the keeping of the castels of Spotingham and Tichhill, which he had receiued into his custodie of the bishop of Elie quondam lord chancellor, they had consented to the treason of Robert de Crokeston, & Eudo de Dunstie, which delincred the same castels unto John earle of Mortaigne. The same earle of Mortaigne was highlie offended for the death of those two persons, and therefore waisted the lands of the said Roger which lay within the compasse of his iurisdiction.

But now touching the departure of the French king from Acres, diuerse occasions are remembred by writers of the emulation and secret spite which he should beare towards king Richard, and besides other already touched, one was for entreteining and relieving the earle of Champagne in such honourfull wise in his necessitie, that he was readie to forsake the French kings service, and cleaue to king Richard. But howsoeuer it came to passe, partlie through envie (as hath bene thought) conceived at the great deeds of king Richard, whose mightie power and valiantnesse he could not well abide, and partlie for other respects him mouing, he toke the sea with three gallees of the Genouois, and returned into Italie, and so home into France, hailling promised first unto king Richard at his departure out of the holie land, and after to pope Celestine at Rome, that he would not attempt any hurtfull enterpryse against the English dominions, till king Richard should be returned forth of the holie land. But this promise was not kept, for after that he was returned into France, he first sought to procure the foresaid erle John, king Richards brother, to rebell against him, promising him not onelie aid to reduce all his brothers dominions ens into his hands, but also to glue his sister Adela in marriage, whom king Richard upon suspicion of unchaste living, had forsaken, as before ye have heard. But when earle John was dissuaded by his mother, from accepting this offer (which otherwise as it is said he would willingly have received) king Philip still retained a malicious rancor in his hart, and in reuenge of old displeasures, would haue attempted the warre against the subjects of king Richard, if his lords would haue joined with him: but they considering what slander would rebound hereby both to him and them for the iniurie done to the christian common-welth, in making warre against him that was occupied in defense of the faith against the common enemies of christendome, would not give their consent thereto, and so the matter rested, till king Richard was taken prisoner in Almaine, and then what followed, it shall after appeare.

Enuious discord among the christians.

In the meane while, the christian armie atchiued some worthe enterprizes in the holie land, though not manie, by reason of such enuious discord as reigned amongst the chiefe gouernours. It chanced yet on the eue of the Natistie of our ladie next after the departure of king Philip, as king Richard marched forth towards Iaph ancientlie called Joppa, that the Soldan Saladine taking aduantage of the place, did set vpon the rereward of the christians: but his Saracens (after they had fought right fiercely from none till sunne setting) were so beaten backe at length, and repelled with such losse and disadvantage, that in 40. yeares before they had not sustained at one time greater damage. Amongst other of the christians slaine at that encounter, was one James Dauenes, a man of high prowesse and valiance.

Poisoner, king Richard won diuerse towncs and castles out of the enemies hands, as Ascalon, Darus, and diuerse other, and some he fortified, as Ascalon aforesaid, and Port Iaph, otherwise called Joppa. There were sundrie encounters also betwixt the Saracens and christians, wherein king Richard and his people bare themselves so manfully, that the victorie for the most part continually rested on their side. At one time also, hearing of a great conuoy of vitells, munitions, and other things which came from Babylon towards Jerusalem to furnish Saladine and his armie (which conueis they call carauannes) king Richard with a competent power of men met them on the waie, and distressed those that were attendant vpon the safeguard of that carriage, being in number about two thousand horsemen, besides a great multitude of footmen, and therewith toke the carriages with foure thousand and six hundred camels and dromedaries, besides an innumerable sort of mules, asses, and other beasts of burthen.

¶ But to speake of all the worthe exploits atchiued by king Richard and his valiant capteins there in the holie land against the infidels, it would require a long treatise, and therefore here we passe them ouer. This is to be noted, that amongst other of whom we find honorable mention made by writers for their high valiance shewed in those exploits, these are named as chiefe, Robert earle of Leicester, Hubert bishop of Salisbury, with the earles of S. Paule and Weur, beside diuerse other, as Hugh de Gournay, William de Bozrez, Malceline de Ferrers, Roger de Tonie, James de Auences, the bishop of Beauuois, William de Barres, William de Garland, Diego de Perlo, Robert de Sealle, Henrie Fitz Nicholas, Robert de Beowbury, Kase de S. But now to returne, sure it is, that king Richard meant to haue recovered the citie of Jerusalem, and all the holie land out of the Saracens hands, by the assistance of almighty God: if the doubt which he had of his brother the earle of Hereford pradi- ses, & the French kings doings, which were brought to him with a greuous report, had not reuoked him home. For diuerse messengers were sent daillie into the holie land, to aduertise him of such dangers as were like to insue, if by his speedie returne the same were not prevented. And first after Easter, there came to him the prior of Hereford with letters from the bishop of Cle, containing a soe information against his brother earle John, for hauing expelled those whom he had appointed rulers ouer the realme of England, and altered the state of things there contrary to the ordinances by him deuised afore his setting forward vpon his iournie (as before ye haue partlie heard.)

Gal. Vind

Upon receipt of which letters, he meant immediately at the first to haue returned, and to haue left behind him a conuenient power of men, to wit, three hundred knights or men of armes, and two thousand chosen footmen, to abide vpon the defense of the holie land, with other christians at his costs and charges. But yet at length he was persuaded to tarry, specially till things were set in some better state, which then were out of order by the death of the marques of Montferrato, lord of Tire, whom two traitorous Saracens of the kind which they name Assassini had murdered. After whose death Henrie earle of Champagne nephew to king Richard married his wife, and was made king of Jerusalem, Guido resigning to him his title, vnto whome as it were in recompense king Richard gaue the Ile of Cyprus: although some write, that the knights Templers had bought it of him before. Thus king Richard remaining still in the holie land, shortly after Whitson-tide, there came an other messenger to him, one John de Alanon a cleerke, bringing twoorde newes out of England than the prior of Hereford had brought before, which in effect contained, that his brother earle John was allied as a confederat with the French king, and meant through his setting on, to seize into his possession the whole realme of England, notwithstanding the persuation of his mother queene Eleanor, and other his friends to the contrary.

Herevpon king Richard was fullie persuaded to returne home, but yet through the admonition of certaine persons, and namelie of one William de Poitiers, a chapleine of his, he effrones altered his purpose, and so remained there, till at length through enuie and malice still increasing amongst the christians, he perceived how no good purpose could go forward, since that which seemed good to some, was disliked of other; and speciallie our writers put great blame in the French men, who either vpon disdain or other displeasure would not be persuaded to follow their aduise, which were knowone best to understand the state of things in those parties. And herevpon, when the armie was aduanced to Betenoble, a place not past foure leagues distant from Jerusalem, because their mind might not be fulfilled for the besieging of Jerusalem, which they had intended to take in hand; whereas the residue would rather that they should haue gone to besiege Babylon in Aegypt, and that upon sundrie great respects the Frenchmen raised their field, and returned againe to Acres in great despite, putting the rest of the armie also (so much as in them laie) in danger of vtter ruine and distresse.

Aano Reg. 4.

Then king Richard and the other christian captiues perceiuing how the matter inclined, and giuing ouer all hope of any more good successe, followed them. So that after they were thus returned to Acres, king Richard still doubting least his long absence from home might put him in danger of more losse here, than he saw hope of present gaine to be had there, in such diuersitie of humours and priuie malice which reigned among them, he determined fullie to depart homewards, with no lesse purpose to returne thither againe after he had settled things at home in such sure stay as was expedient for the seruice of his owne estate and quietnesse of his people. Hereupon being readie to enter into his ships at Acres [or as some haue, being on his iourne homewards in Cypres] he was aduertised that the Soldane Saladine had taken the towne of Japh, slaine a great number of the christians within it, and besieged the residue within the castell, the which constrained through feare had compounded to yeeld, if within thre daies there came no succour.

Wil. Paruus.

King Richard being hereof aduertised, and turning greif into valiancie, with all speed sailed backe vnto Japh, and landing there with his people, caused his enemies to forsake the towne: but anon assembling themselves againe together, they turned once more to besiege it, whereupon he issued forth into the fields, and fought with them sundrie daies together, till finally they were content to forsake their enterprise, and to depart thence for a together. In these conflicts the valiant courage of king Richard, and the worthie manhood of his souldiers right well appeared: for he brought not with him at that time vnto Japh about 80 men of armes, and foure hundred other souldiers with crossebowes, and yet with that small handfull of men, and some aid of them that he found there in the castell, he did not onely bid battell to the enemies, which were numbred to 60 thousand, but also put them to the worke, and caused them to flee backe, to their great shame and confusion.

Thus Japh being deliuered out of the enemies hands, king Richard fell sicke at a castell called Cephas, and so remained there certaine daies, till he had recovered his health. In which meane time the Soldane Saladine seeming to lament his ease, sent vnto him certaine of his counsellors to common with him of peace, declaring that although he well vnderstood that king Richard ment thence to returne into his countrie, and that after his departure out of the east parts, he could with small aid recover all that the christians yet held within the holie land, he would neuertheless in respect of king Richards high prowes, and noble valiancie, grant a peace for a certaine time, so that not onely Acalon, but also all other such townes and places as the christians had fortified: y^e w^hiche since the conquest of Acres should be rased, as touching their walles, bulwarks, gates, and other fortifications.

King Richard (though he perceived that this offer of peace tended vnto this point chafelle, that Saladine would thereby aduulitate what soeuer the christian armie had done in the holie land since his & the French kings arrivall, so that by the said peace he should gaine more than by the edge of his sword) did somewhat staie at this offer and demand, as a thing greatlie dishonourable to the christians, to lose by treatie of peace so much; rather more than they got by force of warres (a more token of faint and feeble courage) yet considering that in such necessitie both of his departure from thence, and also of lacke of other succors to resist the puissance of the enemies, after his comming awaie, he iudged it best to take the offer at the enemies hands in auoiding of some greater euill. Whereupon therefore was a peace concluded to endure for thre yeares, thre moneths, thre weeks, thre daies, and thre houres, to begin at Easter next ensuing. And among other articles, it was covenanted, that the christians should haue free passage to come and go vnto the citie of Jerusalem, to visit the holie sepulchre there, which was granted; so that amongst a great number of christians that presentlie vpon this conclusion went thither, Hubert bishop of Salisburie was one, who had continued about the king during the time of all his iourne till this time.

King Richard hauing thus concluded with Saladine, toke the sea, and comming againe into Cypres, sent his wife queene Berengaria with his sister Joane (late queene of Sicile) into England by the long seas, but he himselfe not minding to lie long on the seas, determined to take his course into Grecia, and so by land to passe homewards with all speed possible. Howbeit yet he could attaine his purpose, his chance was to be diuenc by tempest into the coast of Atria, not farre from Aquilia, where he stood in some doubt of his life. For if he had bene knowne and taken, they would surely haue killed him, because of the slander that went of him, as guiltie of the death of Conrade the marquisse of Montferrato, who indeed was slaine by two of the Assassini in the citie of Tyrus, whilste king Richard was in the holie land (as before y^e haue heard.)

He therefore hauing here made shipwacke, and doubting to fall into the hands of any person in those parts that bare good will vnto the marquisse (against whom he had indeed shewed himselfe not frendlie in a quarrell betwixt the said marquisse and Guido the king of Jerusalem) made the best shift he could to get away, yet knowledge being had of him, and serch made after him by one Heinarde of Cozejein, he lost eight of his seruants, and so came to a towne within the bishoprike of Saltzburge called Frisake, where he was entones in danger to haue bene taken againe by one Frederike de saint Home, who notwithstanding toke six of his men, but yet he himselfe with thre other of his companie made shift to get away. Finally comming to Vienna in Austria, and there causing his seruants to prouide meat for him, more sumptuous and fine than was thought requisite for so meane a person as he counterfeited then to beare out in countenance, it was freightwaits suspected that he was some other maner of man than he pretended, and in fine, those that marked more diligently the maner of him, perceived what he was, and gaue knowledge to the duke of Austria named Leopold, being then in the citie of Vienna, what they had seene. His page that had the Dutch long, going about the towne to change gold, and buy vittells, bewaied him, hauing by chance the kings gloues vnder his girdle: whereupon comming to be examined for feare of tortures confessed the truth.

The duke freightwaits caused the house where he was lodged, to be set about with armed men, and sent other into the house to apprehend him. He being warie that he was defered, got him to his weapon: but they aduising him to be contented, and alledging the dukes commandement, he boldly answered, that sith he must be taken, he being a king, would peld him.

himselfe to none of the companie but to the duke alone, and therefore if it would please him to come, he would yeld himselfe into his hands. The duke hearing of this, speedilie came vnto him, whom he meeting, deliuered by his sword, and committed him vnto his custodie. The duke reioysing of such a preie, brought him vnto his palace, and with gentle words entertained him, though he meant no great good towards him, as well inough appeared in that he committed him to the keeping of certeine gentlemen, which without much courtesie looked streightlie inough to him for starting awaie, in somuch that they kept him in cold irons (as some authours do write.) He was taken after the maner aforesaid in December vpon S. Thomas eue, in the yere of our Lord 1192. and in the fourth yere of his reigne.

The duke of Austrich olough the king no good will, bicause he had cast downe his ensignes pitcht vp in a turret at Acres, which he had wone at the verie time when that citie was deliuered by the Saracens: for while they were in tretie on the one side, the duke on the other, not knowing anie thing thereof, gaue the assault vnto that part of the towne which was appointed vnto him to besiege. And so being entred the towne, and perceiuing that by treatie it was to be deliuered, he retired into the turret which he had first wone and entred, and there set vp his standard and ensignes, which king Richard (as the Dutch writers affirme) comming thither, threw downe and trode vnder his feet.

But Geruasius Dorobornensis declareth this matter somewhat otherwise, as thus. After that the said citie of Acres was rendred into the christian mens hands (saith he) diuerse lords toke their lodgings as they thought good, and hanged forth their ensignes. And as it chanced, the duke of Austrich placing himselfe in one of the fairest palaces of all the citie, put forth his ensigne, whereof king Richard being wari, came thither with a companie of hardie souldiers about him, and threw downe the dukes ensigne, so displacing him out of that so pleasant and beautifull a lodging. For this cause, and also surmizing that king Richard should be guiltie of the death of the marques, Conrade the duke of Austrich shewed such discourtesie towards him. But concerning the murder of the marques, the chiefe gouernour of those Saracens called Assassini cleared king Richard by a letter wrytten and directed vnto the duke of Austrich in manner as followeth.

A letter directed to the duke of Austrich, wherein king Richard is cleared of the death of the marquisse of Mountferrat, whereof he was vehementlie suspected.

Epoldo duci Austrie, Vetus de Monte salutem. Cum plurimi reges & principes ultra mare Richardum regem Anglia & dominum de morte marchisi inculpenti, iuro per dominum qui regnat in eternum, & per legem quam tenemus, quod in eius mortem nullam culpam habuit. Et sciatis quod his literas fecimus in domo nostra ad castellum nostrum Mesfat in dimidio Septembri, anno ab Alexandro 1505.

The same in English.

Etus de Monte to Lupold duke of Austrich sendeth greeting. Where manie kings and princes beyond the seas blame Richard king of England of the marques his death, I sweare by the lord that reigneth euerlastinglie, and by the law which we hold, that he was not in fault for his death. For the verie cause of the marques his death was such as followeth. One of our brethren in a ship of Satalie came towards our parties, and chanced by tempest to be driuen vnto Tyre, and the marques caused him to be taken and slaine, and tooke a great portion of monie that he had in the ship with him. Wherevpon we sent our messengers to the marques, commanding him to restore vnto vs the monie of our brother, and to compoind with vs for our said brothers death, and he would not.

Moreouer, he also contemned our messengers, & laid the fault of our brothers death vpon Reginald lord of Sidon, and we did so much through our freends, that we got full vnderstanding that the marques himselfe caused him to be slaine, and tooke his monie. And therefore we sent vnto him againe an other messenger named Edrisus, whome he would haue drowned in the sea, but our freends made such shift, that they procured him to depart with speed from Tyre, who returned to vs, and signified these things to vs for certeine. And from that houre euer after we had a desire to slea the marques: and so then we sent two of our brethren vnto Tyre, who openlie, & in a manner in presence of all the people of Tyre slue him.

This therefore was the verie cause of the death of the marques: & we say to you in good sooth, that the lord Richard king of England, in this death of the marques was nothing culpable: and they that haue doone anie displeasure vnto the king of England for this cause, they haue doone it wrongfullie, and without anie iust occasion. Know ye for certeine, that we doo not vse to kill anie man of this world for a-

nie bribe, or for monie, except he haue doone to vs some harme afore time. And know ye that we haue made these letters in our house at our castell of Messuat, in the midst of September, in the yeare from Alexander the great, 1505.

¶ Thus we see how king Richard was cleared of that crime concerning the marques his death by the tenour of this letter. And verelie it is most like that king Richard would haue bene loth to haue communicated his purpose vnto such a wicked kind of pagans as the Massini were, if he had pretended any such matter, but rather would haue sought his reuenge by some other meanes. Now therefore to our purpose.

The newes of the taking of king Richard was anon butted and blowne ouer all Germanie, whereupon the emperor Henrie the first, the sonne of Frederike the first, sent in all hast vnto the duke, persuading him to deliuer the king into his hands, being able to susteine and abide the malice of all them that would be offended with the taking and detaining of him prisoner, as the pope and others. The emperor well vnderstood the wealth and riches of England, and therefore hoped to make some good purchase by ransoming the king, if he might get him out of the dukes hands. The duke perceiuing also the emperours meaning, durst not well denie his request, and therefore he deliuered the king vnto them that were sent from the emperor, who couenanted to giue vnto the said duke the summe of 6000. pounds of Cilken weight for the hauing of the said king. The emperor thus receiuing the king at the hands of the duke of Austrich, commaunded that he should be committed to close prison, and would not do so much as once speake with him. This he did, to cause the king vpon an indignation and wearinesse of that maner of life, to make speed in offering some large masse of monie for his libertie & deliuerance. ¶ Thus we see how couetousnesse infected the hearts of the mightie, and what occasion the emperor and duke did take, to enrich themselves by the meanes of the king, whome they forced not to impouerish, so their owne greedie wanton were ferued. But this hath bene a disease not so generall as ancient, according to his words that said, the emperor.

The king is

Pix ego Satum no quenquam regnante videbam, Cum non animo dulcia lucra ferent.

Here is to be remembred by the waie, that about the same time, or some what before, in the yeare of our Lord 1190. the pope sent two legats (namelie, Osmann bishop of Hostia, and Jordan de Hostia) into Normandie, to reconcile the bishop of Cle and the archbishop of Rouen: but coming vnto Cisors, they were staied from entring any further into the countie, where vpon they did interdict the whole duchie of Normandie, together with William Fitz Radulfe lord steward of that countie, because he was the man that had so staied them. Immediately herevpon, quene Eleanor, and the archbishop of Rouen sent vnto those legats Hugh bishop of Durham, requiring them to release that sentence of interdictio so pronounced against the steward and countie of Normandie in the kings absence, but they would not, except they might be receiued into Normandie: howbeit, the pope being sent vnto, released it, and caused the legats to release it also, and yet they entred not into Normandie at all.

This yeare, whilste the seneschall of Gascoigne late sickle, the earle of Pierrigost, and the vicount of March, and almost all the lords and barons of Gascoigne, began to waite and despoile the lands of king Richard. And though the seneschall manie times by messengers required a peace, or at the least some truce, yet could he not haue any grant thereof: wherefore vpon his recouerie of health he inuaded the lands of the said earle, toke the castles and fortresses and some of them he fortified, and kept to the kings vse, and some of them he rased downe to the ground. He also inuaded the vicounts countie, and subdued it to the kings gouernement. Shortly after came the brother of the king of Spaurre, with eight hundred knights or men of armes to the seneschalls aid, and so they two together entring into the lands of the earle of Tholouse, toke diuerse castles and fortresses within the same, of the which some they fortified, and some they rased, and rode euen to the gates of Tholouse, and lodged in maner vnder the walles of the citie.

A little before Christmas also, diuerse of those that had bene in the holie land with king Richard, came home into England, not knowing but that king Richard had bene at home before them, and being asked where they thought he was become, they could say no more but that they had seene the ship wherein he first went aboard, arriuing at Brendis in Puglia. At length, when newes came that he was taken and staied as prisoner, the archbishop of Rouen and other the rulers of the realme of England, sent the abbat of Boxley and the abbat of Roberts-bridge with all speed into Almaine to speake with him, and to vnderstand his state, and what his pleasure was in all things. Who coming to Germanie, passed through the countie into Baderland, where at a place called Drefter they found the king as then on his iourne towards the emperor, to whom (as ye haue heard) the duke of Austrich did send him. The said abbats attended him to the emperours court, and remained there with him till the emperor and he were accorded, in manner as after shall be shewed: and then after Easter they returned with the newes into England.

Upon report hereof order was taken for manie things, but cheselie for the state: in which dealings, for so much as those which had the rule of the land stood in great doubt of things (for the inconstant nature of earle John was of them much suspected) first they caused a new oath of allegiance to be made to king Richard, and receiued of the people. They fortified also such towncs and castles as were of importance, both with repairing the walles and other defenses about the same, and furnishing them with men, munition and vittels. Thus was the land brought into some order.

Ger. Dor.

In the meane while, the French king being aduertised that king Richard was detained as prisoner, reioiced not a little thereat, and with all speed by secret messages did send for his brother earle John, who was ready to come at his call. And being come, he exhorted him not to suffer so convenient an occasion to passe, but to take the gouernement of the realme of England now into his hands, promising him all such aid as he could of him reasonable require: with other like talke still tending to the prouocation of the earle to forsake his allegiance vnto his brother. And to say the truth, earle John was easily persuaded so to do, and therefore vpon his immediate returne into England, assembled an armie, and with the same (and such strangers as he brought with him) began to proue maisteries, first winning the castles of Windsor, Wallingford, Nottingham, and diuerse other, and fortifying the same to his owne vse and defense.

flight, some into one place, and some into another, the which yet being apprehended were put to worse execution. But this was not done without continuance of time, & without great trouble & charges to the realme: for whereas there was a practise betwixt the French king and earle John, that a great power of strangers, & namelie Flemings should haue come into the realme (for whose transporting a great number of ships were brought together at Wiltland) yet the high prouidence and godnesse of God disappointed their purpose. For their messengers being taken which were sent hither into England, the treason was reuealed, and by the queene mothers appointment, who chesefelie then ruled the land) a great companie of knights, men of armes, and commons of the countrie, watched the sea coasts ouer against Flanders, to keepe the enimies from landing. They began thus to watch in the passion weeke, and so continued till a certeine time after Easter. Howbeit earle John came secretly ouer, in hope to haue not onelie the assistance of the Welshmen and of manie other his friends in England, but also of the Scots, howbeit, the king of Scots would not meddle. He therefore with such Welshmen and other as he had brought ouer, and such Englishmen as he could get to take his part, began such attempts (as before ye haue heard) to the disquieting of the whole realme, and great displeasure of the king.

Moreover beside that power of the barons which laid siege to Winton: castell, there were Noble men also in other parts of the realme that were ready to resist him. And amongst other, Geoffrey the archbishop of Yorke, with Hugh Bardolf one of the kings iustices, and William de Stuteuile, assembled an armie, and coming to Doncaster, fortified the towne: but when the archbishop would haue gone forward to besiege the castell of Lichill, which earle John had in possession, the other two his associates would not consent to go with him, because they were seruants, and retained with earle John. Here with the archbishop being sore offended, departed from them, calling them traitors to their king, and enimies to the realme.

About the same time did the French king enter into Normandie with an armie, & coming to the towne of Cisors, besieged it, the which one Gilbert de Uascoll one of the kings capitaine thereof, to his high reproch, yielded by unto him, with an other castell also called Bessle, which he had likewise in keeping. After this, the French king entering into the countrie of Acurine one of the kinges towns and fortresses in the same, and passing forward, took Chal de Kueil, and Neusburge, and finally coming before the citie of Rouen he laid siege thereto: but the earle of Leicester being gotten into the citie before the French kings coming thither, so encouraged the citizens, that they stoutlie standing to their defence, caused the French king to his great dishonour to raise his field, hauing lost there more than he want. Yet to saue other townes and castels from taking, and the countrie from destruction, the rulers of the same procured a truce for a great summe of monie, which they covenanted to giue, deliuering vp foure notable castels by waie of engagement, till the summe agreed upon should be to him contented and duly paid.

In the meane time, earle John as head of all the conspirators, perceiuing himselfe not able to achieve his purpose as then, nor to resist the lords and barons of the realme, being vp in armour against him, and now grown to greater stomach, because they vnderstod by the bishop of Salisburie lache arrived, of the kings welfare, and hope of deliuerance: and furthermore, considering that he was disappointed both of Scots and Flemings as he had well hoped should haue come to his aid: he took a truce with the lords of the kings side, by the earnest frauell of the bishop of Salisburie, till the feast of All saints, so as the castels of Winton, Wallingford, and the Peake, should remaine in the hands of his mother queene Elianor: but the castels of Nottingham and Lichill remained still in his owne possession, the which with such other castels as he held within the land, he furnished with garrisons of his owne men and friends, and then went againe ouer into France to the French king, to purchase some new aid at his hands according to his promise.

Here will we leaue earle John conferring with the French king, and returne to the king of England. Upon Palmesundaye after that he was deuioured, or rather betrayed into the emperours hands, he was brought before the princes and lords of the empire, in whose presence the emperour charged him with diuerse vnlawfull doings: and namelie picked a quarrell at him for the wrongs and hurts done to the Sicilians in time of his sojourning in their Ile, as he went towards the holie land. For albeit the said emperour had nothing as then to doe in the countrie, yet for so much as he had lately recouered the Ile of Sicile out of king Tancred's hands, and was now intituled king thereof by the pope, in right of his wife Constance, the daughter of Roger king of Sicile, and so by reason thereof seemed to be greivously offended with him for his doings about the recouering of the monie from Tancred, which neuertheless was iustlie due vnto his sister for hir dowrie, as in the proccesse afore I haue already declared. King Richard notwithstanding these vaine and other frivolous obiections laid to his charge, made his answeres alwaies so pithilie and directlie to all that could be laid against him, and excused himselfe in euerie point so thoughtlie, that the emperour much marvelled at his high wisdom and prudence, and not onelie greatlie commended him for the same, but from thenceforth vsed him more courteously, and suffered that his friends might haue access to him more freelie than before they could be permitted.

The Pope also being aduertised of the taking of king Richard, was much offended, that any christi an prince, hauing taken vpon him the defense of the christi an faith against the infidels, should be so vsed in his returne from so goodlie an enterprise: and therefore sent both to the duke of Austria, and to the emperour, requiring them to set him at libertie. But the emperour declared plainlie that he would be answered for: such summes of monie as king Richard had taken out of Sicile before: he would release him or set him at libertie.

When king Richard perceiued that no excuses would serue, though neuer so iust, but that he must needs paie to his courtois host some great summe of monie for his hard intertainment, he sent the bishop of Salisburie into England, to take order with the barons of the realme to prouide for the payment of his ranfome, which bishop, as ye haue heard, after the peace concluded with Saladin, went vnto Ierusalem to visit the holie sepulchre, and now coming into Sicile, as he returned homewards, had knowledge there how king Richard was taken prisoner in Austria, and remained in the emperours hands: whereupon he turned that waie forth, and coming to him, was now sent into England with commission, as I haue said, to leaue monie for the kings ranfome. He landed here the twentieth day of April, by whose coming the land was the sooner brought in quiet: for the agreement which earle John made (as before ye haue heard) was chesefelie procured by his means: for till his coming, the castell of Winton fore was not wone, the siege being but lackelie sollowed by the archbishop of Rouen, who had diuerse of his friends within it, and therefore was not verie carnest against them.

When the bishop of Salisbury was departed towards England, the bishop of Elie came to the king and trauelled so carnestlie betwixt the emperor and him, that finally the emperor (partlie through his suit, & partlie for that he had bene verie much called vpon by the pope and other for his deliuerie) took order with him for the redeeming of his libertie, and appointed what summe he should pay for his ransome, which (as some write) was two hundred thousand markes: other saie that it was but 140 thousand markes of the poise of Cullen weight. But William Parvus, who lived in those daies, affirmeth it was one hundred thousand pounds, and Roger Houeden saith an hundred thousand marks of Cullen poise, to be paid presentlie at the kings first coming into England, and fiftie thousand marks afterwards, that is to say, thirtie thousand to the emperor, and twentie thousand to the duke of Austrich, as it were in recompence of the iniurie done to him in the holie land; where king Richard ouerthrew his ensignes: and for the same to deliuer sufficient suerties.

Moreover, we find in Roger Houeden that the emperor amongst other the articles of this agreement thus concluded betwixt him and king Richard, gaue and granted, and by his letters patents confirmed vnto him these lands hereafter mentioned, that is to saie: Pouance with the cite of Mienne, and Miennois, the cite of Marceils, Parbon, Arles and Lion vpon the Rhone, with the countrie vnto the Alps, and all those possessions which belonged to the empire in Burgoinie, with the homages of the king of Aragon and of the earle of Sicily: wherein is to be noted, that with the precinct of the premises thus granted to king Richard, five archbishops sees, and thirtie three bishops sees are included. Howbeit the truth is, that the emperor neuer had possession of these countries, cities, and towne himselfe, neither would the inhabitants receiue any person so by him appointed to their lord and gouernour, wherefore the king made small account of that his so large grant. But after he once vnderstood the certeintie of the summe that he should paie for his ransome (which businesse he most attended) he sent one with letters by and by and in great hast into England to his treasurers, requiring them with all conuenient speed to prouide monie, and to send it to him by a day, that he might be set at libertie with speed.

These letters being come to the queene mother, and other that had charge in gouernance of the realme, toke order that all manner of persons as well spirituall as temporell, should giue the fourth part of their whole reuenues to them for that yeare accretwing, and as much more of their moueable goods, and that of euerie knights fee there should be leuied the sum of twentie shillings. Also that the religious houses of the orders of the Cisterciars and Sempingham should giue all their wools for that yeare towards the kings ransome.

Now those that had commission to leuie this mo-nie, being poisoned with couetousnesse, and incensed with a greedy desire (than the which as the poet saith, — nulla est hac maior Erinyis,

Hanc memoraunt Acheronte satam, per trisilia Diis Regna truces agitare faces, &c.) blew much strenghtnesse in exacting it, not onelie leueng it to the bittermost value and extent of mens lands, goods, and possessions, but after their owne willes and pleasures: so that vnder colour of the kings commission, and letters to them directed, there sawed not a tribute or subside to be raised, but by some publike proclamation all the goods and substance of the people to be appointed as a prey to the kings officers, whereby it came to passe, that not onelie priuie mens goods, but also the chalices, scul-els, and vessels belonging to the church were turned into monie, and a farre greater summe made than was at the first commanded, a great part of the ouerplus being conuerted to the vse of those, through whose hands the receipt passed. There was no priu-lege nor freedome allowed to exempt any person or place for being contributory towards the payment of this monie. The order of Cisterciars that were neuer charged with any payment before, were now assessed more deperlie than the rest.

The bishop of Norwich lamenting the iniurious dealings of the petty officers, and pittieing the people of the church, collected halfe the value of all the chalices within his diocesse himselfe, and to make vp the other halfe of the whole summe, he spared not to giue a great portion of his owne treasure. The ab-bat of St. Albons acquitted all those churches within the compasse of his iurisdiction, by the gift of an hundred markes. But the bishop of Chester had verie ill lucke with his collections; for hauing gathered a great summe of monie to the kings vse, he was spoiled thereof in one night, as he lodged nere vnto Canturburie, being vpon his iournie towards the king. And because Matthew de Clare that laie in the castell of Dover was knowne to aid those that robbed the said bishop, the archbishop of Canturburie pronounced him accursed.

About this time, and on the morrow after the natiuitie of saint John Baptist, the bishop of Elie lord chancellor arriued in England, not shewing himselfe in any statelie port (for he toke vpon him neither the dignitie of chancellor nor legat, nor yet of iustice) but onelie as a simple bishop and messenger sent from the king. The queene mother, the archbishop of Rouen, and such other as had gouernment of the land, hearing of his coming, met him at saint Al-bons, where he shewed to them the emperours letters, containing the agreement made betwixt him and king Richard, and withall appointed certeine lords & barons to go with him at his returne backe to the king, as Gilbert bishop of Rochester, Sifrid bishop of Chichester, Bennet abbat of Peterborough, Richard earle of Clare, Roger Bigot earle of Norfolke, Geste de Sate, and diuerse other. It was also ordeined at this same time, that the monie gathered towards the payment of the kings ransome should remaine in custodie of Hubert bishop of Salisburie, Richard bishop of London, William earle of Arundell, Hameline earle of Warren, and of the Prior of London, vnder the seales of the queene mother, and of the archbishop of Rouen.

But see the hap of things, whilst ech one was thus occupied about the aforesaid monie; it chanced that king Richard was at the point to haue bene deliue-red into the hands of his deadly aduersarie the French king, as hereafter you shall heare, noting by the waie the dangerous estate of princes, the manifold distresses whereinto by sinifter fate (as well as the inferiour rascall rout of common drudges) they be driuen. For what greater calamitie, what gre-uouser hartach, what more miserable casuallie could haue happened vnto a bondman, than to be deliuered to and fro from the hand of one enimie to another, to be bought and sold for monie, to stand to the countes of forren foes, of a king to become a captiue?
Wherunto the poet did right well allude, when he said,

Sapius ventis agitur ingens

The bishop of Liege mura-theret.

The emperor upon displeasure conceiued against the bishop of Liege, which lathelie had attained to that benefice contrarie to the emperours pleasure, who wished the same rather to an other person, hired certeine naughtie fellows to go into France, where the bishop remained for feare of the emperours malice, and there to find meanes traitorously to slea him, which they accordingly did, by reason whereof the duke of Louaigne that was brother to the bishop, and other of his kinsmen, upon knowledge had thereof, meant to haue made the emperor warre, in reuenge of that murder: inso much that the emperor, to haue the French kings aid against them, was minded to haue deliuered R. Richard unto him.

Howbeit after that the matter was taken vp, and a concord made betwixt the emperor and his nobles, he changed his purpose also touching the deliuering ouer of king Richard, who perceiving that till his ranome were paid (which would amount to the summe of an hundred & fiftie thousand marks) he should not get libertie: and putting great confidence in the dexteritie and diligence of Hubert bishop of Salisburie (whome he sent as ye haue heard into England to deale for the leuieng of the same) he thought good to aduance the same bishop to the metropolitane see of Canturburie, which had bene vacant ever sithence the decease of archbishop Walswine, that died (as ye haue heard) in the holie land.

Wil. Parvus.

Hereupon writing to the bishops of the realme, and to the monks of Canturburie, he required them to proceed to the election of an archbishop for that see, and withall commended unto them the foresaid Hubert, as a man most sufficient and meet for that roine. He wrote likewise to the queene to further that matter, and easilie hereby obtained his desire. For shortly after, the same Hubert was elected by the bishops and monks, which assembled togither for that purpose. He was the 41 archbishop that gouerned that see: for although Reginald bishop of Bath was elected before him, yet because he died per he was installed, he is not put in the number.

Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, lord chefe iustice.

The king being now put in god hope of his speedie deliuerance, sent into England, willing his mother queene Elianor, the archbishop of Ronen and others, to come ouer unto him into Almaine, and in the meane time he ordeined Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie to remaine at home as lord chiefe iustice. After this, the emperor with the aduice of the princes of the empire, assigned a day to king Richard, in which he should be deliuered out of captiuitie, which was the mondaie next after the twentieth day of Christmasse. Whereupon king Richard wrote unto Hubert archbishop of Canturburie in forme as followeth.

The tenour of king Richards letters to the said archbishop.

The emperor also signified by his letters to the lords of England his resolute determination in this matter, as followeth.

The tenour of the emperours letters to the States of England touching king Richard, and the day of his deliuerance, &c.

Datum apud Theallusam vigilia beati Thome Apostoli.

Before this king Richard had sent the bishop of Elie into France unto his brother earle John, who preuailed so much with him, that he returned into Normandie, and there swaie fealtie unto his brother king Richard, and so was contented to forsake the French king. But whereas king Richard commanded that all such castels and honours as he had giuen to him afore time, should now be restozed to him againe, as well those in England, as the other on the further side the sea: such as had the same castels in keeping would not obteine the kings commandement herein, refusing to make restitution of those places, according to the tenour & purport of the kings writ, unto the said earle of Portaigne, by reason of which refusal, he returned againe to the French king, and stucke to him. Whereupon the French king gaue vnto him the castels of Drein court, and Arques, the which ought to haue bene deliuered unto the archbishop of Reimes as in pledge, who had travelled as a meane betwixt the French king to whom he was uncle, and the king of England to whom he was cousin, procuring a meeting for agreement to be had betwixt them at a certeine place betwixt Chaucolour and Tulle in the borders of Lozaine. But notwithstanding all that he could do, matters were so farre out of frame, and such mistrust was entered into the minds of the parties, that no conclusion held. So that all the hope which king Richard had, was by payment of his ranome to redeme his libertie, and then to shift with things as he might. And so finally when the monie was once readie, or rather a sufficient portion thereof, the same was conuied ouer into Germanie, and payment made to the emperor of the more part of the kings ranome, and sufficient pledges left with him for the rest, as the archbishop

King Richard released out of captivity.

Whereupon king Richard, after he had bene prisoner one yeare, six weekes, and three daies, was set at libertie on Candlemasse day (as most writers agree) and then with long and hasty iournies, not keeping the high waies, he halfed forth towards England. It is reported that if he had linged by the way, he had bene estones apprehended. For the emperor being incensed against him by ambassadoys that came from the French king, immediatlie after he was set forward, began to repent himselfe in that he had suffered him so sone to depart from him, and hereupon sent men after him with all speed to bring him backe if they could by any meanes ouertake him, meaning as then to haue kept him in perpetuall prison.

R. Houed.
The offers of the French king and earle John to haue the king of England kept still in prison.

Some write that those ambassadoys sent from the French king, with other from earle John, came to the emperor before king Richard was deliuered, offering in the French kings name fiftie thousand marks of siluer, and in the name of earle John thirtie thousand, upon condition that k. Richard might remaine still in captiuitie vntill the feast of S. Michael next ensuing; or else if it might so please him, he should receiue a thousand pounds of siluer for euerie month, whilst king Richard should be detained in his prison, or otherwise fiftie thousand marks of siluer more than the first offer, at one entire payment, if he would deliuer him into their hands, or at the leastwise to keepe him prisoner by the terme of one whole yeare.

The emperor hearing of such large offers, and yet hoping for more, contrarie to his promise and letters patents therfore granted, prologed the day in which king Richard should haue bene set at libertie, till Candlemasse after, at which day he was brought from Haguenaw vnto Spiers, where the emperor had called a counsell to intreat further of the matter touching his redemption. Here the emperor shewed the letters which he had receiued from the French king and earle John vnto king Richard, who upon sight and perusing of the same, was maruellously amazed, and began to despaire of all speedie deliuerance.

The princes that had undertaken for the emperor to performe the constraints.

Indeede the emperor sought delaies upon a courteous desire of the monie offered by the French king and earle John, but yet such princes and great lordes as had undertaken for the emperor, that the constraints and articles on his part agreed upon in the accord passed betwixt him and king Richard, should be in each behalfe performed [that is to saie, the archbishops of Mentz, Cullen, and Saltzburge, the bishops of Wormes, Spiers, and Liege, the dukes of Suabia, Anfrich, & Louain, the Palgrave of the Rhine, and others] came to the emperor, and reprouing him for his courteous mind, in that he deferred the releasing of king Richard to his libertie, contrarie to the composition, did so much preuaile, that the emperor receiuing pledges for the payment of the monie yet behind (as before ye haue heard) released king Richard out of captiuitie on the second or (as Roger Houeden saith) the fourth day of February, being a small day and an infortunate (as they note them in kalendars.) And where the king would haue left Robert de Bouant the bishop of Couentries brother for a pledge amongst the other, he refused to be one of the number, alledging that he was seruant to earle John. King Richard greuouslie offended herewith, commanded that he should be apprehended, and committed to prison, & so he was. This Robert was one of those that came with the letters from the French king and earle John to the emperor, about the staying of king Richards deliuerance.

Robert de Bouant.

Furthermore, king Richard the same day in which he was released to libertie, summoned by his letters Hugh Bouant bishop of Couentrie, to appeare in his court, to answer such things as were to be objected against him, both before spirituall iudges in that he was a bishop, and also before temporall in that he had holden and exercised a temporall office. On the verie same day also the emperor and the princes of the empire, sent letters vnder their hands and scales to the French king, and to John erle of Fflaunders, commanding them immediatlie upon sight of the same letters, to release vnto king Richard all those castles, cities, townes, lands, and other things, which they had taken from him during the time of his remaining in captiuitie, and if they refused thus to do, then they gaue them to vnderstand by the same letters, that they would aid king Richard to recouer that by force, which had bene wrongfullie taken from him.

Moreover king Richard gaue and by his deed confirmed vnto sundrie princes of the empire for their homage and fealtie, certeine yearelie pensions, as to the archbishop of Mentz and Cullen, to the bishop of Liege, to the dukes of Anfrich and Louaine, to the marquisse of Mountferrat, to the duke of Burglenburge, to the duke of Suaben the emperors brother, to the earle of Bins, to the earle of Holland, and to the sonne of the earle of Henault, of all the which, and other mo, he receiued homage, or rather had the promise by oth to aid him against the French king, which French king, now that he sawe no hope nor likelihood remaining to bring the emperor to the bent of his bowle for the detaining of k. Richard still in captiuitie, raised a power forthwith, & entering into Normandie (the truce notwithstanding) toke the towne of Cueur, with diuerse other fortresses thereabouts, and after he had done mischefe inough, as it were wearied with euill doing, he granted estones to stand to the truce, and so returned home.

Finallie after king Richard had dispatched his businesse with the emperor, and the princes of Almaine, he set forward on his iourne towards England, and hauing the emperors passport, came to Cullen, where he was sofullie receiued of the archbishop, the which archbishop attended on him till he came to Antwerpe, where king Richard toke the water in a galley that belonged to Alane de Trenchmere, but in the night he went into a ship of his, being a verie faire vessel, and so late aboyd in hir all the night, and in the morning returned to the galley, and so sailed about the coast, till he came to the haven of Swin in Fflanders, and there staying five daies, on the first day he set forth againe, and at length in good safetie landed at Sandwich the twelue daie of March, and the morrow after came to Canturburie, where he was receiued with procession, as Ger. Dor. saith. From thence he went to Rochester, and on the Wednesday being the sixteenth of March, he came vnto London, where he was receiued with great ioy and gladnesse of the people, giuing heartie thanks to almightie God for his safe returne and deliuerance.

R. Houed.

He landed the 20. of March being sundae as R. Houeden and R. de Directo write.

¶ It is recorded by writers, that when such lordes of Almaine as came over with him, sawe the great riches which the Londoners shewed in that triumphant receiuing of their soueraigne lord and king, they marvelled greaillie thereat, insomuch that one of them said vnto him; Sirelie oh king, your people are wise and subtil, which do nothing doubt to shew the beautifull shine of their riches now that they haue receiued you home, whereas before they seemed to betwaille their need and pouertie, whilst you remained in captiuitie. For verelie if the emperor had vnderstood that the riches of the realme had bin such,

such, neither would he haue bene persuaded that England could haue bene made bare of wealth, neither yet should you so lightlie haue escaped his hands without the payment of a more huge and intollerable ranfome.

The same yeare that king Richard was taken (as before is mentioned) by the duke of Austrich, one night in the moneth of Januarie about the first watch of the same night, the north west side of the element appeared of such a ruddie colour as though it had burned, without any clouds or other darknesse to couer it, so that the stars shined through that rednesse, and might be verie well discerned. Diuerse bright streakes appeared to flash vponwards now and then, diuiding the rednesse, thorough the which the stars seemed to be of a bright sanguine colour. In Februarie next ensuing, one night after midnight the like wonder was sene, and shortly after newes came that the king was taken in Almaine.

On the second daie of Nouember also a little before the breake of the daie, the like thing appeared againe with lesse feare and wonder to the people (than before) being now better accustomed to the like sight againe. And now the same daie and selfe houre that the king arryued at Sandwich, being the second houre of that daie, whilst the sunne shone verie bright and cleare, there appeared a most brightsome and vnaccustomed clearenesse, not farre distant from the sunne, as it were to the length and breadth of a mans personage, having a red shining brightnesse twofold like to the rainbow, which strange sight when manke beheld, there were that prognosticated the king already to be arryued.

In this meane while the bishop of Durham with a great armie besieged the castell of Tickhill; and earle Wando brother to the king of Scots, with Ranulfe earle of Chester, and earle Ferrers, besieged the castell of Potingham, whilst at the same present the archbishop of Canturburie with a great power besieged Warleburgh castell, the which within a few daies was rendred into his hands, the liues and limbs of them within saued. Also the castell of Lancaster was deliuered to him, the which the same archbishops brother had in keeping vnder earle John, and likewise the abbey of S. Michaels mount in Cornwall, the which abbey Henrie de la Pomerey chailing out the monks, had fortified against the king, and hearing newes of the kings returne home, died (as it was thought) for mere græfe and feare. These three places were surrendered to the archbishop before the kings returne, but Tickhill & Potingham held out.

King Richard being returned into England, and understanding both how the French king made warre against him in Normandie, and that the state of England was not a little disquieted, by the practise of his brother earle John and his complices, specially by reason that diuerse castles were defended by such as he had placed in them, he thought good with all speed to cut off such occasions as might breed a further mischæfe. Whereupon he first went to Potingham, and within three daies after his coming thither (which was on the daie of the Annunciation of our ladie) he constrained them that kept the castell there in his brothers name, to yeld themselves simple vnto his mercie, after they had abidden diuerse assaults, by the which euen the first daie the vtter gates were burnt, and certeine defenses destroyed, which they had made before the same.

The cheefe of them that were within this castell to defend it were these, William de Glendevall conestable there, Roger de Mountbegun, Rafe Spurdac, Philip de Worcester and Ranulfe de Worcester brethren. The morow after the surrender was made, the king went to Clippone, and rode into the forest of Shirewood, where he had neuer bene before, the vieto thereof pleased him greatlie. The castell of Tickhill was likewise at the same time yelded vnto the bishop of Durham, who receiued it to the kings vse, and them that kept it as prisoners, without anie composition, but standing simple to the kings mercie. For although those that had these castles in keeping, were sufficientlie prouided of all necessarie things for defense, yet the sudden coming of the king (whom they thought verelie would neuer haue returned) put them in such feare, that they wist not what to make of the matter, and so (as men amazed) they yelded without anie further exception. The bishop of Durham bringing those prisoners with him which had yelded vnto this castell of Tickhill, came to the king the 27 daie of March, the verie daie before that Potingham castell was giuen ouer.

Moreover, this is to be remembered, that during the siege of Potingham, contention arose betwixt the two archbishops of Canturburie and Poike, about the carriage of their crosses. For Hubert archbishop of Canturburie coming thither, had his crosse borne before him; the archbishop of Poike (having no crosse there at all) was verie sore offended, that anie other should go with crosse borne before him in his diocesse, and therefore complained hereof to the king. But the archbishop of Canturburie maintained that he had not done anie thing but that which was lawfull for him to doe, and thereupon made his appeale to Rome, that the pope might haue the hearing and iudging of that controuersie betwixt them.

In the meane time, after the king had got the castles of Potingham and Tickhill into his hands (as ye haue heard) he called a parlement at Potingham, where the quene mother sat on the right hand of him, and the archbishops of Canturburie & Poike on the left, with other bishops, earles and barons according to their places. On the first daie of their session was Gerard de Camuille discharged of the office which he had borne of shiriffe of Lincoln, and dispossessed both of the castell & countie. And so likewise was Hugh Bardolfe of the castell and countie of Poike, and of the castell of Scarbourgh, and of the custodie and keeping of the countie of Westmerland, the which offices being now in the kings hands, he set them on sale to him that would giue most. Hereof it came to passe, that where the lord chancellor offered to giue fiftene hundred markes before hand, for the counties of Poike, Lincoln and Northampton, and an hundred markes of increase of rent for euerie of the same counties, Gestepe archbishop of Poike offered to the king three thousand markes aforehand, onelie for the countie of Poike, and an hundred markes yearelie of increase, and so had the same committed to his regiment.

Moreover in this parlement, the king demanded iudgement against his brother John, and Hugh Poiant the bishop of Conetrie and Chester, for such traitorous and most disloyall attempts as they had made against him and his countie, and iudgement was giuen that both the said earle and bishop should haue summons giuen them peremptorie to appeare, and if within forty daies after, they came not to answer such plaints as might be laid against them, then should earle John forfeit all that he had within the realme, and the bishop should stand to the iudgement of the bishops, in that he was a bishop, and to the tempoall lords in that he had bene the kings shiriffe.

In this parlement also, in the kalends of Aprill, the king procured a subside to be granted to him, to wit, two shillings of euerie plough land through England, which maner of subside by an old name is called Teemen toll, or Theyme toll. He also com-

He demanded of the monks Cister, all their woollies for the same yeare. But because that seemed an ouer greuous burthen vnto them, they fined with him, as after shall appeare. The fourth day of this parlement, by the kings permission manie greuous complaints were exhibited against the archbishop of Poike, for extortion and other vniuall verations, which he had practised: but he passed so little thereof, that he made no answer vnto their billes.

Gerard de Camville charged with felonie and treason.

Moreover through the procurement of the lord chancellor, Gerard de Camville was arreigned for receiuing theues, and robbers, which had robbed certeine merchants of their goods, that were going to the faire of Stamford; also they appealed him of treason for refusing to stand to his trial by order of the kings labours at commandement of the kings iustices, bearing himselfe to be earle Johns man, and adding the same earle against the king. But all these accusations he flatlie denied, and so his aduersaries put in pledges to follow their suit, and he put in the like to defend himselfe by one of his freeholders.

The king of Scots commeth to see the king of England.

The same daie king Richard receiued the king of Scots at Clifstone, comming now to visit him, and to reioice with him for his safe returne home after so long a iourne, and so manie passed perils. After they had spent the time a certeine space in ioy and mirth, the fourth of Aprill at their being together at Gualton, the king of Scots required of king Richard to haue restored to him the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland and Westmerland, with the countie of Lancaster also, the which in right of his predecessors belonged to him (as he alledged.)

Parlement.

King Richard assembling a parlement of the Nobles of his realme at Northampton, about sixteene daies after that the Scottish king had made this request, gaue him answer that by no means he might as then satisfie his petition: for if he should so do, his aduersaries in France would report that he did it for feare, and not for any loue or hartie friendship. But yet king Richard in the presence of his mother queene Elianor, and the lords spirituall and temporall of his realme together at that present assembled, granted and by his deed confirmed vnto the said king of Scots, and to his heires for euer; that whensoeuer he or any of them should come by summons of the king of England vnto his court, the bishop of Durham, and the shiriffe of Northumberland should receiue him at the water of Tweed, and safe conduct him vnto the water of Thise, and there should the archbishop of Poike, and the shiriffe of Poike be readie to receiue him of them, and from thence giue their attendance vpon him vnto the borders of the next shire.

A grant made to the king of Scots what allowance he should haue when he came to England.

It was also granted to the said king, that he should be attended from shire to shire by prelates and shiriffes, till he came to the kings court, also from the time that the king of Scotland should enter this realme of England, he should haue daile out of the kings purse for his liuerie an hundred shillings, and after he came to the court, he should haue in allowance daile for his liuerie, so long as he there remained, thirtie shillings and twelue manchet wassels, twelue manchet smmels, foure gallons of the best wine, and eight gallons of household wine, two pound of pepper, foure pound of cummin, two stone of wax, or else foure links, and foure great and long colpons of such candels as are serued before the king, and foure and twentie colpons of other candels that serue for the household. And when he should returne into his countie againe, then should he be conueied with the bishops and shiriffes from countie to coun-tie, till he come to the water of Tweed, having an hundred shillings a day of liuerie, as is before appointed. The charter of this grant was deliuered vnto William king of Scots in the towne of Northampton in Easter weeke, by the hands of William bishop of Elie lord chancellor, in the yeare of our lord 1194, and in the fift yeare of king Richard his reigne.

After this, on the fiftenth day of Aprill, king Richard having the said king of Scots in his companie came to Winchester, where he called a counsell, and there in open assemblie he highlie commended all those of the Nobilitie, that in his absence had shewed themselves faithfull, and resisted his brother, and such other his complices, which had as disloyall persons rebelled against him. Here he also proclaimed his said brother, and all those that took his part, traitours to the crowne, and took order for the punishment of them, that (being of their faction) could by any means be apprehended.

he caused himselfe to be effronces crowned by the archbishop Hubert, on the 18 of Aprill, at Winchester, and so shewed himselfe as a new crowned king (in hope of good successe and better lucke to follow) in the presence of the said king of Scots, who bare one of the three swords before him, going in the middle betwixt two earles, that is to saie, Hamelin earle of Warren going on his right hand, and Ranulfe earle of Chester on his left. The canopy vnder the which he went was borne vpon also by foure earles, Northfolke, Lislewight, Salisburie, and Ferrers. The bishop of Elie lord chancellor went on the right hand of the king, and the bishop of London on the left. At dinner also the citizens of London serued him in the butterie by reason of two hundred marks which they had giuen the king that they might so do, notwithstanding the claime and challenge made by the citizens of Winchester, the which serued him in the kitchen.

The archbishop of Poike was commanded that he should not be present at the coronation, least some tumult might arise about the hauing of his crosse borne afore him, to the displeasure of the archbishop of Canturburie, who stood in it, that no prelat withy in his prouince ought to haue any crosse borne before him, himselfe excepted.

After this, he called a parlement, by vertue whereof he reuoked backe and resumed into his hands all patents, annuities, fees, and other grants (before his voiage into the holie Land) by him made, or otherwise granted or alienated. And because it shuld not seeme that he used a more violent extortion herein, he treated with euerie one of them in most courteous wise, bearing them in hand, that he knew well they ment not to let forth their monie to him vpon vsurie, but would be contented with such reasonable gaine and profit, as had bene raised to their vse in time of his absence of those things which they held of him by assignation in way of loue, so that now the same might be restored to him againe, sith he ment not to sell them, but to let them forth as it were to farme for the time, as all men might well vnderstand, considering that he could not mainteine the port of a king without receipt of those profits which he had so let forth. With these gentle words therefore mixed with some dreadfull allegations, he brought them all into such perperitie, that not one of them durst withstand his request, nor alledge that he had wrong done to him, except Hugh the bishop of Lincoln, who sticke not

Thus the king recovered those things for the which he had receiued great summes of monie, without making any recompense, where the most part of the occupiers had not receiued scarce a third part of the principall which they had laid forth. For no sufficiency of grant, patent, or other writing to any of them before made, did any thing auail them. Moreover, where he had borrowed a great summe of monie of the merchants of the staple, he bought a feat with the monks of the Cisterciens order to discharge that debt. He told these monks that being constrained with urgent necessitie, he had borrowed that monie of the merchants beyond the sea, upon confidence of their god beneuolence, and therefore he required them to extend their liberalitie so farre to ward him, as to deliuer so much wooll in value, as should discharge that debt. To be short, the monks being overcome with the kings words, threatening kindnesse upon them, fulfilled his request. Moreover not satisfied herewith, he leuied a taske throughout the realme, exacting of euerie hide of land two shillings, according to the grant made to him at Pothingham: and the same was generallie gathered, as well of the spirituall mens lands as of the tempozall.

Rog. Houed.
The king of Scots made keth suit for Northumber-
land.

The king of Scots understanding that the bishop of Durham had given over and resigned the earldome of Northumberland into the kings hands, thought god once againe to assaie if he might compass his desire, and herewith he began his former suit afresh, offering to king Richard sixtene thousand markes of siluer for the whole earldome of Northumberland with the appurtenances, as his father earle Henrie did hold the same before. The king taking counsell in the matter, agreed that he should haue it for that monie, excepting the castles: but the king of Scots would haue castles and all, or else he would not bargain.

Attempzile.

Finallie, after he had sundrie times moued this suit for the hauing of the lands vnto which he pretended a title, and could get nothing of king Richard but faire words, putting him as it were in hope to obtaine that he required at his next returne out of France, vpon the 22 daie of Aprill being fridate, he took leaue of the king, and returned towards his countrie, not verie ioysfull, in that he could not obtaine his suit. King Richard in this meane while caused all those prisoners that were taken in the castles of Pottingham, Tickhill, Harleburgh, Lancaster, and S. Michaels mount, which were of any wealth to be put in prison, that they might fine for their ransoms. The residue he suffered to depart vpon sureties, that were bound for them in an hundred marks a peece, to be forth comming when they should be called.

Rog. Houed.

Now the king (after he had gathered a great portion of monie, and ordeined diuerse things for the behoofe of the common-wealth, thereby to satisfie the hartes of the people) prepared himselfe to saie into Normandie. But first he reconciled the archbishop of Poike, and the bishop of Elie lord chancellor, as well for the apprehension & imprisoning of the archbishop at Douer, as for the dishonourable expulsion of the chancellor out of England, in such wise that the chancellor should vpon reasonable summons giuen to him by the archbishop, sweare with the hands of an hundred preests with him, that he neither commanded nor willed that the archbishop should be apprehended. The controuersie betwixt the two archbishops about the bearing of their crosses, the king would not meddle withall, for (as he said) that pertained to the pope. Yet the archbishop of Canturburie complained to king Richard of the iniurie done to him at that present by the archbishop of Poike, presuming within his prouince to haue his crosse borne before him. At length when the kings prouision was once readie for his voiage into Normandie, he came to Douer, and hearing that the French king had besieged the towne of Wernueil, and that the same was in danger to be taken, he took the sea together with his mother quene Elia, nor on the ninth daie of Maie, and transporting ouer into Normandie, arrived at Harflet with an hundred great ships fraught with men, horses and armour.

The French king hearing of king Richards arrival, and that he was comming with a great power to the succour of them within Wernueil, and was already incamped nere to the towne of the Eagle, he plucked vp his tents in the night before Whit Sunday, and leauing the siege, departed from thence, and took a certaine small fortresse by the waie as he marched, wherein he left a few souldiers to keepe it to his vse. King Richard herewith entring into the French dominions, sent three bands of souldiers towards Vale de Ruell, and went himselfe vnto Loches, and besieging that castell wan it within a short time. The Normans also recovered the citie of Eureur out of the French mens hands, but those that were sent vnto Ruell, and had besieged the castell there an eight daies without anie gaine, hearing that the French king was comming towards them, departed thence, & came backe to the kings campe, whereupon the French king comming to Ruell, raised it to the ground, because his enimie should not at anie time in winning it nestle there to the further damage of the countrie.

About the same time, Robert earle of Leicester (suing forth of Rouen in hope to worke some feat to the damage of the Frenchmen, as he rode somewhat vnadvisedly in the lands of Hugh Courney, fell within danger of his enimies, who took him prisoner, and a few other that were in his companie. The French king after this came with his armie into the coasts of Touraine, and marched nere Wandosme, and there incamped, whereof king Richard being aduertised, drew nere to Wandosme, meaning to assault the French king in his campe, who hauing knowledge thereof dislodged with his armie earlie in the morning, and fled awaie (to his great dishonour) in all hast possible. The king of England with his people following in chase of the French men vnto Manie, and took a great number of prisoners, amongst whom was the French kings chiefe treasurer. Also the Englishmen took manie wagons and sumpters laden with crossbowes, armour, plate, apparel, and the furniture of the French kings chapel. This chanced about 37 daies after his fleeing in the night from Wernueil, of which two sights of the French king (in maner as ye haue heard) we find these verses written:

matters.

In this meane while certeine rebels in Guien, as the lord Cesfey de Kancin or Kancin, and the earle of Engoelme with their complices, vpon confidence of the French kings assistance, soze disquietted the countrie. Howbeit, the sonne of the king of France, and brother to Berengaria the quene of England, entring into Guien with an armie, wasted the lands of both those rebels, till he was called home by reason of his fathers death which chanced about the same time. Shortly after Cesfey Kancin died, and king Richard comming into his countrie, took the strong castell of Tailleburge by surrender, which appertained to the same Cesfey with others, and then going against the other rebels, he took the citie of Engoelme from him by force of assault. All which time the French king stirred not, by reason that there was some communication in hand for a truce to be taken betwixt him and king Richard, which by mediation of certeine bishops was shortly after concluded, to endure for twelue moneths. The bishop of Elie was chiefe commissioner for the king of England, and this truce was accorded about Lammass, and serued to little purpose, except to giue libertie to either prince to breathe a little, and in the meane time to prouide themselves of men, munition, ships & monie, that immediatlie after the terme was expired, they might with greater force returne to the field againe, for they had not onelic a like desire to follow the warres, but also vsed a like meane and practise to leuie monie.

For whereas they had already made the temporaltie bare with often paymets, and calling them forth to serue personallie in the warres, they thought best now to fetch a sterce from the spiritualtie and churchmen, considering also that they had bene by reason of their immunitie more gentlie dealt with, and not appointed to serue themselves in any maner of wise.
To colour this exaction which they knew would be easily taken of manie, they byted abroad, that they leuied this monie vpon purpose, to send it into the ho-lie land, towards the payment of the chistian soldiers, which remained there vpon the defense of those townes, which yet the Saracens had not conquered.
King Richard therefore comming to Towrs in Tour-raine, required a great summe of monie of the cle-gie in those parts, and the like request he made throughout all those his dominions, on that further side of the sea. King Philip for his part demanded likewise intollerable tithes and duties of all the churchmen in his territories, and those that had the gathering of that monie serued their owne turne, in dealing most straightlie with sillie preests, making them to paie what they thought good, though sometime beyond the bounds of equitie and reason.

In September, the iustices itinerants made their circuits thorough euerie shire and countie of this realme, causing inquisitions to be taken by substantiall iuries of ples of the crowne both old and new, of recognisances, of escheats, of wards, of marriages, of all maner of offenders against the lawes and ordinances of the realme, and of all other transgressors, falsifiers, and murderers of Jewes; of the pledges, goods, lands, debts, and writings of Jewes that were slaine, and of other circumstances touching that matter. Likewise of the accompts of shiriffes, as to vnderstand what had bene giuen towards the kings ransome, how much had bene received, and what remained behind to receive. Also of the lands that belonged to erle John, and what goods he had, and what he held in demaine, in wards, escheats, and in gifts, and for what cause they were giuen. Furthermore, of his fauours and partakers, which had made fines with the king, and which not, with manie other articles touching the same earle. Also of vsurers, and of their goods being seized, of wines sold contrarie to the assise, of false measures, and of such as hauing re-ceiued the crosse to go into the holie land, died before they set forthward. Also of grand assises that were of an hundred shillings land or vnder, and of defaults, and of diuerse other things, the iurats were charged to inquire, and present the same.

The iustices also were appointed to cause the manours, farmes and lands which the king held in de-maine, or by wards and escheats, to be surueied by a substantiall iurie, and to take order for the conuer-ting of them to such vse, as the king might be answered of the gaires rising by the same at the farmers hands. Also, the Jewes were appointed to inroll all their debts, pledges, lands, houses, rents and possessions. Moreover, inquisition was taken of iustices, shiriffes, bailiffes, constables, foresters and other officers belonging to the king, to vnderstand in what manner they had behaued themselves in taking and seizing of things into their hands, and of all such goods, gifts and promises had and receiued by occasion of leasure made of the lands of earle John and his fauours, and who receiued the same, and what delation was granted by commandement of Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, then lord chiefe iustice.

In this meane time, whilst these inquisitions were thus taken in England, king Richard comming forth of Poitou into Anjou, caused all the bailiffes and officers of that countrie, and also of Maine, to fine with him for their offices. After this, when he came downe into Normandie, he seemed in shew to be offended with his chancelour the bishop of Elie, about concluding of the truce with the French king (where as ye haue heard he was chiefe commissioner) mistaking greatlie all that was done therein, and therefore he took the seale from him, and caused a new seale to be made, commanding to be proclamed thorough all his dominions, that whatsoeuer had bene sealed with the old seale, should stand in no force, both for that his chancelor had wrought more vndiscreetlie than was conuenient; and againe, because the same seale was lost, when Roger Palus Catus his vicechancelour was drowned, who perished among other by shipwracke, nere to the Ile of Cypres, before the king arrived there, being as then on his iourne into the holie land. Therefore all men had commandement to come to this new seale, that they might haue their charters and writings confirmed.

Furthermore, whilst the truce yet lasted, king Richard sailed ouer into England, where he caused turneis to be exercised in diuerse places, for the better training vp of souldiers in feats of warre, that they might growe more skilfull and perfect in the same, when they should come to the triall of their forces, whereby he raised no small summes of monie for granting licence to his subjects so to tourne. E-uerie earle that would tourne, paid to him for his licence twentie marks, euerie baron ten marks, and euerie knight hauing lands, did giue foure marks, and those that had no lands two marks, to the great damniens of the people; hauing learned the common lesson, and receiued the ordinarie rule followed of all, and neglected of none; namelic,

The charter of this grant was delivered by the king unto William earle of Salisburie, to haue the keeping thereof: but Hubert Walter the archbishop of Canturburie, and lord chiefe iustice, made his brother Theobald Walter collector of the monie, for the scraping and raking together thereof, in huge sums, he put the former thiffs of extortion and exaction in practise.

The tenour of the charter concerning the turnements before remembered.

Richard by the grace of God king of England, duke of Normandie and Aquitaine, and earle of Anjou, to the reuerend father in Christ, Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, and primat of all England, sendeth greeting. Know ye that we haue granted turnaments to be kept in England in due steeds, to wit, betwixt Sarisburie and Winton, betwixt Warwike and Kenelworth, betwixt Stanford and Warmeford, betwixt Brackeley and Nixburgh, betwixt Blie & Tickhill, so that the peace of our land be not broken, nor yet our iustices authoritie diminished, nor any damage doone to our forrests. Provided that what earle soeuer will turney there, shall giue to vs twentie markes, a baron ten markes, a knight that hath lands foure markes and he that hath no lands shall giue two markes.

Moreover, no stranger shall be admitted to turney there, wherevpon we command you, that at the daie of the turnieng, ye haue there two clarkes, and two of our knights to receive the oth of the earles and barons, which shall fauillie vs of the said summes of monie, before the turnieng begin, & that they suffer none to turney, till (before) they haue made payment, and haue caused to be entred how much & of whom they haue receiued: and ye shall take ten markes for this charter to our vse, whereof the earle of Salisburie, and the earle of Clare, and the earle of Warren are pledges. Witnesse my selfe, at Ville Leuesche, the two and twentieth of August.

Furthermore, ordinances were made and set forth for the safe keeping of the peace, so that such as would turney, neither by the way in comming or going, or whilst the turnieng lasted, should violentlie take any thing to serue their necessarie vses, without paying therefore to the owner according to the worth, nor should do iniurie to any man in any manner of wise. But now to the other doings of king Richard, who made no long abode in England at this time, but shortly returned into Normandie, because he heard that king Philip had an armie readie leuied. Therefore meaning to buckle with him upon occasion offered, he made the more hast, and being landed there, approached vnto the borders of the French dominions, incamping himselfe with his armie in the field, to wait for the time that the truce should be expired, least the enimie should in any exploit preuent him. In like manner king Philip hauing with him earle John king Richards brother, kept his souldiers and men of warre in a readines with him, to worke any feat that should be thought expedient as soon as the truce should end.

Which both these kings were thus bent to potize out their malice, and to ease their stomachs with dint of sword, there came messengers from the pope, exhorting him vnto peace and quietnes, but his exhortation little auailed. For they regarding it little or nothing, immediatlie as the truce was expired, got them abroad into the field, & king Richard drew towards Faldune, a towne situate in the confines of Berry, whither it was reported that the French king meant to come: and there staid for him a whole day together. But the French king hearing that king Richard was there to loke for him, thought it best not to come there at all. Therefore king Richard went the next daie vnto a castell called Buisson, and toke it vpon his first approach. Then went he to a towne called Pouencourt, and perceiuing the same to be strong and well manned, toke not in hand to assaile it till the third daie after his comming thither, at that time he so inclosed the same round about with diligent watch and ward, that a cat could not haue escaped out of the place, neither by daie nor night, but that she should haue bene espied. They within being put in feare herewith, yielded vnto the towne the daie next following, in which meane time the French king besieged Albemarle.

Wherevpon king Richard, hauing left a garrison of souldiers in Pouencourt, came to raise the enimie from his siege, & setting vpon the Frenchmen, there began a sharpe fight: but the Englishmen being wearie with trauell of their passed iournie, and hauing rashlie entred into the battell, were not able to indure the Frenchmens violence, so that (not without great losse) they were constrained to retire with swift flight, or (to saie the truth) to run a waite a maine pace. The French king hauing thus chased his enimies, returned to assault Albemarle, wone the castell by force, and the towne by composition, permitting the garrison there to depart with all their armour. This done, he ruinated the castell flat to the ground. Robert earle of Leicester offered to the French king a thousand markes sterling for his ransome, and to quite claime to him and his helres for euer all the right which he had to the castell of Falsie, with the appurtenances, and to get a confirmation thereof for him both of the pope, and of the king of England: but for that the warre still lasted, the French king toke a respite in answering this offer, neuertheless after wards in the yeare next ensuing, he toke it, and so the earle was set at libertie.

Not long after this foresaid repulse, the king of England hauing refreshed his souldiers with some rest after their great trauell, went to Millon, and giuing assault to the towne wone it at the first bunt, and made it plaine with the earth. Then was a motion made for peace betwixt the two kings, being now wearied with long wars: whereof when earle John was aduertised, who (as it should seme by some writers) hauing tarried with the French king till this present, began now to doubt least if any agreement were made, he might happilie be betrayed of the French king by couenants that should passe betwixt them: he determined therefore with himselfe to commit his whole safetie to his naturall brother, and to no man else, perceiuing that the French king made not so great accompt of him after the losse of his castels in England, as he had done before.

Wherevpon comming to his brother king Richard, he besought him to pardon his offense, and though he had not dealt brotherlie towards him, yet that he would brotherlie forgive him his rebellious trespasses, adding furthermore, that whereas he had not heretofore bene thankfull for his manifold benefits which he had receiued at his hands, yet he was now most forie therefore, and was willing to make amends: wherewith he acknowledged the safeguard of his life to rest in him, for the which he was bound to giue him thanks thanks, if he would grant thereto. The king moued with his words, made this answer (as it is said) that he pardoned him indeed, but yet wished that he might forget such iniuries as he had received at his hands, which he doubted least he should not easilie do. Here with erle John being yet put in good hope of forgiveness, swore to be true euer after vnto him, and that he would endenour himselfe to make amends for his misdeeds past, and so was shortly after restored vnto his former degree, honour and estimation in all respects.

But by some writers it should appeare, that earle John, immediatly vpon conclusion of the first truce, came from the French king, and submitted himselfe to his brother, and by mediation of the quene their mother was pardoned, receiued againe into fauour, and serued euer after against the French king verie dutifullie, seeking by new atchieued enterprises brought about (to the contentation of his brother) to make a recompense for his former misdeemeanors, re-puting it mere madnesse to make means to further mischief; for

Stultum est hostem irritare potentem, Atq; malum maius tumidis sibi querere verbis.

But at what time soeuer he returned thus to his brother, this yeare (as Roger Houeden saith) he was restored to the earldoms of Poxtaigne in Normandie, and Gloucester in England, with the honour of Cie (the castels onelic excepted) and in recompense of the residue of the earldoms which he had before inioied, together with certeine other lands, his brother king Richard gaue vnto him a yerelie pension amounting to the summe of eight thousand pound of Antouin monie. ¶ Now here to staie a while at matters chancing here about home, I will speake somewhat of the doings of Leopold duke of Austria, who as one nothing moued with the pestilence and famine that oppressed his countrie in this season, but rather hauing his hart hardened, began to threaten the English hostages that they should lose their liues, if king Richard kept not the couenants which he had vnder taken to performe by a day appointed. Wherevpon Baldwin Betun one of the hostages was sent by common agreement of the residue vnto king Richard, to signifie to him their estate. King Richard willing to deliuer them out of further danger, sent with the same Baldwin his cosen, the sister of Arthur duke of Britaine, and the daughter of the emperor of Cyprus, to be conueied vnto the said duke of Austria, the one, namely the sister of Arthur to be ioined in marriage with the dukes sonne, and the other to continue in the dukes hands to bestow at his pleasure.

But in the meane time, on saint Stephens day, duke Leopold chanced to haue a fall beside his horse, and hurt his leg in such wise, that all the surgeons in the countrie could not helpe him, wherevpon in extreame anguish he ended his life. And whereas before his death he required to be absolved of the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him by the pope (for apprehending of king Richard in his returning from his iourne made into the holie land) he was answered by the cleargie, that except he would receiue an oth to stand to the iudgement of the church for the iniurie done to king Richard, and that vlesse other of the possibilitie would receiue the like oth with him if he chanced to die (whereby he might not fulfill that which the church herein should decree) that yet they should see the same performed, he might not otherwise be absolved.

Wherefore he toke the oth, and the Nobles of his countrie with him, and therewithall released the English pledges, remitted the monie that yet remained behind of his portion aforesaid, and immediatly therewith died. After his deceasse, because certeine peeces of the countrie withstood the performance of the premises, his bodie laie eight daies longer aboue ground than otherwise it should haue done, for till such time as all the pledges were perfectlie released, it might not be buried. Also Baldwin de Betun approaching nere to the confines of Austria, when he heard that the duke was dead, returned with the two ladies vnto his soueraigne lord king Richard. This (as ye haue heard) for state of the censures of the church were the pledges restored, and the residue of the monie behind released.

¶ All this was both pleasant and profitable for king Richards soules helth (as may be thought) in much he took occasion therat to amend his former life, by considering how much he might be reprehended for his sundrie faults committed both against God and man. A marvellous matter to heare, how much fro that time forward he reformed his former trade of liuing into a better forme & order. Wherevpon, the emperor gaue to the Cisterciens monks 3000 marks of siluer, parcell of king Richards ransome, to make siluer censers in euerie church throughout where they had any houses: but the abbats of the same order refused the gift, being a portion of so longfull and vngoodlie a gaine. At which thing, when it came to the knowledge of R. Richard, he greatlie marvelled at the first, but after commended the abbats in their doings, and chaste for shewing that they were bold of the accustomed grauidesse of hauing, which most men supposed them to be much infected withall.

King Richard this yeare pardoned Hugh Pouant bishop of Couentrice of all his wrath and displeasure conceiued toward him, and restored to him his bishoplike for five thousand marks of siluer. But Robert Pouant the same bishops brother died in the kings prison at Douer. Also whereas the archbishop of Yorke had offended king Richard, he pardoned him, and receiued him againe into fauour, with the kisse of peace. Wherevpon the archbishop wared so proud, that vising the king reprochfullie, he lost his archbishoplike, the rule of Yorke which he had in gouernment as shrifte, the fauour of his soueraigne, and (which was the greatest losse of all) the loue of God. For

Nemo superbus amittit superos, nec amittitur ab illis, Pulsi humiles Deus ac mites, habitant libenter Mansuetos animos procul ambitione remotos, Inflatos vero ac ventisq; deprimunt idem, Nec patitur secum puro consistere olympo.

Wherevpon, through the kings request, pope Celestine this yeare made the archbishop of Canturburie legat of all England by his bulls directed to him, bearing date at his palace in Rome called Lateran the fifteenth kalends of Aprill, in the fourth yeare of his papacie. Furthermore, the pope wrote to the English cleargie, giuing them to vnderstand that he had created the said archbishop of Canturburie his legat, commanding them so to accept him: by vertue of which letters, the archbishop Hubert being now both archbishop of Canturburie, legat of the apostolike see, and lord chiefe iustice of England, appointed to hold a councell at Yorke, and therefore gaue knowledge by the abbat of Winham in Northfolke, and one maister Geruile, vnto the canons of Yorke, and to the archbishops officials of his purposed intention.

The said canons and officials well considering of the popes letters, which were deliuered vnto them by the messengers, signified for answer, that they would gladlie receiue him as legat of the apostolike see, but not as archbishop of Canturburie, nor as their priuat. Wherewith he came to Yorke vpon saint Barnabies daie being sundae, and was receiued with procession.

procession. On the morrow after, he held a court of ples of the crowne, of assises, and such other matters touching the king. On the next day being Tuesday, he entred into the monasterie of saint sparies in Porke, and deposed the abbat, because of his infirmitie of bodie, at the request of the monks; but the abbat appealed to the popes consistorie. Then he assembled the cleargie in the church of saint Peter in Porke; and there held a synod for reformation of things amisse in the church, and amendment of manners in the cleargie, so that diuerse decrees were made, the which for breuenesse we omit to speake of in particular. This yere also, the said archbishop Hubert caused all men throughout the realme of England to receiue an oth of obseruing the kings peace, and to sweare that they should not be robbers, nor abettors of robbers, nor in any wise consenting vnto them, but should do what in them might, to apprehend all such offenders, and to discouer them to the kings officers to be apprehended, and to pursue them vpon heu and erie to the uttermost of their powers, and those that withholde themselves from such pursuit, should be apprehended as partakers with the offenders.

The emperor sendeth to the king.

Anno Reg. 7.

The bishop of Elie is sent to the emperor.

About this time the emperor sent to king Richard, requiring him in no wise to conclude any peace with the French king, but rather to invade his dominions, promising to aid him all that he might. But king Richard, to vnderstand further of the emperours mind herein, sent ouer his chancellor the bishop of Elie vnto him in ambassage. In the meane time the warre was still continued betwixt him and the French, by the which they were commonly put to the worse, and king Richard invading their borders, did much hurt in waisting the countreies on each side. The French king was at one time so narrowly chased, that as he would haue passed a bridge that laie ouer the water of Saine, he was in danger of drowning by the fall of the same vnder him, but yet at the length he escaped, and got to the further side.

The 2 kings talke together.

After this, the two kings came to a communication together, in the which a motion was made, that helues the French king his sonne and heire should haue the sister of Arthur duke of Britaine in marriage, and that king Richard in consideration thereof should surrender vnto them and to their heires the townes of Cisors, Bademont, with the countrie of Menquesne or Meurine le Fromant, Cleron, Nerrie and Palsie; and further should giue vnto them twenty thousand marks of siluer. On the other side it was moued, that the French king should resigne vnto king Richard all that he could demand in the countie of Engoulesme, and should restore vnto him the countreies of Albemarle and Augie, with the castell of Arkes, and all other castells which he had taken in Normandie, or in any partie during these last warres. But there was a respite taken for the full concluding and assuring of these conditions, till the octaues of All saints, that king Richard might vnderstand the emperours pleasure, without whose consent he might not conclude any thing concerning that matter, because he had sent such word vnto him by the lord chancellor, who at this time was attendant in his court.

In the meane time, the emperor being aduertised of the whole matter, and of the articles aforesaid mentioned, gaue knowledge to king Richard by the bishop of Elie at his returning backe, that this forme of peace nothing liked him, but rather made discredit to his discontentment: the which least he might seeme to saie without sufficient ground of reason, he alledged, that it should sound to king Richards dishonour, if he surrendered and gaue by any thing that he had not in possession. And to encourage him to recover those things which had bene taken from him, the emperor pardoned him of the seven thousand marks of siluer, which yet remained behind due to him for the kings ransom. Whosoever the matter passed, the two kings met not in the octaues of All saints, according to the appointment, although they were come, and approached verie nere to the place where they should haue communed together: but through the dissimulation of the French men, they departed, without seeing one another, and immediately began the warres fiercelie as at any time before.

The French king took the towne of Diep, which king Richard had lately repaired, and burned it, with the ships that harbored in the haven: after this, coming to Faldun, he took the towne and besieged the castell. But king Richard aduertised thereof, came with quick speed (making of these daies iourne but one) and entred into the castell of Faldun to defend the same against his aduersaries: and forthwith there resorted such numbers of men vnto him, when they heard how he was besieged, that the French king doubting how to retire from thence in safetie, made suit first to haue licence to depart, and after when that would not be granted, he required at the leastwise to talke with the king of England about some agreement.

Wherevnto king Richard condescended, and so coming together, they concluded vpon a truce to indure from that date, being saturday next after the feast of saint Nicholas, vnto the feast of saint Hilarie next ensuing, and then to meet againe nere vnto Louiers with their counsels, that they might grow by some reasonable way vnto a final peace and concord. And according to this article, shortly after the same feast of saint Hilarie, they met at Louiers, where finally they were accorded to conclude a peace on these conditions, that the French king should release to the king of England Faldun, with the countrie about, won by him sith the beginning of these wars; likewise, all the right which he had in Berrie, Annergine, and Gascoigne, and the countie of Albemarle. On the other part, the king of England should resigne Cisors, and certeine other places, and namelie Meurine or Menquesne vnto the king of France.

Herevpon were suerties also bound for performance, and the forfeiture of sixtene thousand marks assigned to be paid by the partie that first brake the peace. Shortly after, the French king repenting himselfe of the agreement, began to make a warre anew, so that king Richard seized into his hands all the goods and possessions which belonged to the abbats of the order of the great monasterie of Clunie, and of saint Denise & la Charitie, which had become suertie for the French king in the summe of 1500 marks aforesaid. This yere died William de Forz earle of Albemarle, in whose place succeeded Baldwin de Betun by the kings gift, and married the countesse of Albemarle.

There was a motion also made for a marriage betwixt the lord Ethe, sonne to Henrie duke of Saroynie, king Richards nephue by his sister, and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Scots, so as they should haue inioined the countreies of Lothian, Northumberland, and the countie of Carleill with the castells. For the conclusion of which marriage, the archbishop of Canturburie was sent about Christinas to commune with the king of Scots: but because the Scottish queene was then conceiued of child, hir husband (in hope that God would send him a sonne) refused to stand vnto the aboue mentioned covenants.

The emperor dissuadeth the king from agreeing to the peace.

The abbat of Cen sent into England.

President serving in Cen.

At this time king Richard sent the abbat of Caen (who was also the elect of Durham) into England, to take an accompts of those that had the receipts of the kings monie: for this abbat had informed the king, that his receivers and officers here in the realme dealt not iustlie in making their accompts, but both deceived the king, and oppressed his people, in crating more than was due, and concealing that which they ought to stand accomptable for. The king supposing his words to be true, or at least likeli so to be, and that in reforming such vnttruth in his officers, it should be both profitable to him, and well liked of the people, sent this abbat ouer with commission, to be as it were his generall auditour.

Wholobest, Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, which was gouernour of the realme in causes both temporall and spirittuall (by reason he had the kings authoritie as his vicegerent, & therefore sufficientlie countenanced, & also the popes as his legat authorisied) did somewhat stomach the matter, in that it should be thought he did suffer such abuses in the kings officers, and not reforme them. But he held him content and said little, with the abbat thelved him the kings commission to do that which he went about, although he brought it not to passe. For where as he came ouer in lent, and gaue out commandements, that all such as had any thing to do in receipt of the kings monie, should appeare before him after Easter, he tarried not to see Easter himselfe, but was called into another world by the stroke of death, there to render accompts for his owne acts here in this life committed.

At the same time there was another person in London called William with the long beard (alias Fitz Albert) which had likewise informed the king of certeine great oppressions and excessive outrages used by rich men against the poore (namelie the worshipfull of the citie, the Mayor and Aldermen) who in their housings, when any tallage was to be gathered, burdened the poore further than was thought reason, to ease themselves; whereupon the said William being a seditious person, and of a buisie nature, ceased not to make complaints. Now because the king gaue care vnto him at the first, he took a boldnesse thereof, & drawing vnto him great routs of the poore sort of people, would take vpon him to defend the causes of those that found themselves graued with the heauie yoke of richmen and gentlemen. He was somewhat learned, and verie eloquent: he had also a verie good wit, but he applied it rather to set dissention betwixt the high estates and the low, than to anie other good purpose. He accused also his owne brother of treason, who in his youth had kept him to schole, & bene verie good and beneficiall brother vnto him, because now he would not will mainteine him with monie to beare out his riotous port. Moreover, he declared to the king, that by extortion and bribery of certeine men of great wealth, he lost manie forfeits and estates.

Manie gentlemen of honour sore hated him for his presumptuous attempts to the hindring of their purposes: but he had such comfort of the king, that he little passed for their malice, but kept on his intent, till the king being aduertised of the assemblies which he made, commanded him to cease from such doings, that the people might fall againe to their sciences and occupations, which they had for the more part left off, at the instigation of this William with the long beard, so named of the long beard of his beard, which he nourished of purpose to seme the more graue and manlike, and also as it were in despite of them which counterfeited the Normans (that were for the most part shauen) and because he would resemble the ancient visage of the English nation. The kings commandement in restraint of the peoples resort vnto him, was well kept a while, but it was not long yer they began to follow him againe as they had done before.

Then he took vpon him to make vnto them certeine collations or sermons, taking for his theme, Haurietis aquas in gaudio de fontibus saluatoris, that is to saie: Ye shall draw in gladnesse waters out of the founteins of your sauour. And hereto he added, I am (said he) the sauour of poore men; ye be the poore, and haue assailed the hard hands and beaue burdens of the rich: now draw ye therefore the healthfull waters of vnderstanding out of my welles and springs, and that with ioy. For the time of your visitation is come: I shall part waters from waters, by waters I vnderstand the people, and I shall part the people which are good and meke, from the people that are wicked and proud, and I shall disceuer the good and euill, euen as light is diuided from darkenesse.

By these and such persuasions and means as he used, he had gotten two and fiftie thousand persons, readie to haue taken his part, as appeared after by a roll of their names found in his keeping, besides diuerse instruments of iron to breake by houses, and other things seruing to such like purposes. So that he brought the commoners into a great liking of him: but the rich and wealthie citizens stood in much feare, so that they kept their houses, in armes, in doubt to be robbed and murthred by him in the night season.

The archbishop of Canturburie (vnto whome the rule of the realme chiefele belonged) being aduertised hereof, sent for the greatest number of the citizens, and vsing them with gentle words, perswaded them to deliuer pledges, the better to assure him, that no such thing should chance, which was suspected of manie, though he was loth to concele any such opinion of them. They being overcome with his courteous words, gaue vnto him pledges.

After this, when the foresaid William ceased not to make congregations of the people, at length the archbishop sent a commandement vnto him, that he should appeare before him and other of the counsell, at a certeine prefixed date, to answer to such things as might be laid to his charge. To be short, he did so at the time appointed, but with such a rout of the common people about him, that the archbishop durst not pronounce against him, but licenced him to depart for that time, giving him soft and gentle words. Wholobest, certeine persons were then appointed by the said archbishop and other of the counsell to watch him sometime, when he should haue no great companie about him, and then to apprehend him.

Amongst those that were thus commanded to attach him, were two burgesses of the citie, who hauing espied a conuenient time for the execution of their purpose, set vpon him to haue taken him, but he getting an ar, defended himselfe manfully: and in resisting slue one of them, and after that fled into the church of S. Marie Bow, keeping the same not as a place of sanctuarie, but as a fortresse: in somuch that by the helpe of such as resorted vnto him, he defended it against his aduersaries, till with fire and smoke they constrained him to come forth, and all those that were there with him: amongst them also was his concubine, who neuer left him for any danger that might betide him.

The people regarding the danger of their pledges, came not out to aid him, as it was much doubted they would haue done. Wherefore being thus attached, he was brought forth, and conuined out of the church, the sonne of that burgesse whome he had slaine (as you haue heard) strake him verie sore into the bellie with a knife, in reuenge of his fathers death.

death. After this, he was had to his arraignment before the archbishop, sitting within the towre, and being condemned, was from thence dravone with horses to the place of execution called the Elmes, and there hanged on a gibet, with nine of his adherents, which had defended the church against the kings power: and yet for all this, the grudge ceased not, but the common people raised a great slander upon the archbishop, both for causing him to be taken out of the church, where he claimed privilege of sanctuarie, and also for putting him to death, who was innocent (as they alledged) and not guilty of those crimes that were laid against him: who sought onelie the defence of poore people against extortioners, and such as were wrong doers.

This rumour rose so fast, that at length (by buying abroad, that certeine miracles should be wrought by a chaine, wherein he was bound in time of his imprisonment) he was taken for a saint. The place also where he suffered, was visited by women, and other superstitious folks, as a plot of great holinesse, till at length the archbishop caused it to be watched, to the end that no such foolishnesse should be bled there. In fine, the opinion which the people had thus fondlie conceivd of his vertue and innocencie, was by little and little remoued out of their heads, when his acts were more certeinly published: as the cleaving of a man with his owne hands, and the using of his conceivd within Bowe church, during the time of his being there. Also the archbishop accused a priest, which had first brought by the false report and fained fable of the miracle wrought by the chaine, whereby the occasion of idolatrie was first giuen, and might easilie haue bene continued, if the archbishop had not bene the wisser man, and by such means repressed the rumour. ¶ So that we are to note by this example the force of counterfeit holinesse and feigned harmelesnesse in hypocrits,

But now to returne unto the doings of king Richard in France. We haue heard how a peace was concluded (as some haue written) but the same continued not long: for the French king seeming to repent himselfe of that he had done (as is aforesaid) broke the peace, and raising a power, besieged Albemarle, at length wan it, and rased it downe to the ground, then king Richard gaue vnto him three thousand marks of siluer for the ranfome of his knights and peomen, or demilances (as I may call them) that were taken in that fortesse. After this, the French king wan Pouencourt, and earle John toke the castell of Camages.

The erle doine of Poitou.

John Bou-chet his doubt.

About the same time also king Richard gaue vnto his nephew Otho the earledome of Poitou. Which I haue thought good to note out of Roger Houeden, to remoue the doubt of John Bouchet, who in the third part of his annales of Aquitaine, martelleth at an old panchart or record which he had seene, by the tenour wherof it appeared, that this Otho in-tuled himselfe duke of Aquitaine and earle of Poicton, being in his castell of Monstrecoulbon in nere to Poitiers, in the yeare a thousand, one hundredth, ninethie nine, in presence of Gessrey de Lusigney, and others, and granted vnto a certeine person the office of putting the monie in the mint of that towne, as by the same panchart it further appeareth.

The sight wherof brought the said Bouchet into a great perplexitie, considering that no chronicle which he had either seene, or heard of, made mention of any Otho that shuld be duke of Aquitaine, or erle of Poitou, either before that time, or after. Where again it was euident to him, that queene Elianor the mother of king Richard, as then liuing, named hir selfe dutchesse of Aquitaine, and countesse of Poitou; & likewise king Richard intituled himselfe duke of Aquitaine, and earle of Poitou, euer after he had fianced the earle of Barcelons daughter, as by diuerse records both of the mother and the sonne he had seene perfect notice. At length yet he gesseth (and that trulie) that it should be this Otho, to whom the mother and sonne had assigned the dutchie of Aquitaine and countie of Poitou, for the maintenance of his estate, he holding the same till the yeare 1199, in the which he was made emperor by king Richards good helpe, as after shall be shewed more at large.

About this time also as the countesse of Britaine, the mother of duke Arthur came into Normandie to haue spoken with king Richard, Ranulph earle of Chester hir husband meeting hir at Mountourson, toke hir as prisoner, and shut hir by within his castell at St. James de Beumeron: and when hir sonne Arthur could not find means to deliuer hir out of captiuitie, he ioined with the king of France, and made great hauoche in the lands of his vnckle king Richard, whereupon the king gathered a mightie armie, and inuading Britaine with great force, cruel-lie waiked and destroyed the countrie.

Here is also to be noted, that in this seventh yeare of king Richard, a great dearth chanced through this realme of England, and in the coasts about the same.
Also about the same time died William earle of Salisburie, the sonne of earle Patrike, whose daughter and heire king Richard gaue in marriage, together with the earledome of Salisburie, vnto his hals brother, surnamed Long Espé.

It chanced moreover about the same time, that earle John the kings brother, with certeine cap-teins of such hired souldiours as some call Brabanceni; others, the Routz; and the French histories name them Costereaux, or Coterels, went abroad to at-tchue some enterpryse against the bishop of Beaunois, and other Frenchmen, which had done much hurt to king Richards subiects in those parties. The chefe leaders of those Routz or Costereaux, which went forth with earle John, and serued vnder him at that time, were two Breuanois, Marchades & Lupescaro. These riding forth into the countrie about Beauuois, made hauoche in robbing and spoiling all afore them.

Anon as Philip the bishop of Beauuois, a man more giuen to the campe than to the church, had knowledge hereof, thinking them to be a meet preie for him, with sir William de Berlow and his sonne, and a great number of other valliant men of warre, came forth into the felds, and encountering with the enimies, fought verie hotlie. But yet in the end the bishop, the archdeacon, and all the chiefe capteins were taken: the residue flaine and chased. After this, earle John and the foresaid capteins passed forth, and wan the towne of Millie, and so returned.

Earle John and Marchades presented the two prelats with great trining, vnto is. Richard earle in the morning, lieng yet in his bed, as those that were knotone to be his great enimies, saing to him in French; Kise Richard, rise, we haue gotten the great chantour of Beauuois, and a good quier man (as we take it) to answer him in the same note, and here we deliuer them vnto you to vse at your discretion. The king seing them, smiled, and was verie glad for the taking of this bishop, for that he had neuer found him his great aduersarie: and therefore being thus taken fighting in the feld with armour on his backe, thought he might be bold in tempo: all tosse to chastise him: sith he (not regarding his calling) practised to make him with tempo: all weapons: where-

It chanced some after, that two of his chaplains came unto the king to Rouen, where this bishop was detained, beseeching the king of licence to attend upon their maister now in captiuitie: unto whom (as it is of some reported) the king made this answer; I am content to make you iudges in the cause betwixt me and your maister, as for the euils which he hath either done, either else gone about to do vnto me, let the same be forgotten. This is true, that I being taken as I returned from my iourne made into the holie land, and deliuered into the emperours hands, was in respect of my kinglie state, vsed according thereto berie frendlie and honourable, till your maister comming thither (for what purpose he himselfe best knoweth) had long conference with the emperour. After which, I for my part in the next morning tasted the fruit of their ouernights talke, being then laden with as manie irons as a god ass might not berie easilie haue borne. Iudge you therefor, what manner of imprisonment your maister desired at my hands, that procured such ease for me at the emperours hands.

The two chaplains had their mouths stopped with these words thus by the king uttered, and so departed their waies. The bishop being still detained in prison, procured suit to be made to the pope for his deliuerance: but the pope, being truelie informed of the matter, and wiselie considering that the king had not taken the bishop preaching, but fighting, and kept him prisoner rather as a rough enimie, than as a peaceable prelat, would not be earnest with the king for his deliuerance, but rather reprobued the bishop, in that he had preferred secular warfare before the spirituall, and had taken upon him the vse of a speare in stead of a crosse, an helmet in stead of a mitre, an herbergeon in stead of a white rochet, a target for a scole, and an iron sword in lieu of the spirituall sword: and therefore he refused to vse any commandement to king Richard for the setting of him at libertie. But yet he promised to do what he could by waie of intreating, that he might be released.

It is reported by some writers, that the pope at first, not vnderstanding the truth of the whole circumstance, should send to king Richard, commanding him by force of the canons of the church to deliuer his sons the bishop and archdeacon out of their captiuitie. To whom the king sent their armour with this message written in Latine, Vide an tunica filij tui sit an non, that is, See whether these are the garments of thy sonnes or not: alluding to the saying of those that caried Iosephs coate to Jacob. Which when the pope saw, he said: Paie by S. Peter, it is neither the apparell of my sonnes, nor yet of my brethren: but rather they are the vestures of the children of Hars: and so he left them still to be ransomed at the kings pleasure. The bishop thus seeing no hope to be deliuered without some agreement had betwixt the two kings, became now through sickness of his bonds, an earnest mediatour for peace, whereas before he had bene an extreme stirrer vp of war. Such a scholemaster is imprisonment, & plucker downe of lostie courages. But to proceed.

About the same time the archbishop of Rouen put all the countie of Normandie vnder sentence of interdiction, because king Richard had begun to fortifie a castell at Lisle Dandelle, vpon a peece of ground which the archbishop claimed to appertene vnto his see. The matter was brought before the pope, who perceiving the intent of king Richard was not otherwise grounded vpon any couetous purpose to defraude the church of hir right, but onlie to build a fortreffe in such place as was most expedient for defense of the countie about, to preserve it from invasion of the enimies; he counselled the archbishop not to stand against the king in it, but to exchange with him for some other lands: which was done, and the interdiction by the pope released. The bishop of Cle lord chancellor, being sent about this businesse towards Rome, departed this life by the way at Poitiers, in Januarie.

The bishop of Cle departed this life.

But the bishops of Durham & Liscie that were sent with him, passed forward, and comming to Rome, informed the pope of the matter, who took order with the bishops (as before is mentioned.) The king gaue to the church in Rouen in recompense, his milles which he had in Rouen, so that the said church should paie the almes of old time appointed to be giuen for the same. He gaue to the said church likewise the towne of Diepe, and the towne of Bussels, so that the church should likewise paie the almes assigned forth of the same, being the summe of 372 pounds of Antouine monie: also the manour of Louers, and the forrest of Alermound with the dore and the appurtenances. But now to other doings.

About the same time, or not long before, whereas there had bene long contention betwixt the kings of England, and the earles of S. Giles for the earldome of Tholouse, king Richard by way of alliance fell now at an appointment with the earle Raimond that held those lands: for whereas the countesse Constance wife to the said Raimond earle of Tholouse and aunt to king Philip was now departed this life, king Richard concluded a mariage betwene the said earle and his sister Joane queene of Sicile, sometime wife to William king of Sicile, so that being thus ioined in alliance with the said earle of Tholouse on the one side, he procured a league also with Baldwin earle of Flanders on the other, vnto whom he gaue five thousand markes in reward, vpon condition, that he should couenant not to grow to any agreement with the French king without his consent. Likewise Reginold the earle of Bolongne, that was sonne to the earle of Chasteau Martine, allied himselfe with them against the French king, and so did Baldwin earle of Guines with diuerse other.

Thus king Richard by such alliance hauing his part greatlie strengthened, prepared himselfe to the warre more earnestlie than before, and took order with the earle of Flanders, that they should inuade the French dominions in two seuerall quarters both at one time, as the earle by Flanders, & he himselfe by Normandie, according to the appointment betwixt them deuised. The earle preparing an armie, first wan the towne of Dowlaie, and then besieged saint Omers, and wan it after five weekes siege: whereupon they of Aire yielded to him; shortly after he entred into Artois, & besieged the citie of Arras.

At the same time king Richard marching towards Gisors, wan in his waie the castell of Cozelles, & destroyed it; that done, he came to Gisors, and besieged the towne, waiking all the countie round about him where he came. The French king being thus troubled with the invasion of his enimies in two seuerall places at one present time, sent certaine bands of his souldiours towards Arras to keepe the earle of Flanders plaie, whilst he himselfe went against king Richard: and comming vnto Gisors, found it already besieged of the same king, so that he wist not well how to enter the towne. But yet at length fainting to giue battell to king Richard (who vpon desire to receiue it, came abroad into the field) the French king rushed forth with all his whole force to make towards the towne, & so got into it, though not without great losse and damage of his people.

taken prisoner

It chanced, that in a skirmish Hugh de Chamouant was taken prisoner, one that was of the French kings priuie counsell, and king Richard appointed him to the keeping of Robert Ros, who charged one of his seruants named William de Spinie with the custodie of him. But the said Hugh corrupting his keeper the foresaid William with rewards, (whereof it is said, king Philip, after that the king of England was removed from Gisors (as before ye haue heard) assembled a great host, and with banner displayed, entred into Normandie, and wasted the countrie from Deuoburge to Beaumont le Rogier, and that done, returned into France, licencing his men to returne vnto their homes. About the same time, he sent vnto king Richard, requiring him to appoint five champions, and he would appoint other five for his part, which might fight in lists, for triall of all matters in controuersie betwixt them, so to auoid the shedding of more gillelesse blood. King Richard accepted the offer, with condition, that either king might be of the number, that is, the French king one of the five vpon the French part; & R. Richard one of the five vpon the English part. But this condition would not be granted. Whereupon, when shortly after it was signified to king Richard, that ships vnto come out of England to saint Valerie with victuals, which were sold and conuied awaie vnto the French & other his enemies, he rode to saint Valeries, and set the towne on fire, and such ships of England as he found there he also burnt, and hanged the mariners by the necke, diuiding the graine and other victuals which were found in the same ships amongst his owne souldiers.

About the same time he got the fauour of them of Champaigne and of the Bistons, and William Crespine also was constrained to deliuer vnto him the castell of Auge, but the French king recovered it by siege, whilst king Richard entring into Aluer, gne wan diuerse castells there, to the number of ten out of king Philips hands. In the meane time the earle of Flanders made fore warre against the French king for his part, and training the same king within streits, so that he was almost inclosed on eche side, he constrained him to agree to such composition as pleased the same earle to appoint, but afterwards the French king refused to stand to the covenants of that agreement, and so the warre continued betwixt them as before.

At length king Richard and the French king concluded vpon an abstinence of warre to indure from the feast of S. Hilarie for one whole yere, purposing in the meane time to make a finall peace and agreement. In which season Baldwin earle of Flanders came into England to do his deuotions vnto the shrine where Thomas the archbishop laie buried at Canturburie. The same yeare also somewhat before this time, Rife ap Griffin king of Wales departed this life, after whose death there fell discorde betwixt his sonnes for the succession; till the archbishop Hubert went to the marches of that countrie and made an agreement betwixt them. Not long after, Roger the brother of Robert earle of Leicester, elected bishop of saint Andrews in Scotland, received the order of priesthood, and was consecrated bishop by the hands of the bishop of Aberdine.

This yeare it was ordeined that measures of all manner of graine should containe one quantitie throughout the realme, that is to saie, one resonable hogsheade, and that the measures of wine and ale with all maner of liquors should be of one iust quantitie according to the diuersitie of the liquor: also that weights should be of like rate throughout the realme, and that cloth should containe two yards in breadth within the lists, of perfect goodnesse throughout, as well in the middest as by the sides, and that one manner of yard should be vnto throughout the realme. It was also ordeined that no merchants within the realme should hang any red or blacke clothes before their windowes, nor set vp any pentises or other thing whereby to darken the light from those that come to buy their cloth, so as they might be deceiued in choosing thereof.

Also it was enacted that there should be foure or six substantiall honest men chosen in euerie towne, and likewise in shires, with the head officers of cities and boroughes, which had a corporation, to see that the assises aforesaid were truelie kept, and that if any were found to be offending in the premises, to cause their bodies to be attached and committed to prison, and their goods to be seized to the kings vse: and if those that were chosen to haue regard thereto, were tried to be negligent, so that by others, and not by them any offenders chanced to be conuicted before the iustices, then should the regarders be put to their fines, for the negligent looking to their offices.

King Richard held his Christmasse this yeare at Roan, and Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie legat of the apostolike see, named lord chiefe iustice of England, was about the same time in the marches of Wales at Hereford, and there receiued into his hands the castells of Hereford, Wigornoth and Ludlow, removing those that had the same in keeping, and appointing others in their comes. Afterwards comming by Couentrie, he placed the monks againe in the cathedrall church of that citie, by commandement of pope Celestine, and chased out the secular canons, which the bishop Hugh Pouant had brought into the same church when he removed the monks.

In the Christmasse weeke also there came messengers to Rouen from the archbishops of Cullen and Pentz, and from other states of the empire, which declared vnto king Richard, that all the princes of Germanie were appointed to assemble at Cullen, the two & twentieth of Februarie, about the choosing of a new emperor, in place of the late deceased Henrie: and therefore they commanded him by force of the oth and league in which he was bound to the emperor and empire, that all excuse of default or occasions to the contrarie ceasing and set apart, he should make his repaire vnto Cullen at the aforesaid day, to helpe them in choosing of some worthy personage that might and was able to haue the empire. King Richard doubting to put himselfe in danger, because he had not discharged all the debts due for his ransome, staied at home, but yet he sent diuerse noble men thither, and did so much in fauour of his nephue Edmo, that by the helpe of the foresaid two archbishops of Cullen and Pentz, the same Edmo was was elected emperor. But of this matter more shall be said hereafter.

Moreover, about the same time king Richard required by the archbishop of Canturburie his chiefe iustice, an aid of 300 knights to be found by his subjects of England, to remaine with him in his seruice for one whole yeare, or else that they would giue him so much monie, as might serue to retaine that number after the rate of three shillings a date of English monie for euerie knight. Whereas all other were contented to be contributors herein, onelie Hugh bishop of Lincolne refused, and spake sore against the archbishop that moued the matter. But how soeuer that request toke place, king Richard (as we haue leued this yeare a subsidie of five shillings of euerie hide of land within the realme, two commissiouners, that is to say, one of the spiritualtie, & a knight of the temporaltie, being appointed as commissiouners in euerie shire, with the assistance of the shiriffe, and others, to see the same assessed & rated after an hundred acres of land to the hide of land, according to the custome.

The same yeare also the monks of the house of the holie Trinitie, otherwise called Gyssies church in Canturburie, exhibited their complaint vnto pope Innocent, that their archbishop Hubert (contrarie to his order and dignitie) exercised the office of high iustice, and sat in iudgement of blood, being so incumbered in temporall matters, that he could not haue time to discharge his office touching spiritual causes: whereupon the pope sent vnto king Richard, admonishing him not to suffer the said archbishop to be any longer troubled with temporall affaires, but to discharge him thereof, and not to admit any spiritual person from thenceforth vnto any temporall administration.

He further prohibited by vertue of their obedience, all manner of prelates and men of the church, that they should not presume rashlie to take vpon them any manner of secular function or office. Whereupon the archbishop was discharged of his office of chiefe iustice, and Geoffrey Fitz Peter succeeded in gouernement of the realme in his stead. ¶ Geruasiu Dorobernensis saith; that the archbishop resigned that office of his owne accord, and that not till after his returne from the marches of Wales, where he had overthrowne the Welchmen, and slaine five thousand of them. Which victorie other ascribe vnto Geoffrey Fitz Peter, which Geoffrey (as the said Dorobernensis saith) succeeded the archbishop in the office of lord chiefe iustice, but not vntill August, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne.

In this yeare, immediatlie vpon the expiring of the truce which was taken till harvest might be ended, the warre betwixt the two kings of England & France began effionces to be pursued with like earnestnesse as before: whereupon manie encounters chanced betwixt the parties, with taking of townes and fortresses, as commonlie in such cases it happeneth. Twise the French king was put to the worse, once in September betwixt Camages and Vernon, where he was diuinc to saue himselfe by flight, losing twentie knights, and threescore seruitors or poomen, which were taken, besides those that were slaine: and againe, in the same moneth on Michaelmasse euen betwixt Carseilles and Silors, at what time he came to succour Carseilles, bringing with him 400 knights, besides seruitors, and a great multitude of commons. But the castell was wane before he could approach it.

King Richard being aduertised of his coming, hasted forth to meet him, and giuing the onset vpon him, forced him to flee vnto Silors, where at the entering of the bridge there was such preece, that the bridge brake, so that amongst other, the king himselfe with his hoille and all fell into the riuer of Ceth, and with much adoe was releued, and got out of the water, no small number of right hardie and valiant gentlemen being taken at the same time, which put themselves forward to staie the Englishmen, till the king was recouered out of that present danger. To conclude, there were taken to the number of an hundred knights, and two hundred barbed horses, besides seruitors on horsebacke, and footmen with crossbowes. Amongst other prisoners these are named, Mattheu de Pontmoiancie, Gales de Ports, Follen de Bray, and manie other also innumerable. King Richard hauing got this victorie, wrote letters thereof vnto the archbishops, bishops, abbats earles and barons of his realme, that they might praise God for his good successe.

¶ A notable example to all princes that haue the conquest ouer their enemies, to referre the happie getting thereof to God, and to giue praise vnto him who giueth victorie vnto whom it pleaseth him. Which the psalmograph saith verie well, and therefore ascribed all the issue of his prosperous affaires to God, as may well be noted by his words, saleng expresselie, Ad fera qui digitos instruit arma meos.

How will we staie the proceedings of the king of France at this time, and make no further relation thereof for a while, till we haue touched other things that happened in England at the same season. And first ye shall vnderstand, that Hugh Wardolfe, Roger Arundell, and Geoffrey Basset, to whom as iustices, the counties of Lincolne, Nottingham, Worke, Derby, Northumberland, Westmerland, Cumberland, and Lancaster were appointed for circuits, held not onelie plesses of assises, and of the crowne, but also toke inquisitions of escheats, and forfeitures of all manner of transgressions, and of donations of benefices, of marriages of widowes and maids, and other such like things as appertained to the king, whereby any aduantages grew to his vse, the which for tediousnesse we passe ouer. These things were straightlie looked vnto, not without the disquieting of manie.

Herewith came an other trouble in the necke of this former, to diuerse persons within the realme, through inquisitions taken by the iustices of the foresters: for Hugh Penill, Hugh Maley, and Heruissus Penill, appointed iustices itinerants in that case, were commanded by the king to call before them archbishops, bishops, earles, barons, knights, and freeholders, with the reue, and four of the substantiall men of euerie towne or village, to heare and take knowledge of the kings commandement, touching the ordinances of foresters, the which were verie straight in sundrie points, so that whereas before those that offended in killing of the kings deere were punished by the purse, now they should lose their eyes and genitals, as the lawe was in the daies of king Henrie his grandfather: and those that offended in cutting downe woods or bushes, or in digging and deluing bp of turues and cloads, or by any other manner of waie made wasse and destruction in woods or grassie, or spoile of venison, within the precinct of the foresters, contrarie to order, they should be put to their fines.

He gaue commandement also, that it should be lawfull to the foresters to take and put vnder arrest, as well preests and those of the cleargie, as temporall men, being found offenders in forester grounds and chales. Manie other ordinances were decreed touching the preservation of foresters, and the kings prerogative, rogative, advantages and profits rising and growing by the same, as well for saving of his woods and walls, as in pannage and agistments, greatlie to the restraint of them that might vsurpe or incroch upon the grounds within the compasse of his forreins.

Ye haue heard before, how the monks of Canturburie did send to exhibit a complaint to the pope, for that their archbishop toke upon him to deale in exercise of matters belonging to a temporall man, and not to such a one as had rule ouer the spiritualtie: but this was not the cause that did grieue them so much, as that he went forward with the erection of that church at Lameth, which his predecessor archbishop Baldwine had first begun at Haketon, now called S. Stephens (as before ye haue heard) and after was diuinen through the importunate suit of the monks to leaue off, and race that which he had there begun, to obeye the popes pleasure: and after laid a new foundation at Lameth.

The monks of Canturburie therefore still fearing least that church should greatlie prejudice such rights and liberties, as they pretended, namlie in the election of their archbishop, would neuer rest, but still complained and followed their suit in most obstinate maner in the court of Rome, as well in the daies of the said Baldwine, as now against Hubert, (when he toke in hand to continue the worke according to the purpose of his predecessor the said Baldwine, which was to haue instituted a colledge there, and to haue placed secular canons in the same) and such was the earnest trauell of the monks herein, that in the end now after the deceasse of pope Celestine, they found such fauour at the hands of pope Innocent his successor, that the same Innocent directed his letters of comendement to the archbishop, and other bishops of this land, to despoile and race the same foundation, as a peece of worke derogatorie to the see of Canturburie, and verie prejudiciall to the estate of holie church.

The archbishop at the first trusted to be borne out by the king (who was highlie offended with the monks for their presumptuous dealing) and therefore refused to obeye the popes comendement. The king in deed stomached the matter so highlie, that he sent letters vnto the monks by no worse messengers than by Geoffrey Fitz Peter, and Hugh Fitz War-dolfe his iustices, signifieng to them not onelie his high displeasure for their presumptuous proceedings in their suit without his consent, but also commanding them to surceasse, and not to proceed further in the matter by vertue of any such the popes letters, which they had purchased contrarie to the honour and dignitie of his crowne and realme. Moreouer, he wrote to the bishops, commanding them to appeale; and to the archbishop, forbidding him in any wise to breake downe the church which he had so builded at Lameth.

The shirffe of Kent also was commanded to seise into his hands all the tenements and possessions that belonged to the monks (a frie of faten, and as one saith verie well of them and the like leuen of letwinnesse, —sentina malorum,

A quorum sub pelle lupi, mercede colentes who neuertheless were so stout in that quarell, that they would not prolong one daie of the time appointed by the pope for the racing of that church. Whereupon the king for his part and the bishops in their owne behalves wrote to the pope. Likewise the abbats of Boreley, Fford, Stratford, Roberts-bridge, Stan-leic, and Wasing Clarke, wrote the matter to him: and againe the pope and the cardinals wrote to the king, to the archbishops, and bishops: and so letters passed to and fro, till at length the pope sent a Nuncio of purpose, to signifie his full determination, as in the next yeare it shall be shewed at full.

About the same time Geoffrey Fitz Peter, lord chiefe iustice of England, raised a power of men, and went into Wales to succour the tenants of William de Brause, which were besieged of the king, or rather prince of that countrie, named Owien, the brother of Cadwalaine, in Hauds castell: but the lord chiefe iustice comming to the rescue of them within, gaue battell to the aduersaries, and vanquishing them, slew three thousand of them, and seauen hundred of those that were taken prisoners and wounded. And all the while the warres continued in France, the losse for the most part still rebounded to the Frenchmen. Earle John burnt Petoburg, and toke eightene knights of such as were sent to the rescue.

The earle of Leicester with a small companie came before the castell of Bascie, which (although the Frenchmen held it) did yet of right belong vnto the said earle. The souldiours within issued forth, and being too strong for the earle, caused him to flee, for otherwise he had bene taken. But returning on the morrow after with more companie about him, and laieing ambushes for the enimie, he approached the said castell, and trained the Frenchmen forth till he had them within his danger, and then causing his men to breake out upon them toke an eightene knights, and a great multitude of other people. Also Marchades with his rout of Habanders did the Frenchmen much hurt, in robbing and spoiling the countries.

About this season the archbishop of Canturburie went ouer into Normandie to speake with king Richard, and at the French kings request he passed into France, to common with him of peace, which the French king offered to conclude, in restoring all the towne and castels which he had taken (Citoies onelie excepted) and touching the possession and title thereof, he was contented to put the matter in compromise, to the order and award of six barons in Normandie to be named by him; and of six barons in France which king Richard should name. But king Richard would not thus agree, except the earle of Flanders and others which had forsaken the French king to take his part, might be compysed in the same peace. At length yet in November, there was truce taken betwixt the two kings till the feast of S. Hilarie next ensuing.

In the meane time pope Innocent the third, understanding in what present danger things stood in the holie land, and on the other side, considering what a weakening it was vnto christendome, to haue these two kings thus to warre with mortall hatred one against the other: he thought it stood him vpon to trauell betwixt them, to bring them vnto some peace and agreement. Whereupon he dispatched one Peter the cardinall of Capua into France, as legat from the see of Rome, vnto the two foresaid kings, to instruct them in what present danger the state of the christians in Asia presentlie stood, so that without the aid of them and of other christian princes, it could not be holpen, but needs it must come to better ruine, and the Saracens yer long to be possessed of the whole. Therefore both in respect hereof, and also for the avoiding of the further wilfull spilling of christian blood in such ciuill and vngodlie war, he brought them to state their hands, and to loine in some friendly band of concord, whereby they might with mutual consent bestow their seruice in that necessarie and most godlie warre, wherein by ouercomming the enimies of Christ, they might looke for worthie reward reward at his hands, which is the free giver of all victories.

The cardinall comming into France, and doing his message in most earnest wise, was present at the enteruicly appointed betwixt the two kings in the feast of S. Hilarie, but yet could not he bring his purpose to full effect: onelie he procured them to take truce for the terme of five yeares, further he could not get them to agree. ¶ The fault by authors is ascribed also to king Richard, as to king Philip: for king Richard being first euill used, and put to hindrance, determined either to vanquish, or neuer to give place.

This forbearance from warre was concluded and taken in the yeare 1199 after the incarnation, and tenth of king Richards reigne. But immediatlie after, there arose matter of new displeasure betwixt these two kings to keepe their minds in the with secret grudges, though by reason of the truce they outwardlie abstained from declaring it by force of armes. It chanced that in the election of a new emperor, the electors could not agree, one part of them choosing Otho duke of Saronie, nephew to king Richard by his sister Maund, and another part of them naming Philip duke of Lusaine, and brother to the last emperor Henrie.

King Richard (as reason was) did procure that fauour he could to the furtherance of his nephew Otho: and king Philip on the contrarie part, did what he could in fauour of the foresaid Philip. At length Otho was admitted by the pope to end the strife: but yet the grudge remained in the hearts of the two kings; Philip finding himselfe much grieved in that he had missed his purpose, and Richard being as little pleased, for that he had wonne his so hardlie, and with so much adoe. And thus matters passed for that yeare.

In the beginning of the next, the popes Nuncio came with letters, not onlie to the archbishop and bishops of England, but also to the king himselfe, signifying the popes resolute decre touching the church and colledge of Lameth to be broken downe and suppressed. Whereupon the king and archbishop (though sore against their willes) when they saw no waie longer to shift off the matter, yelded to the popes pleasure: and so the archbishop sent his letters to Lameth, where the 21 daie of Januarie they were read, and the 27 daie of the same moneth was the church cast downe, & the canons which were already there placed, had commandement to depart from thence without further delaye. Thus the monks in despite of the king and archbishop had their willes, but yet their veration ceased not, for the king and archbishop bearing them no small euill will, for that they had so obtained their purpose contrarie to their minds and intents, molested them diuerse waies, although the monks still upon complaint to the pope, were verie much releued, and found great friendship both with him and likewise with his court. ¶ So that it may be obserued that these disheulties of the popes kitchen haue in all ages, since their first quickening bene troublesome and mutinous, fatuall and insolent, proud and malapert. But

*Prohibitoribus tolerare potest ecclesia porcos,

In this meane time, king Richard being now at rest from troubles of warre, studied busilie to provide monie, meaning to make a new voyage into the holie land. Therefore finding himselfe bare of treasure, by reason the French warres had emptied his cofers, he set a great tax upon his subjects, and by that means, hauing recovered a great summe, he builded that notable strong castell in Normandie, upon the banke of the river of Saine, named Chateau Galiard: which when it was finished, he fell a telling thereat and said; Behold, is not this a faire daughter of one yeares growth. The soile where this castell was builded, belonged to the archbishop of Rouen, for which there followed great strife betwixt the king and the archbishop, till the pope took by the matter (as before ye haue heard.)

After this, he determined to chastise certeine persons in Poitou, which during the warres betwixt him and the French king, had aided the Frenchmen against him: whereupon with an armie he passed forth towards them, but by the waie he was informed, that one Vidomer a vicount in the countie of Britaine, had found great treasure: and therefore pretending a right thereto by vertue of his prerogative, he sent for the vicount, who smelling out the matter, and supposing the king would not be indifferent in parting the treasure, fled into Limosin, where although the people were tributaries to the king of England, yet they took part with the French king.

There is a towne in that countie called Chalus Chenerell, into which the said vicount retired for safeguard of himselfe, and then gaue the townemen a great portion of treasure, to the end they should defend him and his quarell for the rest. King Richard still following him, as one that could not auoid his fatall ordinance, haied into the confines of Limosin, fullie determining either to win the towne by force, if the inhabitants should make resistance, or at least wise, to get into his hands the preie, which he so earnestlie pursued. At his first approach he gaue manie fierce assaults to the towne, but they within hauing thoughtlie provided aforehand for to defend a siege, so resisted his attempts, that within three daies after his comming, he ceased to assaile the towne, meaning to undermine the walles, which otherwise he persecuted would verie hardlie be gotten, considering the stoutnesse of them within, and withall, the naturall strength and situation of the place it selfe.

Whereupon therefore on the 26 of March, whiles he (together with capteine Marchades) went about vnadvisedlie to bieto the towne (the better to consider the place which waie he might conuete the course of his mine) they came so farre within danger, that the king was striken in the left arme, or (as some write) in the shoulder, where it ioined to the necke, with a quarell inuenomed (as is to be supposed by the sequelle.) Being thus wounded, he gat to his horse, and rode home againe to his lodging, where he caused the wound to be searched and bound up, and as a man nothing dismayd therewith, continued his siege with such force and assurance, that within 12 daies after the mishap, the towne was yelded vnto him, although verie little treasure (to make any great account of) was at that time found therein.

In this meane season, the king had committed the cure of his wound to one of Marchades his surgeons, who taking in hand to plucke out the quarell, drew forth onelie the shaft at the first, and left the iron still within, and afterwards going about most vnskillfullie to get forth the head of the said quarell, he used such incisions, and so mangled the kings arme, per he could cut it, that he himselfe despaired of all helpe and longer life, affirming flatlie to such as stood about him, that he could not long continue by reason of his butcherlie handling. So he thought, feeling himselfe to war weaker and weaker, preparing his mind to death, which he perceived now to be at hand, he ordeined his testament, or rather reformed and added sundrie things vnto the same which he before had made, at the time of his going forth towards the holie land.

King Richard departed this life.

The vices that were in King Richard.

Unto his brother John he assigned the crowne of England, and all other his lands and dominions, causing the Nobles there present to sweare fealtie vnto him. His monie, his iewels, and all other his goods moueable he willed to be diuided into thre parts, of the which the emperor his sisters sonne to haue one, his household seruants an other part, and the third to be distributed to the poore. Finallie, remembering himselfe also of the place of his buriall, he commanded that his bodie should be interred at Fontenouard at his fathers feet, but he willed his heart to be conueied vnto Rouen, and there buried, in testimonie of the loue which he had euer borne vnto that citie for the stedfast faith and tried loialtie at all times found in the citizens there. His bowels he ordeined to be buried in Poitiers, as in a place naturallie vnthankfull and not worthe to retaine any of the more honorable parts of his bodie.

Moreouer he caused the archbailiff that wounded him, to be sought out, whose name was Bartholomew de Curden, or Peter Basill (for so he named himselfe as some write) who being brought before the king he demanded wherein he had so much offended him, that he should so lie in wait to slea him, rather than Archabades, who was then in his companie, and attendant on his person. The other answered boldly againe, saying; I purposed to kill thee, because thou sleest my father, and two of my brethren heretofore, and wouldest also now haue slaine me, if I had hapned to fall into thy hands. Wherefore I intended to reuenge their deaths, not caring in the meane time what became of my selfe, so that I might in anie wise obtaine my will of thee, who in such sort hast bereft me of my friends. The king hearkening vnto his words, and pondering his talke by good aduisement, freely pardoned him, and withall commanded that he should be set at libertie, and thereto haue an hundred shillings giuen him in his pursie, and so to be let go. Moreouer, he gaue strait charge that no man should hurt him, or seeke any reuenge for this his death hereafter. Thus the penitent prince not onlie forgau, but also rewarded his aduersarie. Whereafter his decesse, Archabades getting him into his hands, first caused the skin to be stripped of his bodie, and after hanged him on a gibet.

At length king Richard by force of sicknesse (increased with anguish of his incurable wound) departed this life, on the tuesday before Palmesundaye, being the ninth of Aprill, and the xi. day after he was hurt, in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 1199. in the 44 yeare of his age, and after he had reigned nine yeares, nine months, and od daies: he left no issue behind him. He was tall of stature, and well proportioned, faire and comelie of face, so as in his countenance appeared much fauour and grauitie, of haire bright aboue, as it were betwixt red and yellow, with long armes, and nimble in all his ioints, his thighes and legs were of due proportion, and answerable to the other parts of his bodie.

As he was comelie of personage, so was he of stomach more couragious and fierce, so that not without cause, he obtained the surname of Cueur de lion, that is to saie, The lions hart. Moreouer, he was courteous to his souldiours, and towards his friends and strangers that resorted vnto him verie liberall, but to his enemies hard and not to be intreated, desirous of battell, an enemy to rest and quietnesse, verie eloquent of speech and wise, but readie to enter into jeopardies, and that without feare or forecass in time of greatest perils.

These were his vertuous qualities, but his vices (if his vertues, his age, and the wars which he maintained were thoroughlie looked) were either none at all, or else few in number, and not verie notorious.

He was noted of the common people to be partlie subiect vnto pride, which surely for the most part followeth stoutnesse of mind: of incontinencie, to the which his youth might happlie be somewhat bent: and of couetousnesse, into the which insanie most captiues and such princes as commonlie followe the warres do oftentimes fall, when of necessitie they are diuened to exact monie, as well of friends as enemies, to mainteine the infinit charges of their wars.

10 Hereof it came, that on a time whiles he sojourned in France about his warres, which he held against King Philip, there came vnto him a French priest whose name was Fulco, who required the King in any wise to put from him thre abominable daughters which he had, and to bestow them in marriage, least God punished him for them. Thou liest hypocrite (said the king) to thy verie face, for all the world knoweth that I haue not one daughter. I lie not (said the priest) for thou hast thre daughters, one of them is called pribe, the second couetousnesse, and the third lecherie. With that the king called to him his lordes & barons, and said to them; This hypocrite here hath required me to marrie a waite my thre daughters, which (as he saith) I cherish, nourish, foster and mainteine, that is to say, pride, couetousnesse, and lecherie. And now that I haue found out necessarie & fit husbands for them, I will do it with effect, and seeke no more deuilaies. I therefore bequeath my pride to the high minded templers and hospitallers, which are as proud as Lucifer himselfe. My couetousnesse I giue vnto the white monks, otherwise called of the Cisteria order, for they couet the diuell and all. My lecherie I commit to the prelates of the church, who haue most pleasure and felicitie therein.

Here liued in the daies of this king Richard, men of worthe fame amongst those of the cleargie, Baldwinus & Hubert archbishops of Canturburie, who succeeded him in that see, also Hugh bishop of Lincoln, a man for his worthinesse of life highlie to be commended. Moreouer, William bishop of Ely, who though otherwile he was to be dispaired for his ambition and pompous haughtinesse, yet the king vnder his seruice for a time greatlie to his profit and aduancement of the publike affaires. Also of learned men we find diuerse in these daies that flourished here in this land, as Baldwinus of Deuonshire that came to be bishop of Worcester in this kings time, and after his decesse, he was aduanced to the gouernment of the archbishops see of Canturburie, he wrote diuerse treatises, namelie of matters pertaining to diuinitie. Daniell Gozley well scene in the Mathematicals, John de Heram, and Richard de Werham two notable hystoricians, Guilielmus Stephanides a monke of Canturburie, who wrote much in the praise of archbishop Becket. Beside these, we find one Richard, that was an abbat of the order Premonstratensis, Richard Diuisiensis, Nicholas Walkington, Robert de Bello Foro, an excellent philosopher, &c. See Bale in his third Centurie.

60 In martiall renoume there flourished in this kings daies diuerse noble captiues, as Robert earle of Leicester, Ranulfe de Fulgiers, two of the Barons, Hugh and Henrie, thre Williams, Marshall, Bunell, and Pandeuill, with two Roberts, Kos and Sabeuille. Furthermore, I find that in the daies of this king Richard, a great death reigned in England, and also in France, for the space of thre or foure yeares during the wars betwene him & king Philip, so that after his returne out of Germanie, and from imprisonment, a quarter of wheat was sold at 18 shillings eight pence, no small price in those daies, if you consider the alay of monie then currant.

Also immediatlie after, that is to say, in the yeare of our Lord, a thousand, one hundred, nintie six, which was was about the seventh yere of the said kings reigne, there followed a marvellous fore death, which daile consumed such numbers of people, that scarce there might be found any to keepe and loke to those that were sicke, or to burie them that died. Which sicknesse was a pestilentiall feuer or sharpe burning ague. The accustomed manner of buriall was also neglected: so that in manie places they made great pits, and threwo their dead bodies into the same, one vpon an other. For the multitude of them that died was such, that they could not haue time to make for euerie one a severall graue. This mortalitie continued for the space of five or six monthes, and at length ceased in the cold season of winter.

Two sunnes.

In the octaves of Pentecost befoze this great death, in the first houre of the day, there appeared two sunnes, the true sunne & another, as it were a counterfeitt sunne: but so apparentlie, that hard it was to the common people, to discern the one from the other. The skilfull also were compelled by instruments to distinguish the one from the other: in taking their altitudes and places, whereby in the end they found the new apparition, as it were, to wait vpon the planet, and so continued by the space of certeine houres. At length when the beholders (of whom Wil. Parvus that recorded things in that age was one) had well wearied their eyes in diligent marking the maner of this strange appearance, the counterfeitt sunne vanished awaie.

This strange wonder was taken for a signification of that which followed, that is to say, of war, famine and pestilence: or to say the truth, it betokened rather the continuance of two of those mischifts. For warre and famine had fore afflicted the people befoze that time, and as yet ceased not: but as for the pestilence, it began some after the strange sight, whereof ensued such effect, as I haue already rehearsed.

as yet living in gouernment ouer the Scots. This man, so soone as his brother Richard was deceased, sent Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, and William Marshall earle of Striguill (otherwise called Chepflow) into England, both to proclaim him king, and also to see his peace kept, together with Geoffrey Fitz Peter lord chiefe iustice, and diuerse other barons of the realme, whilst he himselfe went to Chinon where his brothers treasure laye, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him by Robert de Turnham: and therewithall the castell of Chinon and Salumer and diuerse other places, which were in the custodie of the foresaid Robert. But Thomas de Furnes nephew to the said Robert de Turnham deliuered the citie and castell of Angiers vnto Arthur duke of Britaine. For by generall consent of the nobles and pæres of the countries of Aniou, Haine, and Touraine, Arthur was receiued as the liege and soueraine lord of the same countries.

Strife amongst the English subiects on the other side of the sea.

For enen at this present, and so soone as it was knowne that king Richard was deceased, diuerse cities and townes on that side of the sea belonging to the said Richard whilst he liued, fell at ods among themselves, some of them inducuring to preferre king John, other labouring rather to be vnder the gouernance of Arthur duke of Britaine, considering that he seemed by most right to be their chiefe lord, forso much as he was sonne to Geoffrey elder brother to John. And thus began the broile in those quarters, whereof in proceste of time ensued great inconuenience, and finally the death of the said Arthur, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Now whilst king John was thus occupied in recovering his brothers treasure, and traueling with his subiects to reduce them to his obedience, quene Elianor his mother by the helpe of Hubert archbishop of Canturburie and other of the noble men and barons of the land, trauelled as diligentlie to procure the English people to receiue their oth of allegiance to be true to king John. For the said archbishop and William Marshall earle of Striguill, being sent ouer into England (as befoze you haue heard) to proclaim him king, and to keepe the land in quiet, assembled the estates of the realme at Northampton, where Geoffrey Fitz Peter lord chiefe iustice was present with other of the nobles, afore whom those lords whose fidelities were earli suspected, willinglie toke their oths of obedience to the new king, and were assured by the same lords on his behalfe, that they should find him a liberall, a noble and a righteous prince, and such a one as would see that euerie man should inioy his owne, and such as were knowne to be notorious transgressors, should be sure to receiue their condighe punishment.

They sent Gualace de Wescie also vnto William king of Scotland, to signifie to him, that king John vpon his arriual in England, would satisfie him of all such right as he pretended to haue within the English dominions. And thus was king John accompted and proclaimed king of England by the generall generall consent of all the lords and barons of the same. The names of the cheefe of those peeres that were sworne (as you haue heard) are as followeth. Dauid earle of Huntingdon brother vnto William king of Scots; Richard earle of Clare; Ranulfe earle of Chester; William earle of Tutberie or rather Darbie; Walter earle of Mawthie; Roger Lacie constable of Chester; and William de Spowbraie, with diuerse other, whose names I here omit; because I would not be tedious and irksome to the readers.

Now the king of Scotland being informed by the lord Eustace Meslie (who had married his daughter) that there was some hope to be had on his part, for the recouerie of such seignories as he and his predecessors sometime held in England, did further dispatch sundrie ambassadours with full purpose to send them ouer into Normandie vnto king John, there to require restitution of the countries of Poythumberland and Cumberland, with their appurtenances, and he promised also by his letters, that if the same might be granted vnto him, in as ample manner as they had bene in times past to his ancestors, he would gladlie do his homage to king John, as to the true & lawfull king of England for the same, and furthermore yeld to him his faithfull seruice against all men, so often as he should be required therunto. Howbeit when the archbishop of Canturburie and the rest of the counsell, vnderstood that these ambassadours should passe through England, they would not suffer them so to do, but speedilie sent Dauid earle of Huntingdon into Scotland vnto the king his brother, requiring him earnestlie that he would not send any ambassadours ouer as yet, but rather tarie, and take patience a while, till the king should come ouer into England: which (as they said) he purposed to do verie shortly.

King John also hauing vnderstanding of his purpose, sent ouer the said lord Eustace againe vnto him with the like request, who in such wise perswaded him, that he was contented to abide a time, in hope of the better successe in his late attempted suit. And all this was done chieflie by the working of the kings mother, whom the nobilitie much honoured and loved. For she being bent to prefer hir sonne John, left no stone vnturned to establish him in the throne, comparing oftentimes the difference of gouernement betwene a king that is a man, and a king that is but a child. For as John was 32 yeares old, so Arthur duke of Britaine was but a babe to speake of. In the end, winning all the nobilitie wholie vnto his will, and seeing the coast to be cleare on euerie side, without any doubt of tempestuous weather likelie to arise, she signified the whole matter vnto R. John, who forthwith framed all his induements to the accomplishment of his businesse.

Surelie quene Elianor the kings mother was sore against hir nephue Arthur, rather moued thereto by enuie conceiued against his mother, than vpon any iust occasion given in the behalfe of the child, for that she saw if he were king, how his mother Constance would loke to beare most rule within the realme of England, till hir sonne should come to lawfull age, to gouerne of himselfe. ¶ So hard it is to bring women to agree in one mind, their natures commonlie being so contrarie, their words so variable, and their deeds so vndiscreet. And therefore it was well said of one (alluding to their disposition and qualities, —nulla diu femina pondus habet)

When this doing of the quene was signified vnto the said Constance, she doubting the suertie of hir sonne, committed him to the trust of the French king, who receiuing him into his tuition, promised to defend him from all his enemies, and forthwith furnished the holds in Britaine with French soldiers. Quene Elianor being aduertised hereof, stood in doubt by and by of hir countrie of Guien, and therefore with all possible speed passed ouer the sea, and came to hir sonne John into Normandie, and shortly after they went forth together into the countrie of Maine, and there tooke both the citie and castell of Bauns, throwing downe the wals and towers therof, with all the fortifications and stone-houses in and about the same, and kept the citizens as prisoners, because they had aided Arthur against his vncle John.

After this, king John entring into Anjou, held his Easter at Beaufort (which feast fell that yeare the 18 day of Aprill) and from thence he went straight vnto Rouen, where on the sundae next after Easter being S. Marks day, he was girded with the sword of the duchtie of Normandie in the high church there by the hands of Walter archbishop of Rouen. And so being inuested duke of Normandie, receiued the oath according to the custome, that he should defend the church, and mainteine the liberties thereof, see iustice ministered, good lawes put in execution, and naughtie lawes and orders abolished. In the meane time his mother quene Elianor, together with capteine Marchades entred into Anjou, and wasted the same, because they of that countrie had receiued Arthur for their soueraigne lord and gouernour. And amongst other towne and fortresses, they tooke the citie of Angiers, due manie of the citizens, and committed the rest to prison.

This enterprize being thus luckilie atchined, the residue of the people in those parties were put in such feare, that of their owne accord they turned to their wonted obedience, seeming as though they would continue still therein. The French king all this while conceiuing an other exploit in his head, more commodious vnto him than as yet to attempt warre against the Englishmen vpon so light an occasion, dissembled the matter for a time, as though he would know nothing of all that was done, till the king should be otherwise occupied in England about his coronation.

In the meane season king John hauing set some stay in his businesse on the further side of the sea, he left his mother still in Guien, to defend that countrie against the enemies, and taking the sea, came ouer himselfe into England, landing at Shorham, the 25 day of Maie. On the next day, being Ascension eue, he came to London there to receiue the crowne. On the morow after being Ascension daie, when the nobilitie and commons were assembled, and the king brought into the church of S. Peter at Westminister there to receiue his diademe; Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie being chiefe in authoritie and honour, both for his age and calling, spake these words or the like in substance before the whole assembly, as followeth.

Hubert the archbishop of Canturburies oration to the lords spirituall and temporal in the presence of the king, &c.

Most honorable lords of the spirituallie, and most graue and politike peeres and barons of the temporallie, you are come hither this day to chosse you a king, and such a one as (if need should require) may be able of himselfe to take such a charge vpon him, and (hauing vnderaken the same) readie to execute that which he shall thinke to be expedient expedient for the profit of his subjects: we haue therefore one present heere among vs, vpon whome harts and good willes of high and low, rich and poore, doo generallie depend: a man I doubt not, but that for his owne part will applie his whole indouour, studie, and thought vnto that onelie end, which he shall perceiue to be most profitable for the commonwealth, as knowing himselfe to be bozne not to serue his owne turne, but for to profit his countrie, and to seeke for the generall benefit of vs that are his subjects.

And albeit I am sure that you doe well know, how all these qualities are most abundantlie planted in the person of John duke of Normandie (a person of high prowesse and no lesse prudence, for the which ye ought to iudge him right worthe of the gouernement) yet bearing in doubt least the common fame should carrie you awaie, or least you should turne your minds to the fauour of an other, as in respect of some better right, by title of a more lawfull descent of inheritance pretended by others than he hath to shew, I require you to giue eare vnto my words: who bearing the state of two manner of persons, ought to be profitable to my countrie, not onelie by example and exhortation, but also by loialtie and good counsell, which hitherto I haue euer studied to performe, and wherein (God willing) I meane to persist, so long as I shall continue in this mortall and transitorie tabernacle.

Therefore whereas at this present we haue in hand to conclude vpon such a weightie matter, which beeing once done, can not be vndone, I commend vnto you this John, euen withall my verie heart, and iudge that you ought to accept him for your king, who in all things which he shall ordeine, purpose, or take in hand, shall not faile so to answer your opinions with his well doing, and so satisfie your god expectations already conceived of him with his diligent providence, that all the whole realme shall not onelie like of and allow your doing heerin, but also with high commendation extoll the same to the verie stars. These things do I promise vnto you, and so farforth as in me may lie, I dare take vpon me all chanches and perils that may proceed thereof.

When the archbishop had ended his speech, diuerse held their peace, and manie with great zeale saluted king John, whom the same daie the said archbishop crowned at Westminister, after the manner then vsed with great solemnitie, and no lesse reioicing of all such as were present. At the same time also he receiued the homages of the lords and barons of the realme, and promised with all speed to haue consideration of things that appertained as well to religion as to the due execution of lawes, whereby euerie man might come to inioice that which was his owne, by right and due course of iustice. We find that there were present at this solemnitie and coponation of king John, which was celebrated on the Ascension day the 27 of Maie, archbishops and bishops to the number of leaue-taking, as Hubert archbishop of Cantuarburie, John archbishop of Dublin, also the archbishop of Raguse, William bishop of London, Gilbert bishop of Rochester, John bishop of Norwich, Hugh bishop of Lincoln, Eustace bishop of Ely, Godfrey bishop of Winchester, Henrie bishop of Exeter, Seftide bishop of Chichester, Godfrey bishop of Couentre, Sauarie bishop of Bath, Herbert bishop of Salisburie, Philip bishop of Duresme, Roger bishop of saint Andrew in Scotland, and Henrie bishop of Landaffe in Wales. The bishop of Duresme found himselfe somewhat grieued in the matter, making obiections, that the coronation ought not to be celebrated without the presence of Gesefrey archbishop of Worhe: but it preuailed not.

Besides these bishops, there were of the temporall lords and earles, Robert of Leicester, Richard of Clare, William of Cantuarie, Hamlin of Warren, William of Salisbury, William of Chepesham otherwise called Strigulle, Alan of Marbrike, Roger Bigot, William of Arundell, and Ranulfe of Chester, with manie other barons, lords, knights, and no small multitudes of gentlemen and other common people. The same date of his coronation also, he inuected William Parshall with the sword of the earldome of Strigulle, and Geoffrey Fitz Peter, with the sword of the earldome of Essex. For although they were called earles, and exercised the administration of their earldoms; yet were they not till that date girded with the sword of those earl-doms, and so that day they seru'd at the table with their swords girded vnto them.

In like manner, Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie was made lord chancellor of England; who as he uttered some words inaudible, that theyed how he inwardly rejoiced at the kings fauour toward him in the gift of this office, and so gloriized in the honour thereto he was preferred (which he would neuer haue done, if he had feared of worldlie pompe as by his profession he ought, and as one asseeth the question in the same case:

— dic mihi, nunquid

the lord Hugh Wardolf said vnto him, yet not to loſe to ſpeake and not offend you , ſuerlie if you would well conſider the dignitie and honoz of your calling, you would not willinglie yeeld to ſuffer this yoke of bondage to be laid vpon your ſhoulders, for we haue oftentimes heard of a chancelloir made an archbiſ-shop, but neuer an archbiſhop made a chancelloir till now . The coronation being thus ended, it was not long yer there came ambaffadoꝝ from the Scotiſh king, namelie William the prioꝝ of May, William the prioꝝ of ſaint Colmes Ins, and one William May, the which on the behalfe of the ſaid Scothiſh king required reſtitution of Northumberland and Cumberland, with the apurtenances , promiſſing that if the ſame were reſtoꝝed to him, he would ſerue men then alieue ; otherwiſe, that is, if he could not haue thoſe countries, which of right to him apperteyned by law, as he pretended, he would doe the beſt he could to recover them by force.

King John made answer herevnto, that if his cosen the king of Scots would come vnto him, he should be assured to receiue at his handes all that was reason, as well in those demands, as in all other things. He also sent him the bishop of Duresme, to requite him to come vnto Nottingham, where he would meet with him. Hobbeis, king William refused to come himselfe as then, but sent the bishop of Saint Andrew, and Hugh Spaldibille to follow his suit,

lent, with promise to abstaine from any forceable inuasion of England, by the space of foure daies, so that he might within that terme haue some resolute answer from king Iohn, whereunto he might stand either on the one side or the other.

Whilist these things were a doing in England, Philip II. of France having leued an armie, brake into Normandie, and toke the cite of Crecur, the towne of Arques, and diuerse other places from the English. And passing from thence into Maine, he recovered that countie lately before through feare alienated. In an other part, an armie of Britains both great diligence won the townes of Coney, Votouant and Sensim, and following the viduie, toke the cite of Angiers, which king Iohn had won from duke Arthur, in the last yeare passed. These things being signified to king Iohn, he thought to make promise for the recouerie of his losses there, with all speed possible. And thereupon perceiuing that the Scotch king meant not to meet with him at Nottingham whither he was come, and where he kept the feast of Whitsuntide, he determined to passe the seas over into Normandie: but first he toke order for the gouernement and defense of the realme in his absence.

Whereupon he deliuered the charge of the countie of Northumberland and Cumberland, vnto the lord William de Stutemille, with all the castles, and other the appurtenances, which the lord Hugh Barboise before held, and had in keeping. He also deliuered vnto Roger de Lacie constable of Chester, the castell of Pomfret, hauing first the sonne and heire of the same Lacie deliuered vnto him as an hostage for his loialtie and faithfull obedience. This done, he barked vnto the sea side, and sailed ouer into Normandie, landing first at Diep, and from thence went to Rouen, whither he came vpon the sundaie before Midsummer day, which was the 26 of June as W. Harrison hath noted.

Immediatlie vpon his arrivall in those parts, there resorted vnto him a great number of souldiers both horsemen and footmen, hoping to be intertained, but by reason of ambassadours riding to and fro betwixt the two kings, they came to a communication, and toke truce for fiftie daies. The earle of Flanders being certified thereof, was soie in his hart, and loth that the French king should come to any accord with the king of England, and therefore to turne the mind of king Iohn from the purpose of peace, he came to visit him at Rouen, where they received the league betwixt England & Flanders, to be the better able to defend themselves from the French power: and withall determined fullie, that immediatlie vpon the expiring of this last truce they would make the French king warre, to reuenge their late receiued iniuries. The French king aduertised by espials of their determination, prepared also for the warres.

In this meane time it chanced, that Henrie earle of Namure, brother to Philip earle of Flanders, and one Peter of Doway, a right valiant knight, with his brother that was the elect bishop of Cambray, were taken prisoners in a skirmish, and presented to the French king. Whereupon the cardinall of Capua (being at the same time the popes legat in France) interdicted that realme for the taking of the same elect of Cambray, & also all Normandie, for the detaining of the bishop of Beauuois in prison (who had laine there a long time, & was taken in the field after such manner as is before rehearsed) so that the French king was glad to restore the elect of Cambray to his libertie. And likewise king Iohn deliuered the bishop of Beauuois, who paid two thousand marks, besides expenses of diet during the time of his captiuitie, and furthermore toke an oath, that he should neuer after beare armour in the war against any christian or christians.

About the same time, king Philip made Arthur duke of Britaine knight, and receiued of him his homage for Anjou, Poitiers, Maine, Touraine, and Britaine. Also somewhat before the time that the truce should expire, to wit, on the morrow after the feast of the Assumption of our ladie, and also the day next following, the two kings talked by commissioners, in a place betwixt the townes of Buteuant and Culeton. Within three daies after, they came together personallie, and communed at full of the variance depending betwixt them. But the French king shewed himselfe stiff and hard in this treatie, demanding the whole countie of Mencheffine to be restored vnto him, as that which had bene granted by Geoffrey earle of Anjou, the father of king Henrie the second, vnto Lewis le Grasse, to haue his aid then against king Stephen. Moreover, he demanded, that Poitiers, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, should be deliuered and wholly resigned vnto Arthur duke of Britaine.

But these, & diuerse other requests which he made, king Iohn would not in any wise grant vnto, and so they departed without conclusion of any agreement. Therefore diuerse earls and barons of France, which before that time had serued king Richard, repaired vnto king Iohn, and toke an oath to assist him, and not to agree with the French king without his consent: and he likewise sware vnto them, not to make peace with the French king, except they were therein compyled. In the moneth of September, Iohn king Iohns sister, wife to Raimond earle of Sicily, and sometime quene of Sicily, died at Rouen, and was buried at Fontenard. The French king also toke diuerse townes and castles, but amongst other the castell of Salun, and rased the wals thereof downe to the ground, wherewith William de Roches, generall of the armie of Arthur duke of Britaine, was greatlie offended, and did so much by his drift, that shortly after a peace was concluded betwixt king Iohn and his nephew duke Arthur, though the same serued but to small purpose.

The French king hauing (as I haue said) overthrowne the wals of Salun, besieged a fortreffe called Lanardin, but king Iohn coming with an armie, caused him to raise his siege, and to withdraw himselfe to the cite of Mauns, whither he followed, and compelled him (mauger his force) to remoue from thence. All this while was William de Roches busilie occupied about his practise, to make king Iohn and his nephew Arthur friends, which thing at length he brought about, and thereupon deliuered into king Iohns hands the cite of Mauns which he had in keeping. Also the vicount of Tours came to the king of England, and surrendered vnto him the castell of Chinon, the keeping whereof he betooke vnto Roger de Lacie the constable of Chester. But in the night following, vpon some mistrust and suspicion gathered in the obseruation of the covenants on Iohns behalfe, both the said Arthur, with his mother Constance the said vicount of Tours, and diuerse other, fled awaie secretlie from the king, and got them to the cite of Angiers, where the mother of the said Arthur refusing hir former husband the earle of Chester, married hir selfe to the lord Guie de Tours, brother to the said vicount, by the popes dispensation. The same yere, Philip bassard some to king Richard, to whom his father had giuen the castell and honoz of Coinache, killed the vicount of Limoges, in reuenge of his fathers death, who was slaine (as we haue heard) in besieging the castell of Chalus Cheurrell.

Moreover, there fell manie great clouds in England, and on the borders of Scotland, by violence thereof diuerse bridges were bozne downe, and amongst other, the bridge at Barwik. For the building by againe thereof, some variance arose betwixt Philip bishop of Durham and earle Patrike lord cheefe iustice of Scotland, and capiteine at the same time of the towne of Barwik, who by the Scottish kings commandement would haue repaired againe the same bridge, which could not be done, but that the one end thereof must be builded on the bishop of Durhams ground, which he would not suffer, till by the counsell of the lord William de Stutewille, he agreed, so that the conuention accorded and concluded betwixt the king of Scots and his predecessor bishop Hugh might be reserved inuiolable.

Furthermore, king John did set a rate vpon the prices of wines, as Roshell wine to be sold for twentie shillings the tun, and not above. The wine of Aragon for twentie foure shillings the tun, and no other French wines above five and twentie shillings the tun, except it were of such notable goodnesse as that some peradventure for their owne expenses would be contented to giue after twentie six shillings eight pence for the tun, and not above. Moreover, the gallon of Roshell wine he appointed to be sold at foure pence: and the gallon of white wine at six pence. It was also ordeined, that in euerie citie, towne, and place where wine was vsed to be sold, there should be twelue honest men sworn to haue regard that this assise should not be broken: and that if they found any vintner that should from the pin sell any wine by small measures contrarie to the same assise, his bodie should be attached by the shiriffe, and detained in prison, till other commandement were giuen for his further punishment, and his goods seized vnto the kings vse. Furthermore, if any persons were or should be found to buy and sell by the hogthead or tun, contrarie to this assise, they should be committed to prison, there to remaine, till other order were taken for them: neither should there be any regrating of wines that were brought into England. But this ordinance lasted not long, for the merchants could not beare it, and so they fell to and sold white wine for eight pence the gallon, and red or claret for six pence.

King John also came ouer from Normandie into England, and there leuied a subsidie, taking of euerie ploughland three shillings. In the Lent following, he went to Porke, in hope to haue met the king of Scots there, but he came not, and so king John returned backe, and sailed againe into Normandie, because the variance still depended betwene him and the king of France. Finally vpon the Ascension day in this second yeare of his reigne, they came effectones to a communication betwixt the townes of Clermon and Lisle Danelie, where finally they concluded an agreement, with a marriage to be had betwixt Lewes the sonne of king Philip, and the ladie Blanche, daughter to Alfonso king of Castile the 8 of that name, a nece to k. John by his sister Elianor.

In consideration whereof, king John, besides the summe of thirtie thousand markes in silver, as in respect of dowrie assigned to his said nece, resigned his title to the citie of Cœur, and also vnto all those townes which the French king had by warre taken from him, the citie of Angiers onelie excepted, which citie he receiued againe by covenants of the same agreement. The French king restored also to king John (as Rafe Niger writeth) the citie of Tours, and all the castles and fortresses which he had taken within Touraine: and moreover, receiued of king John his homage for all the lands, fees and tenements which at anie time his brother king Richard, or his father king Henrie had holden of him, the said king Lewes or any his predecessors, the quit claims and marriages alwaies excepted. The king of England likewise did homage vnto the French king for Britaine, and againe (as after you shall heare) receiued homage for the same countrie, and for the countie of Richmond of his nephew Arthur. He also gaue the earldome of Gloucester vnto the earle of Cœur, as it were by way of exchange, for that he resigned to the French king all right, title & claime that might be pretended to the countie of Cœur.

By this conclusion of marriage betwixt the said Lewes and Blanche, the right of king John went auaie, which he lawfullie before pretended vnto the citie of Cœur, and vnto those townes in the confines of Berrie, Chateau, Mouz or Maoul, Crestle and Foldune, and likewise vnto the countrie of Menurin or Menquessine, which is a part of the territoire of Gisors: the right of all which lands, townes and countries was released to the king of France by k. John, who supposed that by his assentie, and resignation of his right to those places, the peace now made would haue continued for euer. And in consideration thereof, he procured furthermore, that the fore said Blanche should be conueied into France to his husband with all speed. That done he returned into England.

Certes this peace was displeasing to manie, but namelie to the earle of Flanders, who herevpon making no accompt of king Johns amitie, concluded a peace with king Philip hostile after, and went to make warre against the infidels in the east parts, whereby we may see the discontented minds of men, and of how differing humors they be, so that nothing is harder than to satisfie manie with one thing, be the same neuer so good,

—o cecis mortalia plena tenebris Pectora, & o mentes caligine circumseptas!

But by the chronicles of Flanders it appeareth, that the earle of Flanders concluded a peace with the French king in February last past, before that king John and the French king fell to any composition. But such was the malice of writers in times past, which they bare towards king John, that what soeuer was done in preiudice of him or his subiecs, it was still interpreted to chance through his default, so as the blame still was imputed to him, in so much that although manie things he did peradventure in matters of gouernement, for the which he might be hardlie excused, yet to thinke that he deserued the tenth part of the blame wherewith writers charge him, it might seeme a great lacke of aduised consideration in them that so should take it. But now to proceed with our purpose.

King John being now in rest from warres with foren enemies, began to make warre with his subiects pursles at home, emptieng them by taxes and tallages, to fill his coffers, which alienated the minds of a great number of them from his loue and obedience. At length also, when he had got together a great masse of monie, he went ouer againe into Normandie, where by Helias archbishop of Bourdeaux, and the bishop of Poitiers and Secone, he was diuorced from his wife Isabell, that was the daughter of Robert earle of Gloucester, because of the merencie of blood, as touching hir in the third degre. After that, he married Isabell the daughter of Amerie earle of Angoiesme, by whome he had two sonnes, Henrie and Richard, and three daughters, Isabell, Elianor, and Jane.

Moreover, about this time, Cestrey archbishop of Porke was deprived of all his manours, lands, and possessions, by the kings commandement, directed to the shiriffe of Dorsetshire for diuerse causes, for that he would not permit the same shiriffe to leuie the du-tie called Charugage, that was; three shillings of cuerie ploughland within his diocesse, rated and appointed to be leuied to the kings use, throughout all parts of the realme. Secondlie, for that the same archbishop refused to go ouer with the king into Normandie to helpe to make the marriage betwixt the French kings sonne and his neece. Thirddie, because he had excommunicated the same shiriffe and all the prouince of Poike: whereupon the king tooke displeasure against him, and not onelie spoiled him (as I said) of his goods, but also banished him out of the court, not suffering him to come in his presence for the space of twelue moneths after.

In this yeare also, Hubert archbishop of Canturburie held a counsell at Westminster against the prohibition of the lord chiefe iustice, Geoffrey Fitz Peter earle of Essex. In the which counsell or synod, diuerse constitutions were made and ordeined for orders and customes to be used touching the seruice and administration of sacraments in the church, and other articles concerning churchmen and ecclesiasticall matters. About the same time, king Iohn and Philip king of France met together nere the towne of Vernon, where Arthur duke of Britaine (as balsall to his uncle king Iohn) did his homage vnto him for the duchie of Britaine, & those other places which he held of him on this side and beyond the riuer of Loir, and afterward still mistrusting his uncles curtesie, he returned backe againe with the French king, and would not commit himselfe to his said uncle, who (as he supposed) did beare him little good will. These things being thus perforced, king Iohn returned into England, and there caused his new married wife Isabell to be crowned on the fundaie before the feast of S. Denise, the eight of October.

At the same time he gaue commandement vnto Hugh deuil high iustice of his foreests, that he should auard his precepts vnto all foreesters within the realme, to giue warning to all the white monks, that before the quindene of S. Michaell they should remoue out of his foreests all their horses of Haraz, and other cattell, vnder the penaltie to forfeit so manie of them, as after that day chanced to be found within the same foreests. The cause that moued the king to deale so hardlie with them was, for that they refused to helpe him with monie, when before his last going ouer into Normandie, he demanded it of them towards the payment of the thirtie thousand pounds which he had couenanted to pay the French king, to liue in rest and peace, which he coueted to haue done for reliefe of his people, and his owne suertie, knowing that enemies he had that late in wait to deströie him, and againe, what discommodities had chanced to his father and brethren, by the often and continuall wars. But now to proceed with other doings.

The king of Scots came to the king of England at Lincolne.

Polydor.

Immediatlie after the solemnization of the queens coronation ended, he sent Philip bishop of Duresme, Roger Bigot earle of Northfolke, and Henrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, nephew to William king of Scotland, and David earle of Huntingdon, brother to the said king, and Roger de Lacie constable of Chester, the lord William de Mescie, and the lord Robert de Ros, which had married two of the daughters of the said king, & Robert Fitz Roger shiriffe of Northumberland, as ambassadours from him vnto the foresaid William king of Scotland, with letters patents, containing a safe conduct for him to come into England, and to meet with king Iohn at Lincolne on the morrow after the feast of S. Edmund, who gladlie granted therevnto, and so according to that appointment, both the kings met at Lincolne the 21 day of Nouember. And on the morrow after king Iohn went to the cathedrall church, and offered vpon the high altar a chalice of gold.

On the same day, vpon a hill without the citie, the king of Scots did homage vnto king Iohn, in the presence and sight of a great multitude of people, swearing fealtie of life, limme, and worlde honour vnto king Iohn, which oath he made vpon the crosse of Hubert archbishop of Canturburie. Where were present at that time, beside other problems, three archbishops, Canturburie, Poike, and Ragule, with other bishops, to the number of thirtene, as Duresme London, Rochester, Ebie, Bath, Salisburie, Winchester, Hereford, Norwich, S. Andrews in Scotland, Landasse, and Bangor in Wales, and Geth in Ireland, beside a great multitude of earles, barons, and other problems. When the king of Scots had thus done his homage, he required restitution of Northumberland, Cumberland and Westmerland, which he claimed as his right and lawfull heritage. Such talke was had touching this matter, but they could not agree, and therefore king Iohn asked respit to consider of it till the feast of Pentecost next insuing, which being granted, the king of Scots the next morrow being the 23 of Nouember returned homeward, and was conducted backe againe into his countrie by the same public men that brought him to Lincolne.

The same day that the king of Scots toke his iournie homewards from Lincolne, the corps of Hugh bishop of that citie (latele before, departed this life at London, after his returne from the parts of beyond the seas) was brought thither to be buried, the king and all the bishops, earles and barons went to receiue it, and honoured his buriall with their presence. On the morrow after being fridaie, he was interred within the new church which he had builden. This Hugh was a Frenchman by nation, borne at Granople, a man of a pregnant wit, and skillfull both in science of holie scripture and humane knowledge. He was first a regular canon, and after became a Carthusian monke. King Henrie the second moued with the fame of his vertue and godlie life, sent the bishop of Bath to bring him into England, and after he was come, made him first abbat of Withing in the diocesse of Welles, and after created him bishop of Lincolne.

He was noted to be of a verie perfect life, namely, because he would not sticke to reprove men of their faults plainelie and frankelie, not regarding the fauour or disfauour of any man, in so much that he would not feare to pronounce them accursed, which being the kings officers, would take vpon them the punishment of any person within orders of the church, for hunting and killing of the kings game within his parkes, forests and chases, yea (and that which is more) he would denie payments of such subsidies and taxes as he was assessed to paie to the uses of king Richard and king Iohn, towards the maintenance of their wars, and did oftentimes accurse by his ecclesiasticall authoritie, such shiriffes, collectors, or other officers, as did disreine vpon his lands and goods for to satisfie these kings of their demands, alledging openlie, that he would not paie any monie towards the maintenance of wars, which one christian prince, vpon priuate displeasure and grudge, made against another prince of the same religion. This was his reason.

And when he came before the king to make answer to his disobedience shewed herein, he would so handle the matter, partlie with gentle admonishments, partlie with sharpe reproofes, and sometime mixing merrie and pleasant speeche amongst his serious arguments, that often times he would so qualifie the kings mood, that being diuinen from anger, he could not but laugh and smile at the bishops pleasant talke and merrie conceits, so that it might well be said of him, Omne talit punctum quimiscuit vile dulci.

This maner he vsed, not onelie with the king alone, but with the father and the two sonnes, that is to say, Henrie the second, Richard and Iohn, in whose time he ruled and gouerned the see of Lincolne. He was after his deceasse, for the opinion which men conceiued of his holinesse and vertues, admitted into the number of the saints.

For haue heard how king Iohn had conceiued no small displeasure against the monks of the white order, for that they would not part with any monie, excusing themselves that they might not do it, without consent of a generall chapter of their order. Whereupon the king had caused them diuerse waies to be molested, but cheselie in restraining them of libertie to haue any horses or other cattell going to pasture within his forrests. They therefore taking aduise together, chose forth twelue abbats amongst them of that order, the which in all their names went to Lincolne, there to make suit to the king (comming thither at this time to meet the king of Scots) that it would please him to remit his displeasure conceiued against them, and to take them againe into his protection.

This suit was so followed, although with some difficultie, that at length, to wit, the sundaie after that the king of Scots had done his homage, through the helpe and furtherance of the archbishop of Canturburie, they came to the kings speech, and obtained so much, as they in reason might desire: for he pardoned them of all his passed displeasure, received them againe into his fauour, took them into his protection, and commanded that all iniuries, greunances and molestacions should be reformed, redressed and amended, which in respect of his indignation had bene offered and done to them by any manner of meanes. And to see the same accomplished, to wit, were directed vnto the shiriffes of the counties, bearing date from Lincolne the 27 of Nouember. And thus were those monks for that time restored to the kings fauour, to their great commoditie and comfort.

five monies. About the moneth of December, there were scene in the prouince of Yorke five monies, one in the east, the second in the west, the third in the north, the fourth in the south, and the fift as it were set in the midst of the other, hauing manie stars about it, and went five or six times incompassing the other, as it were the space of one houre, and shortly after vanished awaye. The winter after was extreamelie cold, more than the naturall course had bene aforesetime. And in the spring time came a great glutting and continuall raine, causing the riuers to rise with higher floods than they had bene accustomed.

Matt. Paris.
Anno. Reg. 3. In the yeare 1201 king Iohn held his Christmas at Olsford, and there gaue to his seruants manie faire liveries and suits of apparell. The archbishop of Canturburie did also the like at Canturburie, seeing in deed to strue with the king, which of them should passe the other in such sumptuous appareling of their men: whereat the king (and not without god cause) was greatlie moued to indignation against him, although for a time he coloured the same, going presentlie into the north, where he gathered of the countrie there no small summs of monie, as it were by way of fining them for their transgressions committed in his forrests.

From thence he returned and came to Canturburie, where he held his easter, which fell that yeare on the day of the Annunciation of our ladie, in the which feast he sat crowned, together with his wife queene Isabell, the archbishop of Canturburie bearing the charges of them and their trains while they remained there. At the feast of the Ascension next ensuing, king Iohn set out a proclamation at Setwhelburie, that all the earles and barons of the realme, and also all other that held of him by knights seruaice, should be readie in the feast of Pentecost next ensuing, with horse and armour at Portesmouthe, to passe ouer with him into Normandie, who made their appearance accordingly. Howbeit, a great number of them in the end gat licence to tarry at home, paying for euery knights fee two markes of siluer for a fine, which then was a great matter.

But he sent before him into Normandie William Marthall earle of Striguille with an hundred knights or men of armes, which he had hired, and Roger de Lacie with an other hundred men of armes to defend the confines of Normandie against the enemies: and to his chamberleine Hubert de Burgh he deliuered the like number of knights or men of armes also, to keepe the marches betwixt England and Wales as warden of the same. This done, he pardoned his brother the archbishop of Yorke, and restored him to all his dignities, possessions and liberties, confirming the same vnto him in as full and large manner, as euer Roger late archbishop of that see had enioied the same: for the which confirmation his said brother undertooke to paie to the king within the terme of one yeare the summe of a thousand pounds sterling: and for the assurance thereof, engaged his baronie to the king in pledge.

Whereouer, about the same time, the king sent Geoffrey bishop of Chester, and Richard Paleville, with Henrie de Poisse, vnto William king of Scotland, requiring him that the time appointed for him to make answer touching his demand of Northumberland, might be prozoned untill the feast of saint Michael the archangel next ensuing, which was obtained, and then the king and queene (being come to Portsmouth on the mondaie in Whitfunweeke) took the sea to passe ouer into Normandie, but not both in one ship, so that the queene with a prosperous gale of wind arrived there at hir owne desire. But the king was driuen by reason of a pirrie, to take land in the Ile of Wight, and so was staid there for a time: howbeit, within a few daies after, he took ship againe at Portsmouth, and so passed ouer into Normandie, where shortly after his arriual in those parties he came to an enteruiew with the king of France, nere to Lille Donelie, where comming a long time together alone, they agreed so well, that within three daies after, king Iohn at the French kings request went into France, and was receiued of him with much honour, first at S. Denise with procession of the cleargie: and there lodging one night, vpon the morrow the French king accompanied him vnto Paris, where he was receiued of the citizens with great reuerence, the prouost presenting vnto him in the name of the whole citie manie rich gifts for his welcome. King Philip feasted him also in his owne palace, and for his part gaue to him, to his lords, and to his seruants manie great and princelie gifts. Whereouer, the league at this time was renewed betwixt them, and put in writing, with this caution, that whether of them first brake the covenants, such lords on his part as were become suerties for performance, should be released of their allegiance which they owght to him that so should brake, and that they might thereupon freely become subiects to the other prince.

These things done, at length when as king Iohn had remained at Paris with great mirth and solace certeine daies, the French king brought him forth of the citie, and took leaue of him in verie louing wise.

The French
king beginneth to make war against king Iohn.

Polydor.
Hugh earle of March.

After this king Iohn went to Chinon, & from thence into Normandie; about which time there chanced some troubles in Ireland, for where Walter Lacie under pretence of a communication that was appointed betwixt him and Iohn de Curcie, lord of Ulster, meant to haue taken the said Curcie, and for the accomplishment of his purpose set upon him, slue manie of his men, and for his safegard constrained Curcie in the end to take a castell which belonged unto Hugh Lacie, vpon faire promises made to him by the same Hugh, to be preferred out of all danger, it came to passe, that when he was once got in, he might no more be suffered to depart. For the Lacies thought to haue deliuered him to king Iohn, but the seruants and friends of the said Curcie made such cruell war, in wasting and destroying the lands and possessions that belonged unto the said Walter and Hugh Lacies, that finally they were constrained to set him againe at libertie whether they would or no.

At the same time also, the kings of France and England gaue large monie towards the maintenance of the armie, which at this present went forth vnder the leading of the earle of Flanders and other, to warre against the enemies of the christian faith, at the instance of pope Innocent. There was furthermore granted unto them the fortieth part of all the reuenues belonging to ecclesiasticall persons, towards the aid of the christians then being in the holie land, and all such as well of the Nobilitie as other of the weaker sort, which had taken vpon them the crosse, and secretly laid it downe, were compelled to receiue it now againe.

There chanced this yeare wonderful tempests of thunder, lightning, haile, and abundance of raine, in such wise, that mens minds were greatly affonied therewith: medowes and marsh grounds were quite overflowed, bridges broken and bozne downe, and great quantitie of corne and haie lost and carried away, and diuerse men and women drowned. Margaret mother of Constance, duchesse of Britaine, sister to William king of Scots, and mother to Henrie Boun earle of Hereford, deceased. This yeare also by the counsell and aduice of the burgesse of London, there were chosen of the most substantiall and wisest men, which after the report of some writers, were called the councill of the citie of London, out of which number the Maior and Bailiffes were yearely chosen.

In the yeare 1202 king Iohn held his Christmasse at Argenton in Normandie, and in the Lent following he and the French king met together, nere unto the castell of Gulleton, and there in talke had betwixt them, he commanded king Iohn with no small arrogancie, and contrarie to his former promise, to restore vnto his nephew Arthur duke of Britaine, all those lands now in his possession on that side the sea, which king Iohn earnestly denied to do, whereupon the French king immediatly after, began war against him, and toke Buteuant, Augi, and the castell of Linos. Moreover, he besieged the castell of Radeport for the space of eight daies, till king Iohn came thither, and forced him to depart with much dishonor. Wherupon after this, the French king went Courney, and then returning to Paris, he appointed certeine persons to haue the gouernment of the foresaid Arthur duke of Britaine, and then sent him forth with 200 men of armes into Poitou, that he might bring the countrie also vnder his subiection.

Whereupon Hugh le Boun earle of March (vnto whom queene Isabel the wife of king Iohn had bene promised in marriage, before that king Iohn was motioned vnto hir, and therefore bare an inward displeasure towards the king of England, for that he had so beneft him of his promised spouse) being now desirous to procure some trouble also vnto king Iohn, joined himselfe with Arthur duke of Britaine, and found meanes to cause them of Poitou (a people euer subiect to rebellion) to revolt from king Iohn, and to take armour against him, so that the young Arthur being encouraged with this new supplie of associats, first went into Touraine, and after into Aniou, compelling both those countreies to submit themselues vnto him, and proclaimed himselfe earle of those places, by commission and grant obtained from king Philip.

Queene Elianor that was regent in those parties being put in great feare with the newes of this sudden sturte, got hir into Spiraubeau a strong towne, situat in the countrie of Aniou, and forthwith dispatched a messenger with letters vnto king Iohn, requiring him of speedie succour in this hir present danger. In the meane time, Arthur following the victorie, shortly after followed hir, and wone Spiraubeau, where he toke his grandmother within the same, whom he yet intreated verie honorablie, and with great reuerence (as some haue reported.) But other write far more trulie, that she was not taken, but escaped into a tower, within which she was straitly besieged. Thither came also to aid Arthur all the Nobles and men of armes in Poitou, and namelie the foresaid earle of March according to appointment betwixt them: so that by this meanes Arthur had a great armie together in the field.

King Iohn in the meane time, hauing receiued his mothers letters, and vnderstanding thereby in what danger she stood, was maruellouslie troubled with the strangeness of the newes, and with manie bitter words accused the French king as an vntrue prince, and a fraudulent league-breaker: and in all possible hast speeded him forth, continuing his iourne for the most part both day and night to come to the succour of his people. To be brieue, he used such diligence, that he was vpon his enemies necks yer they could vnderstand any thing of his coming, or gesse what the matter meant, when they saw such a companie of souldiers as he brought with him to approach so nere the citie. For so negligent were they, that hauing once wone the towne, they ranged abroad ouer the countrie hither and thither at their libertie without any care. So that now being put in a sudden feare, as presented by the hastie coming of the enemies vpon them, and wanting leisure to take aduice what was best to be done, and hauing not time in manner to get any armour on their backs, they were in a marvellous trouble, not knowing whether it were best for them to fight or to flee, to yield or to resist.

This their feare being apparent to the Englishmen (by their disorder shewed in running vp and downe from place to place with great noise and tumult) they set vpon them with great violence, and compassing them round about, they either toke or slue them in a manner at their pleasure. And hauing thus put them all to flight, they pursued the chase towards the towne of Spiraubeau, into which the enemies made verie great hast to enter: but such speed was used by the English souldiers at that present, that they entred and wone the said towne before their enemies could come nere to get into it. Great slaughter was made within Spiraubeau it selfe, and Arthur with the residue of the armie that escaped with life from the first breaking was taken, who being hereby committed to prison, first at Falais, and after within the citie of Rouen, liued not long after as you shall heare. The other of the prisoners were also committed vnto safe keeping, some into castles within Normandie, and some were sent into England.

Matth. Paris.

King Iohn hauing gotten this victorie, and taken his nephue Arthur, he wrote the manner of that his successe vnto his barons as followeth.

Iohn by the grace of God king of England, and lord of Ireland, to all yee that we by Gods good fauour are in sound and perfect health, and through Gods grace that maruellouslie worketh with vs, on tuesday before Lammas daie, we being before the citie of Mauns, were aduertised that our mother was besieged in Mirabeau, and therfore we hasted so fast as we possibly might, so that we came thither on Lammas daie, and there we tooke our nephue Arthur, Hugh le Brun, Andrew de Chauenie, the vicount of Chateau Erald, Raimond de Touars, Sauerie de Mauleon, and Hugh Bangi, and all other e-nimies of Poitou that were there assembled against vs, to the number of two hundred

Anno Reg. 4.

The French king at the same time lieng in siege before Arques, immediatlie vpon the newes of this ouertrow, raised from thence, and returned home-wards, destroing all that came in his waie, till he was entred into his owne countrie. It is said that king Iohn caused his nephue Arthur to be brought before him at Falais, and there went about to persuade him all that he could to forsake his friendship and alliance with the French king, and to leane and sticke to him being his naturall uncle. But Arthur like one that wanted good counsell, and abounding too much in his owne willfull opinion, made a presumptuous answer, not onelie denieng so to do, but also commanding king Iohn to restore vnto him the realme of England, with all those other lands and possessions which king Richard had in his hand at the houre of his death. For sith the same appertained to him by right of inheritance, he assured him, except restitution were made the sower, he should not long continue quiet. King Iohn being soe moued with such words thus vttered by his nephue, appointed (as before is said) that he should be straitlie kept in prison, as first in Falais, and after at Roan within the new castell there. Thus by means of this good successe, the countries of Poitou, Touraine, and Anjou were recovered.

March. Paris
King Iohn enthroned crowned.

Rafe Cog.

Shorlie after king Iohn comming ouer into England, caused himselfe to be crowned againe at Canterburie by the hands of Hubert the archbishop there, on the fourteenth day of Aprill, and then went backe againe into Normandie, where immediatlie vpon his arriuall, a rumour was spred through all France, of the death of his nephue Arthur. True it is that great suit was made to haue Arthur set at libertie, as well by the French king, as by William de Riche a valiant baron of Poitou, and diuerse other noble men of the Britains, who when they could not preuaile in their suit, they banded themselues togither, and joining in confederacie with Robert earle of Arlon, the vicount Beaumont, William de Fulgiere, and other, they began to leuie harpe wars against king Iohn in diuerse places, in so much (as it was thought) that so long as Arthur liued, there would be no quiet in those parts: where, upon it was reported, that king Iohn through persuasion of his counsellors, appointed certeine persons to go vnto Falais, where Arthur was kept in prison, vnder the charge of Hubert de Burgh, and there to put out the yong gentlemen es.

But through such resistance as he made against one of the tormentors that came to execute the kings commandement (for the other rather forsooke their prince and countrie, than they would consent to obeye the kings authoritie herein) and such lamentable words as he vttered, Hubert de Burgh old preserve him from that infurie, not doubting but rather to haue thanks than displeasure at the kings hands, for deliuering him of such infamie as would haue redounded vnto his highnesse, if the yong gentlemen had bene so cruellie dealt withall. For he considered, that king Iohn had resolved vpon this point onelie in his heat and furie (which mouth men to undertake manie an inconuenient enterpryse, be-leseming the person of a common man, much more reprochfull to a prince, all men in that mood being mere folish and furious, and prone to accomplish the peruerse conceits of their ill possessed heart; as one saith right well,

— prout in iram
Stultorum est animus facile exardescit, et audet Omne scelus, quoties concepta bile tumescit and that afterwards, vpon better aduiseement, he would both repent himselfe so to haue commanded, and giue them small thanke that should see it put in execution. Howbeit to satisfie his mind for the time, and to stalle the rage of the Britains, he caused it to be bruted abroad through the countrie, that the kings commandement was fulfilled, and that Arthur also though sorrow and greife was departed out of this life. For the space of fiftene daies this rumour incessantlie ran through both the realmes of England and France, and there was ringing for him through townes and villages, as it had bene for his funerals.

It was also bruted, that his bodie was buried in the monasterie of saint Andzelues of the Cistercian order.

But when the Britains were nothing pacified, but rather kindled more vehementlie to worke all the mischefe they could deuise, in reuenge of their soveraignes death, there was no remedie but to signifie abroad againe, that Arthur was as yet liuing and in health. Now when the king heard the truth of all this matter, he was nothing displeased for that his commandement was not executed, sith there were diuerse of his capteins which vttered in plaine words, that he should not find knights to keepe his castels, if he dealt so cruellie with his nephue. For if it chanced any of them to be taken by the king of France or other their aduersaries, they should be sure to tast of the like cup. ¶ But now touching the maner in vertie deed of the end of this Arthur, writ-ters make sundrie reports. Whereof the certeine it is, that in the yeare next ensuing, he was remoued from Falais vnto the castell or tower of Rouen, out of the which there was not any that would confesse that euer he saw him go aliue. Some haue written, that as he assaied to haue escaped out of prison, and prouing to cline ouer the wals of the castell, he fell into the riuer of Saine, and so was drowned. Other write, that through vertie greife and languor he pined awaie, and died of naturall sicknesse. But some asstirne, that king Iohn secretlie caused him to be murthered and made awaie, so as it is not throughlie agreed vpon, in what sort he finished his daies: But verelie king Iohn was had in great suspition, whether worthilie or not, the lord knoweth. Yet how extremelie soeuer he delt with his nephue, he released and set at libertie diuerse of those lords that were taken prisoners with him, namely Hugh le Brun, and Sauerie de Hauleon, the one to his great trouble and hinderance, and the other to his gaine: for Hugh le Brun afterwards leuied and occasioned fore warres against him, but Sauerie de Hauleon continued euer after his loiall subiect, doing to him verie agreeable seruice, as hereafter may appeare.

Some forme to the vicount of Comars.

Constance the mother of duke Arthur accuseth king John.

Matt. Paris. The ordinance for the assise of bread.

The Lord Cite, forme to the vicount of Comars, who had taken Arthurs mother Constance to wife, after the duocle made betwixt hir and the earle of Chester, in right of hir obtained the dukedome of Britaine. But king Philip after he was aduertised of Arthurs death, took the matter verie graueouslie, and upon occasion thereof, cited king John to appeare before him at a certeine day, to answer such objections as Constance the duchess of Britaine mother to the said Arthur should lay to his charge, touching the murder of hir sonne. And because king John appeared not, he was therefore condemned in the action, and adjudged to forfeit all that he held within the precinct of France, as well Normandie as all his other lands and dominions.

About the same time the king caused a proclamation to be published for the lawfull assise of bread to be made by the bakers, upon paine to be punished by the pillorie: which assise was approued and assented by the baker of Cestre Fitz Peter, lord chiefe iustice of England, and by the baker of Robert de Luningham. So that the baker might sell and gaine in euerie quarter thre pence, besides the bran, and two loaves for the heater of the oven, and for foure seruants foure halfe pence, for two boies a farthing, for allotmance in salt an halfe pence, yest an halfe pence, for candell a farthing, for setwell thre pence, and for a bulter an halfe pence. And this was the rate.

When wheat was sold for six shillings the quarter, then shall euerie loafe of fine manchet wey 41 shillings, and euerie loafe of cheate shall wey 24 shillings. When wheat is sold for five shillings and six pence, then manchet shall wey 20 shillings, and cheate 28 shillings. When wheat is sold for five shillings, then manchet shall wey 24 shillings, and the cheate bread 32 shillings. When wheat is sold for foure shillings six pence, manchet shall wey 32 shillings, and cheate 42 shillings. When wheat is sold for foure shillings, manchet shall wey 36 shillings, and cheate 46 shillings. When wheat is sold for thre shillings six pence, then shall manchet wey 42 shillings, and cheate 54 shillings. When wheat is sold for thre shillings, manchet shall wey 48 shillings, and cheate 44 shillings. When wheat is sold for two shillings and six pence, manchet shall wey 54 shillings, and cheate 72 shillings. When wheat is sold for two shillings, manchet shall wey firtie shillings, and cheate foure pound. When wheat is sold for 18 pence the quarter, manchet shall wey 77 shillings, & cheate foure pound and eight shillings. This ordinance was proclaimed throughout the realme, as most necessarie and profitable for the common-wealthe.

Great tempests.

This yeare manie wonderfull things happened, for besides the sore winter, which passed any other that had bene heard of in manie yeares before, both for continuance in length and extreme colde of frosts, there followed grieuouse tempests, with thunder, lightning, and stormes of raine, and haile of the biggnesse of hens eggs, wherewith much fruit & great store of corne was perished, beside other great hurts done upon houses and vpon cattell. Also spirits as it was thought in likenesse of birds and foules were seene in the aire slieng with fire in their beaks, wherewith they set diuerse houses on fire: which did import great troubles yer long to insue, and followed in deed, as shall appeare hereafter.

With this entrance of the yeare of our lord 1203, king John held his Christmasse at Caen, where not having (as some writers say) sufficient regard to the necessarie affaires of his wars, he gaue his mind to banquetting, and passed the time in pleasure with the queene his wife, to the great greife of his lords, so that they perceiuing his rechelesse demeanour (as some write, the doubtfull minds of the Nobilitie which serued on that side, and were readie daile to revolt from his obedience) withdrew their dutifull hearts from him, and therefore getting licence, returned home into England.

In this meane time the French king, to bring his purpose to full effect, entred into Normandie, wasted the countreies, and toan the towncs of Coloches, le Val de Kueil, and Lille Dandele. Le Val de Kueil was giuen ouer without any great inforcement of assault, by two noble men that had charge thereof, the one named Robert Fitz Wlaster, and the other Saer de Duncie. Howbeit Lille Dandele was valiantlie for a certeine time defended by Roger de Lacie the constable of Chester. But at length they within were so constrained by famine and long siege, that the said Lacie and others perceiuing it to be more honourable for them to die by the sword, than to starue through want of food, brake out upon their enemies, and slue a great sort of the Frenchmen, but yet in the end they were taken prisoners, and so these fortresses came into the French kings hands.

The pope hearing of these variances betwixt the two kings, sent the abbat of Cassin into France, accompanied with the abbat of Croissons, to moue them to a peace. These two abbats took such paines in the matter, that the kings were almost brought to agreement. But the French king perceiuing himselfe to be aforehand in his businesse, stricken at one article, which was to reparaire all such abbeyes as he had destroyed within the dominions of king John: and king John to do the like by all those that he had wasted within the French kings countreies. The popes Nuncij would haue ercommunicated king Philip, because he would not thus agree. But king Philip appealing from them, pursued the warre, and besieged the towne of Radpont. The soldiers within the towne defended the first assault verie manfullie, and caused the Frenchmen to retire backe: but king Philip meaning to haue the towne yer he departed, did so inclose it about, that within ten daies he toan it, and took there twentie men of armes, an hundred demianers, and twentie archers.

After this, when he had fortified this place, he went to castell Galiard, which he besieged; and though by the high valiance of Hugh de Courney the capitaine there, the Frenchmen were manfullie braten backe, and kept out for a moneth and more, yet at length by streit siege and neare approaches hardlie made, the fortresse was deliuered into the French kings hands. And in the end the said Hugh Courney revolted from his obedience, deliuering also the castell of Mountfort unto the French king, which castell with the honoz thereto appertaining king John had giuen to the same Hugh, not verie long before. All this while king John did lie at Rouen: but so much as he could not well remedie the matter as then, because he wanted such helpe as he desired toke for out of England, and durst not trust any of that side, he passed it over with a stout countenance for a while, and would saie oftentimes to such as stood about him; What else doth my cosen the French king now than scale those things from me, which hereafter I shall endeavour my selfe to cause him to restore with interest? But when he saw that his enemies would still proceed, and that no aid came out of England, he came ouer himselfe, and landed at Portesmouth.

King Philip doubting by bling the victorie with too much rigor, lest he should bring the Normans into a desperate boldness, and so cause them for safeguard of their lives to hazard all upon resistance, he staied for a time, and withdrew his souldiers backe againe into France, hauing not onelie furnished those places in the meane time which he had won, with strong garisons of his souldiers, but also appointed certeine personages to traueill with the people, yet remaining in the English subiection, to reuolt and turne from king Iohn, to his obeisance and subiection.

King Iohn being returned into England, accused diuerse of his Nobles for shewing themselves negligent and slothfull in aiding him, according to his commandement, alledging furthermore, that being destitute of their due and requisite seruice, he was constrained to lose his time in Normandie, as not being able for want of their aid to resist his enemies. Wherefore for this and other matters laid to their charges, he did put them to greuous fines. By meanes whereof, and by leauing a subsidie of his people, he got together an huge summe of monie. This subsidie was granted him in a parlement holden at Orenford, and begun there vpon the second of Januarie 1204, wherein of euerie knights sex was granted the summe of two markes and an halfe. Neither were the bishops, abbats, nor any other ecclesiasticall persons exempted, by meanes whereof he ran first into the hatred of the clergie, and consequently of manie other of his subiects: so that they failed him at his need, whereby he often sustained no small damage, which he might haue prevented and withstood, if he had bene so qualified with discretion as to haue seene what was conuenient and what inconuenient for his roiall estate. But

—voluntas

Improbis perniciem ingentem mortalibus affert, as it did to him, which may be gathered by a due obseruation of the consequence. ¶ This yeare the aire toward the north and east parts seemed to be on a bright fire for the space of six houres together. It began about the first watch of the night, on the first of April.

King Iohn about the beginning of this first yeare of his reigne, sent in ambassage to the French king the archbishop of Canturburie, the bishops of Norwich and Ely, the earles Barthall and Leicester, to treat with him of peace: but he was so far off from comming nere to any reasonable motions, because he saw the world frame as he wished, that still by demanding somewhat that might not be granted, he kept off, and brought in such hard conditions, that it was not possible to conclude anie agreement. And this he did of purpose, hoping within short time to conquer all that the king of England possessed as yet on that side the seas. He was the more vntoward to compound, for that he was informed how Arthur the duke of Britaine was dispatched of his life, and therefore not doubting but to haue manie to take part with him in seeking reuenge of his death, he made that his chiefe quarell, swearing that he would not cease to pursue the warre against king Iohn, till he had depriued him of his whole kingdome. So the ambassadors departed without all hope to come to any agreement. ¶ This yeare Easter day fell so high as it possible might, that is to saie, on saint Sparks day.

King Philip vnderstanding that king Iohn remained still in England, rather occupied in gathering of monie amongst his subiects, than in making other provision to bring them into the field (to the great offense of his said people) thought now for his part to lose no time: but assembling a mightie armie, he came with the same into Normandie, and vpon his first comming, he won the towne of Falaise, and shortly after was Dampfront deliuered vnto him by surrender. This done, he marched further into the countrie, and with his sudden inuasion so oppressed the people euerie where, that they could haue no time to make shift by flight to get into the toiwnes. With this swiftnesse of speed, he brought also such a feare into the hearts of most men, that he won all the countrie of Normandie euen to Mount S. Michael. The inhabitants in euerie place submitted themselves; as those of Baieulx, Constances, Lisieux, and other towines thereabouts.

Finallie, he came before Rouen, the principall citie of all the countrie, and incamped so in sundrie places about the citie, that all the issues, entrees and waies were closed vp by his armie, being so diuided into seuerall camps, that the distance was not great from one to another, making a terrible shew to them within. At length after he had prouided all things necessary for his purpose, and taken good aduise of his captains how he should best imploye his force for the winning of this citie (in which exploit he knew the full perfection of all his passed conquests chiefe to consist) he did manfullie assault it, and they within as manfullie defended themselves, so that he got little by the assaults and approaches which he made. Where vpon he fell in hand to practise with the citizens to win them with meed, curtesie, gentle speech, and great promises. So that in fine, they within were so moued with such reasons as he vsed to persuaade them with, all, that they made request for a truce to be had for certeine daies, within the terme whereof if no succour came, they couenanted to yeld without any further trouble.

This truce being obtained, ambassadors were sent from them of Rouen into England, to signifie vnto king Iohn the whole state of the citie, and of the truce, so that if aid came not within the time appointed, the citie must needs be deliuered into the enimies hands. The king hauing no armie in readinesse to send ouer, nor other shift to make for the succour of the citie, permitted the ambassadors to depart without comfort of any aid, who here vpon returning to Rouen, and reporting what they had heard, seene, and found, brought the citie into great sorrow. For whereas that citie had euer bene accustomed to glorie for the great loialtie and faithfull fidelitie which the same had euer shewed towards their liege lords and naturall princes; now the citizens perceived manifestlie, that vntlesse they would cast awaie themselves, and lose all they had, they must of force yeld into the hands of their enimies. Wherefore to make their true allegiance more apparant to the world, they staied the surrender as long as they had any store of vittels within the citie to relceue their fainting bodies withall: and so in the end being vanquished with hunger, they submitted themselves to the French king. Their submission being once knowne, caused all those other towines which had not yelded, to deliuer vp their keies vnto the French men, as Arques, Vernucill, and others.

Whereouer the towines in Poitou, Touraine, and Anjou, which king Iohn had recovered latelie before, did now againe (being in no small feare) yeld themselves vnto king Philip: so that of all the towines within those countries, there remained none vnder the English obeisance, save onelie Rochell, Tours, Blois, and a few other. Thus Normandie which kingollo had purchased and gotten 316 yeares before that present time, was then recovered by the French men, to the great repproach and dishonour of the English, in this yeare 1204. About this time quene Elianor, the mother of king Iohn departed this life, con-seemed rather through sorrow and anguish of mind, than of any other naturall infirmity.

In this first year of king Johns reigne, at Oxford in Suffolke, as Fabian saith, although I thinke he be deceived in the time, a fish was taken by fishers in their nets as they were at sea, resembling in shape a toide or savage man, whome they presented unto Sir Bartholomew de Glanville knight, that had then the keeping of the castell of Oxford in suffolke. He was naked, and in all his limbs and members resembling the right proportion of a man; he had haire also in the small parts of his bodie, albeit that the crowne of his head was bare, his beard was long and ragged, and his breast haire. The knight cauled him to be kept certeine daies & nights from the sea, meat set afore him he greedilie deuoured, & did eat fish both raw and sod. Those that were raw he pressed in his hand till he had thrust out all the moisture, and so then did eat them. He would not or could not utter any speech, although to trie him they hung him up by the heeles, and miserable tormented him. He would get him to his couch at the setting of the sunne, and rise againe at the rising of the same.

One day they brought him to the haven, and suffered him to go unto the sea, but to be sure he should not escape from them, they set three ranks of mightie strong nets before him, so to catch him againe at their pleasure (as they imagined) but he straightwaies dived downe to the bottome of the water, got past all the nets, and coming up, shewed himselfe to them againe that stood waiting for him, and dovoking divers times under water and coming up againe he beheld them on the shore that stood still looking at him, who seemed as it were to mocke them, for that he had deceived them, & got past their nets. At length after he had thus sported himselfe a great while in the water, and that there was no more hope of his returne, he came to them againe of his owne accord, swimming through the water, and remained with them two moneths after. But finally, when he was negligentlie looked to, and now seemed not to be regarded, he fled secretlie to the sea, and was neuer after scene nor heard of.

Thus much out of Rafe Coghill, who affirmeth that this chanced in the daies of Henric the second, about the 23 of his reigne, as John Stow in his sum-marie hath also noted. Which report of theirs in respect of the strangenesse thereof might seme incredible, speciallie to such as be hard of beleefe, and refuse to give faith and credit to any thing but what their owne eyes have seald to their consciences, so that the reading of such wonders as these, is no more beneficall to them, than to carrie a candle before a blind man, or to sing a song to him that is starke deafe. Nevertheless, of all uncomon and rare sights, speciallie of monstrous appearances we ought to be so farre from having little regard; that we should rather in them and by them observe the event and falling out of some future thing, no lesse miraculous in the issue, than they be wonderfull at the sudder sight. This was well noted of a philosopher, who to the purpose (among other matters by him touched) hath spoken no lesse pithilie than crediblie, saying;

Non ferri aut errore aut calu monstra putandum, Cum certas habebant causas, ut trillia monstrant, Unde illis nomen, quare & portentosa vocantur.

The war was mightilie maintained all this while betwixt them of Poitou and Aquitaine, and manie sharpe encounters chanced betwixt the parties, of which the one following the king of Englands lieutenant Robert de Turnham, valiantlie resisted the other that held with the French king under the conduict of William de Roches, & Hugh le Brun earle of March, chief leaders of that faction. But Robert Turnham, together with Saverie de Spauldon, and Gerard de Arie, bare themselves so manfully, that in all combats for the most part the victorie remained on their sides. The Countenies also took part with king John, and continued in dutifull obedience to him, for the which their loiaute he was ready to consider them with princelie gifts and beneficall rewards, in such bountifull sorte, that he gave unto a poble man of that countrie named Spere, the summe of 22 thousand marks, to leue & wage five thousand men to aid him at his coming out into those parties. The archbishop of Bourdeaux, that was brother unto the foresaid Spere, became mercenary for performance of the countenies, and remained in England a long time, because the same countenies were not in all points accomplished.

The bishop of London was sent ambassadour from king John unto the emperor upon certeine earnest business. The duke of Louain, and the earle of Ffloungne were made friends by the French kings will, and promised to invade England with an armie, and to make waie against king John for the withholding of such lands and revenues as they claimed to be due unto them, in right of their wives.
King Philip also undertoketh to follow them within a moneth after they should be entred into England, & thus did the French king seeke to make him strong with friends, which daie fell from king John on ech hand. Godfrey bishop of Winchester, that was son to the lord Richard de L. was departed this life. This yeare the king was on Christmase day at Lechel-burie, where he staid not past one day.

The 14 day of Januarie it began to freeze, and so continued till the 22 of March, with such extremite, that the husbandmen could not make their till, by reason wherof in the summer following, corn began to grow to an excessive price, so that wheat was sold by the quarter at 10 shillings of monie then currant. This prate about the feast of Pentecost, the king (by the advice of his counsell assembled at Portsmouth) prepared a manie of ships, muffled soldiers, and shewed great tokens that he would renew the war, and seeke to be revenged of his ene-mie the French king. The peoples of the realme inducoured themselves also to match the diligence of the king in this preparation, upon an earnest desire to revenge the injuries lately done to the common-wealth.

Now when all things were ready, and the ships fraught with vittels, armour, and all other promisons necessarie, the king came to Portsmouth, there to take the sea, purposing verilie to passe over into France, in hope of such faire promises as his friends of Normandie and Poitou had made, in sending of tentenues to him, to procure him with speed to come to their succours. But as the king was ready to enter on shipboard, Robert archbishop of Cantorburie, and William Sparshall earle of Pembroke came to him, and with manie great reasons went about to persuade him to fraie his iourne. Who although he was verie loath to follow their counsell, yet they put forth so manie doubts and dangers that might follow of his departing the realme at that present, to the hazarding of the whole state, that in the end (fore to his grieve) he was overcomen by their importunate persuasions, and so dismissing the most part of his armie, appointed his brother the earle of Salisburie with a certeine number of knights & men of armes to passe over into Rochell, whither the lord Gessrey the kings base sonne was gone before him, with manie other knights and men of armes.

The lords and other that were dismissed, took it verie ill, considering the great preparation that had bene made for that iourne. But speciallie the mariners were sore offended, cursing the archbishop and the said earle of Penbroke, that were knowne to be authors of so naughty counsell as they take this to be. It was as thought there was neuer so manie ships gotten together at one time before, as were at that present, to haue attended the king: for (as writers haue recozded) there were to the number of fourteene thousand mariners that had brought their ships thither for that purpose. But as the breaking up of this boiage greued others, so it pinched the king so nere the heart, that he being come backe from the sea side to Winchester, repented so much that he had not gone forward with his iourne, that the next daie he returned againe to the coast, and at Portesmouth, entering the sea with his ships, on the fifteenth of Julie he sailed to the Ile of Wight, and waisted by and downe for the space of two daies together, till by aduise of his friends he was perswaded not to aduenture to passe ouer, sith his armie was dismissed and gone home, and so he returned backe to the shoure againe, arriving at Scotland, nere unto Warham, the third daie after his setting forth: yet such as were behind, and halsted after him, thought verelie he had bene gone ouer, and such a hute was spread ouer all, till at length in time the truth was knowne.

At his comming backe (as some write) he charged certeine of the Nobilitie with treason, bicause they did not follow him: whereupon shortly after he punished them verie grauoulie, and peradventure not without some ground of iust cause. For likelie it is, that some greater matter forced him to breake by his iourne, than appeareth in our writers, although Rafe Cogheshall setteth downe some reasons alledged by the archbishop Hubert, and earle Sparshall, to perswade him not to depart the realme. But peradventure other causes there were also of farre moze importance that constrained him so greatlie against his mind & full resolution, both at the first, and now at this second time to returne. ¶ Verelie to bitter my coniecture, it may be that vpon his last determination to go ouer, he gaue new commandement to his lordes to follow him, and they peradventure vsed not such diligence in accomplishing his pleasure therein, as he looked they should haue done: or it may be, when the armie was once discharged, the souldiers made such hast homewards, ech man towards his countrie, that it was no easie matter to bring them backe againe in any convenient time. But howsoeuer it was, as it had bene vpon a change of purpose, he came backe againe (as before ye haue heard.)

the archb. of Canturburie.
Matt. Paris.
Polydor.

The thirtenth of Julie Hubert archbishop of Canturburie departed this life at Tenham, the king not being gratlie soze for his death (as some haue written) bicause he gathered some suspicion that he bare too much good will towards the French king. In verie deed (as some write) the archbishop repented himselfe of nothing so much, as for that he had commended king Iohn to the Noblemen and Peeres of the realme, sith he proued an other manner of man than he looked to haue found him. This archbishop had gouerned the see of Canturburie eleuen yeares, eight moneths, and six daies.

An archbishop chosen.

After his decesse, the monks of Canturburie without knowledge of the king, chose one Reigbold the subprior of their house to be their archbishop, who secretly went to Rome to obtaine his confirmation of the pope. Which thing bred much mischefe and great discord betwixt pope Innocent & king Iohn, since the pope would not confirme the election, bicause he saw some peece of secret practise, till he might vnderstand and be certified by report of sufficient witnesse (for that he wanted the letters commendatorie from the king) that the same election was lawfull and orderlie made. Of this delate also the monks being spædilie aduertised, and to the end they might now recouer the kings fauour, whome they had verie sore offended in not making him partie to the first election, they made request vnto him, that by his nomination it might be lawfull for them to chose an other archbishop.

The king gladlie hereunto assented, requiring them to grant their voices vnto Iohn Gray the bishop of Pozzwich, being both his chapleine and president of his counsell. The monks to gratifie the king obeyed his request, and so electing the same bishop of Pozzwich, they sent their procurators to Rome in the yeare following, to signifie the same vnto the pope, and to require him to confirme this their second election, as vnmindfull of their first, and clearelie aduiliating the same to all intents and purposes. Amongst other that were sent to Rome about this business, Helias de Bzantfeld was one, a manke of great estimation, and had in god credit with the king, who ministered vnto them that were thus sent, sufficient allowance wherewith to beare their charges and expences.

Also at the same time the bishops that were suffragans to the see of Canturburie, sent their procurators to Rome, about a quarrell which they had against the monks there, for that the same monks presumed to proceed to the election of an archbishop without their consent, hauing (as they alledged) a right by ancient decrees and customes to be associated with them in the said elections. But how this matter was answered, ye shall see hereafter. In the meane time, these and other like things procured the pope to reiect both the elections, and of his owne authoritie to nominate the third person, whereby the trouble begun was not a little augmented (as you shall heare hereafter.) Now whilst these procurators were thus occupied in Rome, Philip the French king minding to conquer all that which king Iohn yet held within France, assembled an armie, and comming before the towne of Loches, tooke it, and tooke Gerard de Atie prisoner, that had so long time and with such valiantie defended it. The same time also was Robert de Turnham taken prisoner, who with great manhood had all this while repressed and chastised the rebellious Poitouins.

Moreouer, when the French king had tooke Loches, he went to Chinon, within the which Hubert de Burgh was captaine, a right valiant man of warre as was any where to be found, who hauing prepared all things necessarie for defense, manfullie repelled the Frenchmen, who enforced themselves to win the towne with continuall assaults and alarms, not suffering them within to rest neither day nor night, who yet for certeine daies together, by the valiant encouragement of their captaine defended the towne, with great slaughter of the Frenchmen. Perce the lesse, at length beginning to despaire by reason of their incessant trauell, certeine of them that were somewhat fainthearted stole ouer the walles in the night, and ran to the Frenchmen, and for safeguard of their liues instructed them of the whole estate of the towne. The French vnderstanding that they within were in no small feare of themselves, with such violence came vnto the walles, and renewed the assault vpon all sides, that straightwaies they entred by force. A great number of Englishmen were taken, and amongst other their captaine the foresaid Hubert de Burgh. [This chanced on the vigill of S. Iohn Baptist.]

After this, king Philip tooke diuerse other townes and castels in that countrie, of the which some he rased, and some he fortified and stozed with garisons of his soldiers. This done he passed over the river of Eclair, and won a castell situate nere unto a promontorie or head of land called Crapelitum, which was wont to be a great succour & aid to Englishmen arriving on that coast. The occasion why he made wars thus upon the Britains, was (as some write) for that Queene duke of Britaine, who had married the duchesse Constance, and succeeded in the duchie after his son Arthur, without regard to revenge the death of the same Arthur, was joined in league with king John together with Sauerre de Mauleon, and Almerike de Lusignan, lords of great honour, power, and stoutnesse of stomach.

King John
won the citie of Angiers
by assault.

King John also in this meane while, moved with the increase of these his new associates, and also with desire to revenge so manie injuries and losses suffered at the French kings hands, preparing an armie of men, and a number of ships, took the sea with them and landed at Rochell the ninth of Julie, where he was received with great joy and gladnesse of the people; and no small number of gentlemen and others that inhabited thereabout repaired unto him, offering to aid him to the uttermost of their powers. He therefore with assured hope of good speed departed from thence, and won the towne of Montalban, with a great part of all the countrie thereabouts. Finally he entred into Anjou, and comming to the citie of Angiers, appointed certeine bands of his footmen, & all his light horsemen to compass the towne about, whilst he, with the residue of the footmen, & all the men of armes, did go to assault the gates. Which enterprise with fire and sword he so manfully executed, that the gates being in a moment broken open, the citie was entered and delivered to the soldiers for a price. So that of the citizens some were taken, some killed, and the walls of the citie beaten flat to the ground. This done, he went abroad into the countrie, and put all things that were in his way to the like destruction. Then came the people of the countries next adjoining, of their owne accord to submit themselves unto him, promising to aid him with men and vittels most plentifully.

King John being verie joyfull of this good success, marched towards Poitou, sending out his troops of horsemen to waste the countrie on euery side. In the meane while the French king being here advertised, came forth with his armie readie furnished to resist king John, and by the way encountered with the duke of Britaine, Sauerre de Mauleon, and Almerike de Lusignan, which had bene abroad to spoile the French kings countries. But being now overset with the kings puissance, they were taken, and all their companies stripped out of their armour, to their great confusion. This mishap sore weakened the power and courage of king John. But the French king proud of the victorie, kept on his iourne, and approaching nere unto the place where king John was as then lodged, did cause his tents to be pitched doونه for the first night, and on the morrow after, as one desirous of battell, brought his armie into the fields, ranged in good order and ready to fight.

The like did king John, so that with stout stomachs and eager minds, they stood there in the field ready to trie the matter with dint of sword upon sound of the warning-blast given by the trumpets. Howbeit, by the mediation of certeine graue personages, as well of the spiritualtie as of the temporallie, which were in good estimation with both the princes, a communication was appointed, which took such effect, that a truce was taken betwixt them for the terme of two yeares, the prisoners on either side being released by waie of exchange: and thus the wars ceased for that time. When king Philip returned into France, and king John into Eng'land, where he landed at Portemouth the 12 of December.

About this time came one John Ferentino (so called peradventure A friend), a common name to all the whelps of that litter, for they neuer came into the land as legats but they would be sure to carrie out with them manie large legacies and blisped duties a legat from the pope into England, and passing through the same as it were in visitation, gathered a great summe of monie; and finally at Reading on the morrow after saint Lukes day, celebrated a counsell, which being ended, he caused his coffers to be packed up and sent awaie, hasting himselfe after to depart the realme, and so taking the sea bad England farewell. About the same season also pope Innocent confirmed the authoritie and power which the prior and monks of Canturburie had to elect and choose the archbishop of that see, giuing sentence against the suffragans which claimed a right to be joined with the said prior and monks in the election, as by a letter directed to the same suffragans from the said pope it may more plainelie appeare.

After this it chanced that king John remembring himselfe of the destruction of the citie of Angiers, which (because he was descended from thence) he had before time greatlie loved, began now to repent him, in that he had destroyed it, and therefore with all speed he took order to haue it againe repaired, which was done in most beautifull wise, to his great cost and expences, which he might haue saved, had not his foolish rashnesse driuen him to attempt that, whereof upon sober aduicement afterwards he was ashamed. But what will not an ordinarie man do in the full tide of his furie; much more princes & great men, whose anger is relembed to the roying of a lion, euen upon light occasions oftentimes, to satiffie their vnbridled and vaine glorie affections, which carrie them with a swift and full streame into such follies and dotages as are vnderstanded for their degrees. Where to assenteth the poet, saying,

magni regisque ducisque Delirant sepe, et vitionem peste laborant, Stultitijque suis sepe urbes exisio dant, Imperijque sibi miserrimum caede lucrantes.

Howeuer, in this yeare about Candlemasse, the king caused the 13 part of euery mans goods, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the temporallie, to be leuied and gathered to his vse, all men murmuring at such doings, but none being so hardie as to gainsaie the kings pleasure, except onelie Geoffrey the archbishop of Poike, who thereupon departing secretlie out of the realme, accused all those that laid any hands to the collection of that payment, within his archbishopricke of Poike. Also upon the 17 of Januarie then last past, about the middle of the night, there rose such a tempest of wind upon a sudden, that manie houses were overthrowne therewith, and sheepe and other cattell destroyed and buried in the drifts of snow, which as then laye verie deepe euery where upon the ground.

The order of strict priuies began about this time, and increased maruellouslie within a short season. And the emperor who came ouer into England in this yeare, where he was most roiallie receiued by king John, who taking counsell with the said emperor to renew the warre against the French king (because he was promised great aid at his hands for the furnishing of the same) gaue vnto him at his departing forth of the realme, great sommes of monie in hand towards the payment of such soldiers as he should leuie for this businesse.

In this meane while, the strife depended still in the court of Rome betwixt the two elected archbishops of Canturburie, Reginald and John. But after

Stephen Langton chosen archbishop of Canturbu-rie by the pope's appointment.

after the pope was fullie informed of the manner of their elections, he disanulled them both, and procured by his papall authoritie the monks of Canturburie (of whome manie were then come to Rome about that matter) to chose one Stephen Langton the cardinal of S. Chyppogon an Englishman borne, and of god estimation and learning in the court of Rome to be their archbishop. The monks at the first were loth to consent thereto, alledging that they might not lawfullie do it without consent of their king, and of their convent.

But the pope as it were taking the word out of their mouths, said unto them: Do ye not consider that we haue full authoritie and power in the church of Canturburie: neither is the assent of kings or princes to be looked for upon elections celebrated in the presence of the apostolike see. Wherefore I command you by vertue of your obedience, and upon paine of cursing, that you being such and so manie here as are sufficient for the election, to chose him to your archbishop, whome I shall appoint to you for father and pastor of your soules. The monks doubting to offend the pope, consented all of them to gratifie him, except Helias de Wyntfield, who refused. And so the foresaid Stephen Langton being elected of them, was confirmed of the pope, who signified by letters the whole state thereof to king John, commending the said Stephen as archbishop unto him.

swores to the pope.

The king soe offended in his mind that the bishop of Norwich was thus put beside that dignitie, to the which he had advanced him, caused forthwith all the goods of the monks of Canturburie to be confiscate to his use, and after banished them the reime, as well I meane those at home, as those that were at Rome, and herewith wrote his letters unto the pope, giving him to understand for answer, that he would neuer consent that Stephen which had bene brought by all waies conuerfant with his enemies the Frenchmen, should now enjoy the rule of the bishopricke and dioces of Canturburie. Whereupon, he declared in the same letters, that he marvelled not a little what the pope ment, in that he did not consider how necessarie the friendship of the king of England was to the see of Rome, sith there came more gains to the Romane church out of that kingdome, than out of any other realme on this side the mountaines. He added hereto, that for the liberties of his crowne he would stand to the death, if the matter so required. And as for the election of the bishop of Norwich unto the see of Canturburie, sith it was profitable to him and to his realme, he meant not to release it.

How gainfull England
was to the court of Rome

Whereupon, he declared that if he might not be heard and haue his mind, he would suerlie restraine the passages out of this realme, that none should go to Rome, least his land should be so emptied of monie and treasure, that he should want sufficient ability to beat backe and expell his enemies that might attempt inuasion against the same. A little of all he concluded, sith the archbishops, bishops, abbats, and other ecclesiasticall persons, as well of his realme of England, as of other his lands and dominions, were sufficientlie furnished with knowlege, that he would not go for anie need that should dzine him thereto, to seeke iustice or iudgement at the prescript of any foreign persons.

The popes
answer unto
the king.

The pope greatlie maruelling hereat, wrote againe to the king, requiring him to abstaine from the spoiling of those men that were priuiledged by the canons of the church, that he would place the monks againe in their house and possessions, and receite the archbishop canonically elected and confirmed, the which for his learning and knowledge, as well in the liberal sciences, as in holie scripture, was thought worthy to be admitted to a prebend in Paris; and what estimation he himselfe had of him it appeared, in that he had written to him thrice since he was made cardinall, declaring that although he was minded to call him to his seruice, yet he was glad that he was promoted to an higher ronne; adding further, how there was good cause that he should haue consideration of him, because he was borne within his land, of father and mother that were his faithfull subjects, and for that he had a prebend in the church of Pothe, which was greater and of more dignitie than that he had in Paris. Whereby not onelie by reason of flesh and blood, but also by hauing ecclesiasticall dignitie and office, it could not be but that he loued him and his realme with sincere affection.

Spanie other reasons the pope alledged in his letters to king John, to haue perswaded him to the allowing of the election of Stephen Langton. But king John was so far from giuing care to the popes admonitions, that he with more crueltie handled all such, not onelie of the spirituality, but also of the temporality, which by any manner means had aided the foresaid Stephen. The pope being herof aduertised, thought god not to suffer such contempt of his authoritie, as he interpreted it; namelie, in a matter that touched the iniurious handling of men within orders of the church. Which example might procure hinderance, not to one priuat person alone, but to the whole estate of the spirituality, which he would not suffer in any wise to be suppressed. Wherefore he decreed with speed to deuise remedie against that large increasing mischefe. And though there was no speedier waie to redresse the same, but by excommunication, yet he would not vse it at the first towards so mightie a prince, but gaue him libertie and time to consider his offense and trespasses so committed.

These things being brought to this issue, the further narration of them shall staie for a time, till I haue told you of a little trouble which about this time happened in London. For upon the seauenth of June, the bailiffes of London, Roger Winchesser and Edmund Hardell were discharged, and Serle the mercer and Hugh of saint Albons chosen in their rowmes. The two former bailiffes were discharged and committed to prison by the kings commandement, upon displeasure taken against them, because they had resisted his purueier of wheat, and would not suffer him to conueie anie of that kind of graine out of the citie, till the citie was storied. The thirtie & fine rulers of the citie, hauing fulfilled the kings commandement to them directed for the discharging of those bailiffes, and imprisoning them, did after take aduice together, and appointed a certaine number of themselves with other to ride vnto the king, as then being at A. angley, to obtaine pardon for the said bailiffes, and so coming thither, they made such excuse in the matter, shewing further, that at the same season there was such scarcitie of wheat in the citie, that the common people were at point to haue made an insurrection about the same. By which means, and through friendship which they had in the court, the king was so satisfied, that he released them from prison, and pardoned their offenses.

Also upon the first of October, Henrie the sonne of king John, begotten of his wife queene Isabel, was bozine at Winchesser, who after succeeded his father in the kingdome. But now againe to our purpose. The pope perceiuing that king John continued still in his former mind (which he called obstinacie) sent ouer his bulles into England, directed to William bishop of London, to Eustace bishop of Ebie, and to Gauger bishop of Worcester, commanding them that unless king John would suffer peaceable the archbishop of Canturburie to occupie his see, and his monks their abbie, they should put both him and his land under the sentence of interdiction, denouncing him and his land plainlie accursed. And further he wrote expresse letters vnto all the suffragans of the church of Canturburie, that they should by vertue of their obedience, which they ought to the apostolike see, receiue and obeye the archbishop Stephen for their father and metropolitane.

Romans, that is such chappelines strangers as be longed to the pope.

These bishops with other to them associate, made instant request and suit to the king for the obteyning of the popes commendement, and to eschew the censures of the church, but that was in vaine: for the king in a great rage swore, that if either they or any other presumed to put his land under interdiction, he would incontinentlie thereupon send all the prelates within the realme out of the same vnto the pope, and seize all their goods vnto his owne vse. And further he added, that what Romans sooner he found within the precinct of any his dominions, he would put out their eyes, and slit their noses, and so send them packing to Rome, that by such marks they might be knowne from all other nations of the world. And herewith he commanded the bishops to packe out of his sight, if they loued their owne health and preferuation.

The mondaie in the passion weeke faith March West. The king and realme put vnder the popes curse.

Hereupon the said bishops departed, and according to the popes commission to them sent, vpon the euen of the Annuntiation of our Ladie, denounced both the king and the realme of England accursed, and farthermore caused the doores of churches to be closed vp, and all other places where diuine seruice was accustomed to be vsed, first at London, and after in all other places where they came. When perceiving that the king ment not to stope for all this which they had done, but rather sought to be reuenged vpon them, they fled the realme, and got them ouer vnto Stephen the archbishop of Canturburie, to wit, William bishop of London, Eustace bishop of Ely, Malger bishop of Worcester, Joceline bishop of Bath, and Giles bishop of Hereford.

Anno Reg. 10. The dealing of the king after the interdiction was pronounced.

The king taking this matter in verie great displeasure, seized vpon all their temporalities, and conuerted the same to his vse, and persecuted such other of the prelacie as he knew to fauour their doings, banishing them the realme, and seizing their goods also into his hands. Wherof the most part of the prelates wiselie provided for themselves in this point, so that they would not depart out of their houses, except they were compelled by force, which when the kings officers perceived, they suffered them to remaine still in their abbies, and other habitations, because they had no commission to vse any violence in expelling them. But their goods they did confiscat to the kings vse, allowing them onelie meat and drinke, and that verie barelie in respect of their former allowance.

In heauie time for churchmen.

¶ It was a miserable time now for preests and churchmen, which were spoiled on euerie hand, without finding remedie against those that offered them wrong. It is reported that in the borders of Wales, the officers of a thiriffe brought before the king a fellow which had robbed and slaine a preest, desiring to vnderstand his pleasure what should be done with that offender: vnto whome the king made this answer, He hath slaine mine enimie, and therefore set him at libertie.

Math. Paris.

The king also doubting least the pope should proceed further, and absolue all his subiects of their allegiance which they ought to him, and that his lords would happlie reuolt and forsake him in this his trouble, toke hostages of them whom he most suspected. And as the messengers, which were sent abroad for that purpose, came vnto the lord William de Breuse, requiring to haue his sonnes for the said purpose, his wife (like a quicke and hasty dame) taking the word out of his husbands mouth, made this round answer, that she would not deliuer his sonnes vnto king John, who already had slaine his sonne Richard, whom he ought rather honourable to haue loved and preferred. These words being signified vnto the king, yet him in such an heat against his wife, that he would have slaine her for the same, but she fled to the king, who was glad together with his wife and children to flee out of the realme into Ireland for safe guard of their liues.

London bridge repaired.

¶ Whereas before this time London bridge was made of timber, and was ruled, gilded & repaid by a fraternitie of collegers of priors, this yeere by great aid of the citizens of London and others passing that waie, the same bridge was begun to be made of stone. And at the same yeere, Henry Quierles in Southwarke was begun to be repaired. The same yeere also, the citizens of London made such suit vnto the king, that he granted vnto them by his letters patents, licence to choose for themselves a maior, and two shiriffes euerie yeere. After which grant vnto them confirmed, they chose for their maior, Henrie Fitz Alwin, who was woome and charged at that present maior of that citie, vpon the day of Michaelmas the archangel, in the tenth yeere of king John his reigne. On the same day and yeere, were Peter Duke & Thomas, his lieges for shiriffes, thus the name of bailiffes from thenceforth was clearelie extinguished.

But here ye haue to vnderstand, that this Henrie Fitz Alwin had bene maior of London long before this time, euer from the first yeere of king Richard (as John Stow hath gathered out of ancient instruments and records) vnto this present tenth yeere of king John, and now vpon grant made to the citizens, that it should be lawfull for them to choose euerie yeere a maior, and two shiriffes, for the better gouernment of their citie, the said Henrie Fitz Alwin was newlie by them elected, and likewise afterwards from yeere to yeere, till he departed this life, which chanced in the yeere 1213, and fiftenth of king Johns reigne, so that he continued maior of the same citie of London, by the terme of twentie and foure yeeres.

John Stow.

¶ Now therefore because it appeareth here how the gouernors of the citie of London had their names altered for their greater honour, and the state of gouernment thereby partlie changed, or rather couermed; I haue thought good (though verie brieflie) to touch somewhat the signification of this word Maire, before I proceed any further with the rest of this historie. The ancient inhabitants of Franconia, or Frankenland, from whence the Frenchmen are descended, and their neighbors the old Saxons, of whom the Englishmen haue their originall, being people of Germanie, and descended (as Berolus saith) of the old Hebrewes, haue retained manie Hebrew words, either from the beginning, or else borrowed them abroad in other regions which they conquered, passing by force of armes through a great part of the world. For no doubt, by conuersation with those people whom they subdued, they brought home into their owne countrie and tong manie borrowed words, so that their language hath no small store of them fetched out of sundrie strange tonges.

The signification of the word Maire, Wulf. Laz. Berolus.

¶ Now among other old words remaining in their tong, this word Mar was one, which in Hebrew signifieth Dominus, (that is to saie, lord) but pronounced now somewhat corruptlie Maire. So as it is to be supposed, hereof it came to passe that the head officer and lieutenant to the prince, as well in London as in other cities and townes of the realme, are called by that name of maior, though in the cities of London and Poike, for an augmentation of honour by an ancient custome (through ignorance what the title of maire doth signifie) they haue an addition, and are intituled by the name of lord maire, where Maire simple pronounced of it selfe, signifieth no lesse than lord, without any such addition. Thus much for the name of Maire. And now to proceed.

Lord William de Breuse.

The eschequer remoued.

King Iohn holding his Christmasse this yeare at Bristow, let forth a commandement, whereby he restrained the taking of wild foule. About the same time, Henrie duke of Suaben came into England from the emperor Otto, and receiuing no small portion of monie of the king, departed backe into his owne countrie againe. In the vigill of the Epiphanie also, the kings second sonne was borne, and named Richard after his uncles name. And the court of the eschequer was remoued from Westminster vnto Portsmouth. Moreover in the same yeare, Walter Gray was made lord chancelour, who in all things studied to satisfie the kings will and purpose, for the which he incurred great indignation of the cleargie, and other that fauoured not the proceedings of the king.

¶ It was suerlie a rufull thing to consider the estate of this realme at that present, when as the king neither trusted his pères, neither the nobilitie fauoured the king: no, there were verie few that trusted one another, but ech one hid & hoarded by his wealth, looking daile when another should come and enter vpon the spoile. The communalitie also grew into factions, some fauouring, & some cursing the king, as they bare affection. The cleargie was likewise at dissention, so that nothing preuailed but malice and spite, which brought forth and spred abroad the fruits of disobedience to all good lawes and orders, greatlie to the disquieting of the whole state. So that herein we haue a perfect view of the perplexed state of princes, chaſtic when they are ouerswaied with forren & prophane power, and not able to assure themselves of their subiects allegiance and loialtie. Alexander II.
of Scots.

King Iohn notwithstanding that the realme was thus wholie interdicted and bered, so that no preests could be found to saie seruice in churches or chapels, made no great account thereof as touching any offense towards God or the pope: but rather mistrusting the hollow hearts of his people, he took a new oath of them for their faithfull allegiance, and immediately thereupon assembled an armie to go against Alexander king of Scots, vnto whome (as he had heard) diuerse of the nobilitie of this realme were fled, which Alexander was the second of that name that had ruled the Scots, and latelie before was entered into the rule as lawfull successor to the crowne of Scotland, by the death of his father R. William.

In this meane while also Stephan archbishop of Canturburie lamenting (as some haue reported) the state of his native countrie, and yet not minding to giue ouer his hold, obtained of pope Innocent, that vpon certeine daies it might be lawfull for an appointed number of preests within the realme of England, to celebrate diuine seruice, that is to say, for those of conuentuall churches once in the weeke. But the monks of the white order were forbidden to vse that priuilege, because in the beginning of the interdiction they had at the appointment of their principall abbat presumed to celebrate the sacraments without the popes consent or knowledge.

In like manner on the other side, king Iohn hauing his armie in a readinesse, hasted forth towards the borders of Scotland, and comming to the castell

But king Alexander wanting power to giue him battell, sought to come vnto some friendlie agreement with him, and so by counsell of his lordes, calling off his armour, he came to the king, and for a great summe of gold (or 11 thousand marks of siluer as some write) with much adoe he purchased peace, deliuering two of his daughters in hostage for more assurance of his dealing. 10 turne from Forham, which was about the 24 of June, shewed himselfe not a little displeased with those of the nobilitie, which had refused to attend vpon him in that iournie, hauing receiued streit commandement from him to attend vpon him at that time. Certes the cause why they refused to follow him, was euident, as they said, in that they knew him to stand accursed by the pope. About the same time also, when cozne began to wax ripe, to reuenge himselfe of them that had refused to go with him in that iournie, he caused the pales of all the parks & forests which he had within his realme to be throtene downe, & the diches to be made plaine, that the deere breaking out and ranging abroad in the cozne fields, might destroe & eat vp the same before it could be re-20 pened, for which act (if it were so in deed) manie a bitter curse proceeded from the mouths of the poore husbandmen towards the kings person, and not without thilie. Moreover in this season the Welshmen (which thing had not bene seene afore time) came vnto 30 Woodstoke, and there did homage vnto the king, although the same was chargeable, as well to the rich as the poore so to come out of their countrie.

Matth. Paris.

About the same time also, it chanced that a preest slue a woman at Driford, and when the kings officers could not find him that had committed the murder, they apprehended three other preests not guiltie of the fact, and straightway hanged them vp without iudgement. With which crueltie others of the Universitie being put in feare, departed thence in great 40 numbers, and came not thither againe of a long time after, some of them repairing to Cambridge, and some to Reading to applie their studies in those places, leauing Driford void. The same yeare one Hugh archdeacon of Welles, and keeper of the kings great scale, was nominated bishop of Lincoln; and here-50 withall he craued licence to go ouer into France vnto the archbishop of Rouen, that he might be consecrated of him. Wherewith the king was contented and gladlie gaue him leaue, who no sooner got ouer into Normandie, but he straight took the high waie to Roine, and there receiued his consecration of Stephan archbishop of Canturburie. Now when the king vnderstood this matter, and saw the dulnesse of the bishop, he was in a wonderfull chafe toward him, and therupon made post-sale of all his goods, and receiued the profit of the reuenues belonging to the see of Lincoln for his owne vse.

¶ There liued in those daies a diuine named Alexander Cementarius, surnamed Theologus, who by his preaching incensed the king greatlie vnto all crueltie (as the monks and friers saie) against his subiects, affirming that the generall scourge wherewith the people were afflicted, chanced not through the princes fault, but for the wickednesse of his people, for the king was but the rod of the Lords iustise, and to this end a prince was ordeined, that he might rule the people with a rod of iron, and breake them as an earthen vessel, to chaine the mighty in fetters, & the noble men in iron manacles. He did see (as it should seeme) the euill disposed humors of the people concerning their dutifull obedience which they ought to haue borne to their naturall prince king Iohn, and therefore as a doctrine most necessarie in that dangerous time, he taught the people how they were by

by Gods lawes bound in dutie to obeie their lawfull prince, and not through any wicked perswasion of butte heads and lewd discourters, to be carried away to forget their loiall allegiance, and so to fall into the damnable sinke of rebellion.

He went about also to proue with likelie arguments, that it appertained not to the pope, to haue to do concerning the tempozall possessions of any kings: other potentats touching the rule and government of their subiects, sith no power was granted to Peter (the speciall and cheefe of the apostles of the Lord) but onlie touching the church, and matters appertaining thereunto. By such doctrine of him set forth, he wan in such wise the kings fauour, that he obtained manie great preferments at the kings hands, and was abbat of saint Austines in Canturburie: but at length, when his manners were notified to the pope, he toke such order for him, that he was despoiled of all his goods and benefices, so that afterwards he was driuen in great miserie to beg his bread from doze to doze, as some write. This did he procure to himselfe by telling the trueth against that beast, whose hornes were pricking at euerie christian prince, that he might set himselfe in a seat of supremacie aboue all principalities: so that we may saie,

In audaces non est audacia tuta.

Furthermore, about the same time the king tared the Jewes, and greuouslie tormented and emprisoned them, because diuers of them would not willinglie pay the summes that they were tared at. Amongst other, there was one of them at Bristow, which would not consent to giue anie fine for his delinquence: wherefore by the kings commandement he was put vnto this penance, that euerie daie, till he would agree to giue to the king those ten thousand marks that he was seized at, he should haue one of his teeth plucked out of his head. By the space of seauen daies together he stood steadfast, losing euerie of those daies a tooth, but on the eight day, when he shuld come to haue the eight tooth and the last (so he had but eight in all) drawne out, he paid the monie to saue that one, who with more wisdom and lesse paine might haue done so before, and haue saved his seauen teeth, which he lost with such torments, for those homelie toothdrawers bled no great cunning in plucking them forth (as may be coniectured.)

A Jew hath his teeth drawne out.

Math. Paris. King Iohn passeth ouer into Ireland. Polydor. Math. Paris.

Whilost king Iohn was thus occupied, newes came to him, that the Irish rebels made foule worke and sore annoied the English subiects. He therefore assembling a mightie armie, imbarked at Penbroke in Wales, and so hasting towards Ireland, arriued there the twentie five of Maie, and brought the people in such feare immediatlie vpon his arrival, that all those that inhabited vpon the sea coasts in the champaine countries, came in, and yielded themselues, receiuing an oth to be true and faithfull vnto him. There were twentie of the cheefest rulers within Ireland, which came to the king at his coming to Dublin, and there did to him homage and fealtie as appertained. The king at the same time ordeined also, that the English lawes should be vsed in that land, and appointed shiriffes and other officers to haue the order of the countrie, to rule the same according to the English ordinances. After this, he marched forward into the land, and toke diuerse fortresses and strong holds of his enemies, which fled before him, for feare to be apprehended, as Walter de Lacie and manie other. At length, comming into the countrie of Meth, he besieged a castell, wherein the wife of William de Breuse, and hir sonne named also William were inclosed, but they found means to escape before the castell was twone, though afterwards they were taken in the Ile of Man, and sent by the king into England, where they were so strait-lie kept within the castell of Windsor, that (as the same went) they were famished to death.

We read in an old historie of Flanders, written by one whose name is not knotone, but printed at Lions by Guillaume Rouille, in the yeare 1562, that the said ladie, wife to the lord William de Breuse, presented vpon a time vnto the queene of England, a gift of foure hundred kine, and one bull, of colour all white, the eares excepted, which were red. Although this tale may seeme incredible, yet if we shall consider that the said Breuse was a lord marcher, and had goodlie possessions in Wales, and on the marches, in which countreies the most part of the peoples substance consisteth in cattell, it may carrie with it the more likelihood of truth. And suerlie the same author writeth of the iourne made this yeare into Ireland, so sensible, and namelie touching the manners of the Irish, that he seemeth to haue had good informations, sauing that he misteth in the names of men and places, which is a fault in manner common to all forreine writers. Touching the death of the said ladie, he saith, that within eleuen daies after she was committed to prison here in England, she was found dead, sitting betwixt hir sonnes legs, who likewise being dead, saie directed by against a wall of the chamber, wherein they were kept with hard pittance (as writers do report.) William the father escaped, and got away into France.

Thus the more part of the Irish people being brought vnder, he appointed Iohn Cray the bishop of Norwich, to be his deputie there, removing out of that office Hugh Lacie, which bare great rule in that quarter before. The bishop then being appointed deputie and cheefe iustice of Ireland, reformed the coine there, causing the same to be made of like weight and finenesse to the English coine, so that the Irish monie was currant, as well in England, as in Ireland, being of the like weight, forme, and finenesse to the English. Moreover, those that inhabited the wood countries and the mountaine places, though they would not as then submit themselves, he would not at that time further pursue, because winter was at hand, which in that countrie approacheth timelie in the yeare. Having thus subdued the more part of all Ireland, and ordered things there at his pleasure, he toke the sea againe with much triumph, and landed in England about the thirtieth day of August.

The king returneth into England.

From hence he made hast to London, and at his comming thither, toke counsell how to recouer the great charges and expences that he had bene at in this iourne, and by the aduise of William de Breuse, Robert de Turnham, Reigbold de Cornhill, and Richard de Sparsh, he caused all the cheefe prelates of England to assemble before him at S. Brides in London. So that thither came all the abbats, abbes, ses, templers, hospitallers, keepers of farmes and possessions of the order of Clugnie, and other such forreners as had lands within this realme belonging to their houses. All which were constrained to paie such a greuous tax, that the whole amounted to the summe of an hundred thousand pounds. The monks of the Cisterce order, otherwise called white monks, were constrained to paie 40 thousand pounds of silver at this time, all their priuileges to the contrary notwithstanding. Moreover, the abbats of that order might not get licence to go to their generall chapter that yeare, which yearelie was used to be holden, least their complaint should moue all the world against the king, for his too hard and seuerer handling of them.

The tax levied.

In the summer following, about the 18 day of Iulie, king Iohn with a mightie armie went into Wales, and passing forth into the inner parts of the countrie, he came into Snowdon, beating downe all that came in his way, so that he subdued all the rulers and princes, without contradiction. And to be the better assured for their subiection in time following, he took pledges of them, to the number of 28, so returned to Album Monasterium on the daie of the Assumption of our ladie, from whence he first set forth into the Welsh confines. In the same yeare also, the pope sent two legats into England, the one named Pandulph a lawier, and the other Durand a templer, who coming unto king John, exhorted him with manie terrible wordes to leaue his stubborn disobedience to the church, and to reforme his misdoings. The king for his part quietlie heard them, and bringing them to Portsmouth, being not farre distant from the place where he met them upon his returne forth of Wales had much conference with them; but at length, when they perceiued that they could not haue their purpose, neither for restitution of the goods belonging to priests which he had seized upon, neither of those that appertained to certeine other persons, which the king had gotten also into his hands, by meanes of the controuersie betwixt him and the pope the legats departed, leaving him accursed, and the land interdicted, as they found it at their coming.

¶ Touching the manner of this interdiction there haue bene diuerse opinions, some haue said, that the land was interdicted throughlie, and the churches and houses of religion closed vp, that no where was anie diuine seruice used: but it was not so streit, for there were diuerse places occupied with diuine seruice also that time, by certeine priuiledges purchased either then or before. Children were also chiselled, and men houseled and annoied through all the land, except such as were in the bill of excommunication by name expessed. But to our purpose.

King John, after that the legats were returned toward Rome againe, punished diuerse of those persons which had refused to go with him into Wales, in like manner as he had done those that refused to go with him into Scotland: he took now of ech of them for euerie knightes fee two marks of siluer, as before is recited. About the same time also, Reginald erle of Bullongne being accursed in like manner as king John was, for certeine oppressions done to poore men, and namelie to certeine priests, fled ouer into England, because the French king had banished him out of France.

The chiefest cause of the French kings displeasure towards this earle, may seeme to proceed of the amitie and league which was concluded betwixt king John, and the said earle, in the first yeare of the said kings reigne, whereby they bound themselves either to other, not to make anie peace, or to take anie truce with the king of France, without either of theirs consent first thereto had, and that if after anie agreement taken betwixt them and the king of France, he should chance to make warre against either of them, then should the other aid and assist him, against whom such warre should be made, to the utmost of his power.

This league was accorded to remaine for euer betwixt them and their heires, with suerties sworn on either part: and for the king of England, these, whose names insue, William Marshall earle of Penbrooke, Ranulfe earle of Chester, Robert earle of Leicester, Baldwin earle of Alchemarle, William earle of Arundell, Ralph earle of Angli, Robert de Mellet, Hugh de Courney, William de Baen, Geoffrey de Cella, Roger constable of Chester, Ralph Fitz Water, William de Albanie, Robert de Ros, Richard de Montficht, Roger de Clare, Saer de Quincie, William de Montchenise, Peter de Walleis, William de Pore, John de Stagno, Adam de Post, Robert de Turnham, William Mallet, Guisace de Mesle, Peter de Wus, William de Presennie, Hubert de Burgh, William de Hansey, and Peter Saunier. For the earle, these were suerties, Anselme de Baen, Guy de Schans, Ralph the said earles brother, &c. But now to returne.

After that the earle of Bullongne was expelled out of France (as before ye haue heard) he came ouer to king John, and was of him iustlie receiued, hauing three hundred poundes of reuenues in land to him assigned within England, for the which he did homage and fealtie unto him. Shortlie after this also, died William de Bruce the elder, which fled from the face of king John out of Ireland into France, and departing this life at Corbell, was buried at Paris in the abbey of S. Medo.

In the meane time pope Innocent, after the returne of his legats out of England, perceiuing that king John would not be ordered by him, determined with the consent of his cardinals and other counsellours, and also at the instant suit of the English bishops and other prelates being there with him, to depriue king John of his kinglie state, and so first absolved all his subiects and vassals of their othe of allegiance made vnto the same king, and after depriued him by solenne protestation of his kinglie administration and dignitie, and lastlie signified that his deprivation vnto the French king and other christian princes, admonishing them to pursue king John, being thus depriued, forsaken, and condemned as a common enimie to God and his church. He ordeined furthermore, that whosoever imploied goods or other aid to vanquish and ouercome that disobedient prince, should remaine in assured peace of the church, as well as those which went to visit the sepulchre of our Lord, not onlie in their goods and persons, but also in suffrages for sauing of their soules.

But yet that it might appeare to all men, that nothing could be moze iust vnto his holinesse, than to haue king John to repent his trespasses committed, and to aske forgiveness for the same, he appointed Pandulph, which lastlie before was returned to Rome, with a great number of English erles, to go into France, together with Stephan the archbishop of Canturburie, and the other English bishops, giuing him in commandement, that repairing vnto the French king, he should communicate with him all that which he had appointed to be done against king John, and to exhort the French king to make warre vpon him, as a person for his wickednesse communicated. Wherevnto this Pandulph was commanded by the pope, if he saw cause, to go ouer into England, and to deliuer vnto king John such letters as the pope had written for his better instruction, and to seeke by all means possible to draw him from his naughty opinion.

In the meane time, when it was bruted through the realme of England, that the pope had released the people & absolved them of their othe of fealtie to the king, and that he was depriued of his gouernement by the popes sentence, by little and little a great number both of souldiers, citizens, burgesses, capteins and constables of castles, leauing their charges, & bishops with a great multitude of priests revolting from him, and abandoning his companie and patience, secretly stole awaie, and got ouer into France.

Notwithstanding that diuerse in respect of the popes curse, and other considerations therein making, bitterlie refused in this manner to obeye king John, yet there were manie others that did take his part, and mainteined his quarrell vnto earnestlie, as his brother William earle of Salisburie, Alberich de Here erle of Orford, Geoffrey Fitz Peter lord of

The same yeare king Iohn held his Christmase at Windsor and in the Lent following, on midlent Sunday being at London, he honoured the lord Alexander sonne and heire to the king of Scots, with the high order of knighthood. And (as I find it mentioned by some writers) whereas he understood how there were diverse in Scotland, that contemning their natural lord and king by reason of his great age, king Iohn went thither with an armie to repress the rebels, and being come thither, he sent his men of war into the inner parts of the country, who following the coasts, took Guthred Macwilliam capteine of them that moved sedition, whom king Iohn caused to be hanged on a paire of gallowses. This Guthred was descended of the line of the ancient Scottish kings, and being assisted with the Irishmen and Scots that favoured not the race of the kings that presentlie reigned, wrought them much trouble, as his father (named Donald) had done before him, sometime secretly under hand, and sometime againe by way of open rebellion.

The Welshmen made rebellion.
March, Paris.

Anno Reg. 14.

King Iohn hangeth the Welsh prisoners.

Shortlie after, the Welshmen began to stirre also, who rushing out of their owne confines, fell upon their next neighbours within the English marches, wasted the countrie, and overthrow diverse castles flat to the ground. Whereof the king having knowledge, assembled a mightie armie out of hand, and comming to Nottingham, he hanged by the Welsh hostages which the last yeare he had received, to the number of eight and twenty young striplings. And by reason he was now set in a marvellous chafe, he roughly proceeded against all those whom he knew not to favour his cause: some he discharged of their offices, other he deprived of their captainships and other honours, & revoked certayne privileges & immunities granted to monks, priests, & men of religion.

Furthermore, having his armie ready to passe on into Wales, he received letters the same time, both from the king of Scots, and from his daughter the wife of Leoline prince of Wales, containing in effect the advertisement of one matter, which was to let him know, that if he proceeded on his journey, he should either through treason be slaine of his owne lords, or else be delivered to be destroyed of his enemies. The king iudging no lesse, but that the tenor of the letters contained a truth, brake up his armie and returned to London. From whence he sent messengers unto all such lords as he suspected, commanding them to send unto him hostages for moze assurance of their fidelities. The lords durst not disobey his commandement, but sent their sons, their nephews, and other their kinsmen, accordinglie as he required, and so his rancour was appeased for a time. But Eustace de Melcie, Robert Fitz Walter, and Stephan Kidell, being accused and suspected of the treason for the said treason, were glad to flee the realme, Melcie departing into Scotland, and the other two into France.

The same yeare, the church of S. Marie Oueres, and all the buildings upon London bridge on both sides the same, were consumed with fire, which was iudged to be a signification of some mishap to follow. The king held his Christmase this yeare at Westminster, with no great traine of knights about him. About the same time Geoffrey archbishop of York departed this life, after he had remained in exile about a seaven yeares. But now to returne againe to the practices of the popes legats.

We shall understand, the French king being requested by Pandulph the popes legat, to take the warre in hand against king Iohn, was easilie persuaded thereto of an inward hatred that he bare unto our king, and thereupon with all diligence made his prouision of men, ships, munition and vittell, in purpose to passe over into England: and now was his nauie ready rigged at the mouth of Saine, and he in greatest forwardnesse, to take his journey. When Pandulph upon good considerations thought first to goe softly, or at the least wise to send into England, before the French armie should land there, and to assaile once againe, if he might induce the king to shew himselfe reformatable unto the popes pleasure: king Iohn having knowledge of the French kings purpose and ordinance, assembled his people, and lodged with them alongst by the coast towards France, that he might resist his enemies, and keepe them off from landing.

Here writers declare, that he had got together such an armie of men out of all the parts of his realme, both of lords, knights, gentlemen, peomen, & other of the commons, that notwithstanding all the prouision of vittells that might possible be recovered, there could not be found sufficient store to susteine the huge multitude of them that were gathered alongst the coast, namelie at Dover, Feuertham, Gipewich, and other places. Whereupon the capitains discharged and sent home a great number of the commons, retaining onelie the men of armes, peomen, and freeholders, with the crossbowes and archers. There came likewise to the kings aid at the same time, the bishop of Norwich out of Ireland, bringing with him five hundred men of armes, & a great sort of other horsemen.

To conclude, there was esteemed of able men assembled together in the armie on Warhamdowne, that of chosen men of armes, and valiant peomen, and other armed men, the number of fiftie thousand: so that if they had bene all of one mind, and well bent towards the service of their king and defense of their countrie, there had not bene a prince in Christendome, but that they might have bene able to have defended the realme of England against him. He had also prouided a nauie of ships farre stronger than the French kings, ready to fight with them by sea, if the case had so required.

But as he lay thus ready, nere to the coast, to withstand and beat backe his enemies, there arrived at Dover two Templers, who comming before the king, declared unto him that they were sent from Pandulph the popes legat, who for his profit coveted to talke with him: for he had (as they affirmed) meane to suppose, whereby he might be reconciled, both to God and his church, although he were adiudged in the court of Rome, to have forfeited all the right which he had to his kingdom.

The legat
Pandulph
cometh ouer.

The king vnderstanding the meaning of the messengers, sent them backe againe to bring ouer the legat, who incontinentlie came ouer to Douer, at whose arrivall when the king was aduertised, he went thither, and receiued him with all due honour and reuerence. Now after they had talked together a little, and courtesiously saluted each other (as the course of humanitie required) the legat (as it is reported) uttered these words following.

The sawcie speech of proud Pandulph the popes lewd legat, to king John, in the presumptuous popes behalfe.

Now not thinke that you are ignorant, how pope Innocent, to do that which to his dutie apperteineth, hath both absolved your subjects of that oth which they made vnto you at the beginning, and also taken from you the gouernance of England, according to your deserts, and finallye giuen commandement vnto certeine princes of Christendome, to expell you out of this kingdom and to place an other in your roome; so worthwhile to punish you for your disobedience and contempt of religion: and that Philip king of France, with the first being readie to accomplish the popes commandement, hath an armie in a readinesse, and with his nauie noblie decked, rigged and furnished in all points, lieth at the mouth of the riuer of Saine, looking for a prosperous wind, that as soone as it cometh about, he may saile therewith hither into England, trusting (as he saith) with the helpe of your owne people (which neither name you, nor will take you for their king) to spoile you of your kingdome with small adoe, and to conquer it at his pleasure, for he hath (as he listeth not to protest openly to the world) a charter made by all the chiefe lordes of England touching their fealtie and obedience assured to him. Therefore, sith God for your iust desert is worthy with you, and that you are as euill spoken of by all men, as they that come against you be well reported, I would aduise you, that whilest there is a place for grace and fauour, rather to obeie the popes iust demands, to whose word other christian princes are readie to giue eare, than by striving in vaine to cast auaie your selfe and all others that take your part, or are bent to defend your quarell or cause.

These words being thus spoken by the legat, king John as then vterlie despairing in his matters, when he saw himselfe constrained to obeie, was in a great perplexitie of mind, and as one full of thought, looked about him with a frowning countenance, waiting with himselfe what counsell were best for him to follow. At length, oppressed with the burthen of the imminent danger and ruine, against his will, and verie loth so to haue done, he promised vpon his oth to stand to the popes order and decree. Wherefore shortly after in like manner as pope Innocent had commanded, he tooke the crowne from his owne head, and deliuered the same to Pandulph the legat, neither he, nor his heires at any time thereafter to receiue the same, but at the popes hands. Upon this, he promised to receiue Stephan the archbishop of Canturburie into his fauour, with all other the bishops and barshes men, making vnto them sufficient attendas for all iniuries to them done, and so to pardon them, that they should not run into any danger, for that they had rebelled against him.

When Pandulph keeping the crowne with him for the space of five daies in token of possession thereof, at length (as the popes vicar) gaue it him againe. By meanes of this act (saith Polydor) the same went abroad, that king John willing to continue the memorie hereof, made himselfe vassall to pope Innocent, with condition; that his successors should likewise from thenceforth acknowledge to haue their right to the same kingdome from the pope. But those kings that succeeded king John, haue not obserued any such latres of reconciliation, neither do the autentike chronicles of the realme make mention of any such surrender, so that such articles as were appointed to king John to obserue, pertained vnto him that had offended, and not to his successors. Thus saith Polydor.

Pandulph
restoereth the croune againe
to the king.

Whobest, Ranulph Higden in his booke intituled Polychronicon, saith indeed, that king John did not onesse bind himselfe, but his heires and successors, being kings of England, to be feudaries vnto pope Innocent and his successors popes of Rome, that is to say, that they should hold their dominions of them in fee, paying and pating yerele to the see of Rome the summe of seauen hundred marks for England, and three hundred marks for Ireland. Furthermore, by report of the most autentike and approued writers, king John, to auoid all dangers, which (as he doubted) might insue, despairing as it were in himselfe, or rather most speciallie for lacke of loiall dutie in his subjects, consented to all the persuasions of Pandulph, and so (not without his great hartgraeue) he was contented to take his oth, together with sixteen earles and barons, who laicng their hands vpon the holic euangelists, sware with him vpon perill of their soules, that he should stand to the iudgement of the church of Rome, and that if he repented him, and would refuse to stand to promise, they should then compell him to make satisfaction. Whereupon, they being all together at Douer, the king and Pandulph, with the earls and barons, and a great multitude of other people, agreed and concluded vpon a small peace in forme as here insucth.

In English thus.

Ohn by the grace of God king of England, and lord of Ireland, from this houre forward, shall be faithfull to God and to saint Peter, and to the church of Rome, and to my lord pope Inno-centius, and to his successors lawfully entring.
I shall nor be in word nor deed, in consent or counsell, that they should lose life or member, or be apprehended in euill manner. Their losse if I may know it, I shall impeach and staie, so far as I shalbe able, or else so shortie as I can I shall signifie vnto them, or declare to such person the which I shall beleue will declare the same vnto them. The counsell which they shal commit to me by themselves, their messengers, or letters, I shall keepe secret, and not vtter to any man to their hurt to my knowledge. The patri-monie of S. Peter, and specialie the kingdomes of England and Ireland, I shall indeuour my selfe to defend against all men to my power. So helpe me God, and these holie euangelists, Amen. These things were done on the eue of the Ascension of our Lord, in the yeare 1213.

Pandulph hauing thus reconciled king Iohn, thought not god to release the excommunication, till the king had performed all things which he had promised, and so with all speed hauing receiued eight thousand markes sterling in part of restitution to be made to the archbishop, and the other banished men, he sailed backe into France, & came to Roan, where he declared to king Philip the effect of his trauell, and what he had done in England. But king Philip hauing in this meane while consumed a great masse of monie, to the summe of sixtie thousand pounds, as he himselfe alledged, about the furnitue of his tournte, which he intended to haue made into England, upon hope to haue had no small aid with in the realme, by reason of such bishops and other banished men as he had in France with him, was much offended for the reconciliation of king Iohn, and determined not so to bryake off his enterprise, least it might be imputed to him for a great reproch to haue bene at such charges and great expences in vaine. Therefore calling his counsell togither, he declared vnto them what he purposed to do.

All his Nobles in like manner held with him, and allowed his purpose to be verie good and requisite, except the earle of Flanders named Ferdinando, who in hope to recouer againe those tostones, which the French king held from him in Arthois, as Aire, and S. Omers had ioined secretlie in league with king Iohn, and with the earle of Bologne, and therefore disliked the conclusion of their ad-uise. Notobest king Philip not being yet fullie certified hereof, caused his name to draw alongest the coast towards Flanders, whither he himselfe basted to go also by land, that comming thither, he might from thence saile ouer into England, and take land at a place to him assigned.

whilst he should be out of his realme, some great trouble or sedition might rise within his owne dominions. Therefore, leaving the enterprize which he ment to have made against England, he turned his power against the earle of Flanders, and first commanded his navie to saile unto the port of Dam, whilst he himselfe keeping on his iournie still by land, toke the towne of Cassile, and likewise Wyres. From thence he went to Buges, and besieged the towne, but he could not win it at the first, and therefore leaving a power of men to mainteine the siege before it, he himselfe went to Gaunt, and thereto also laid his siege.

In the meane time, the earle of Flanders perceiving that he was not able to resist so puissant an enemy as the French king, sent over in hast unto the king of England for aid. Whereupon king John understanding that his adversarie king Philip had turned all his force against the earle of Flanders, and that thereby he was delivered out of the feare of the Frenchmens comming into England; that same navie (which as before is recited) he had put in a readinesse, containing the number of five hundred saile, he sent straight into Flanders with a strong armie, both of horsemen and footmen, under the guiding of William duke of Holland, William Longspee earle of Salisbury base brother to king John, and Reinhold earle of Bullongne.

These capitains being now passed forth with their fleets into the maine sea, espied anon manie ships lieng without the haven of Dam (for the number of ships of the French fleet was so great, that the haven could not receive them all, so that manie of them laye at anchor without the haven mouth, and all alongst the coast.) Wherefore they sent forth certeine shallops, to espie whether they were friends or enemies, and what their number and order was. It chanced, that the same time, the men of warre which were appointed to keepe the French fleet, were gone forth, together with a great number of the mariners, to spoile and fetch booties abroad in the countrie.

The English espials therefore, making semblance as though they had bene some fishermen of those parts, came verie nere the French ships lieng at anchor, and perceiving them to be unfurnished of people necessarie to defend them, came backe to their companie, and declared what they had seene, certifying their capitains that the victorie was in their hands, if they would make speed. The capitains glad of these newes, commanded their men to make them readie to give battell, and causing their mariners to make saile directlie towards the French fleet, at their first approach they wanne those tall ships that laye at anchor abroad before the haven, without any great resistance, the mariners onelie making request to have their lives saved. The other smaller vessels which (after the tide was gone) remained upon the sands (spoiling them first of their tackle and other things that would serve to use) they consumed with fier, the mariners escaping by flight.

Thus the Englishmen having dispatched this business with good successe, did set upon those ships that laye in harbrough within the haven. But here was hard hold for a while, because the narrownesse of the place would not give any great advantage to the greater number. And those Frenchmen that were gone abroad into the countrie, perceiving that the enemies were come, by the running afloat of the mariners, returned with all speed to their ships to aid their fellows, and so made valiant resistance for a time, till the Englishmen getting on land, and ranging themselves on either side of the haven, beat the Frenchmen so on the sides, and the ships grapling together on front, that they fought as it had bin in a pitched field, till that finally the Frenchmen were not able to susteine the force of the Englishmen, but were constrained (after long fight and great slaughter) to yeld themselves prisoners.

The English capitains glad of this victorie gotten, contrarie to expectation, first gave thanks to God for the same, and then manning three hundred of those French ships, which they had taken straught with coyne, wine, oile, flesh, and other vittels, and also with armour, they sent them afloat into England, and afterwards they set fire upon the residue that laye on ground, which were above an hundred, because they were drawn up so farre upon the sands, that they could not easilie get them out, without their further inconvenience. After this, comming on land with their power, they marched forth into the countrie in good order of battell, to the end that if they should encounter with king Philip by the way comming to the rescue of his ships, they might be ready to give them battell, which thing was not denied, without god and great consideration.

For king Philip being certified of the danger wherein his ships stood by the sudden comming of his enemies, and therewithall being in good hope to come to their succours in time, and yet the Englishmen had wrote their full feat, he raised his siege, and made hast toward the coast; but as he was comming forward towards his navie, he was advertised that the enemies had wanne all his whole fleet, and were now marching forth to meet him, and to give him battell. Also it was told him, how Ferdinando the earle of Flanders, being certified of the victorie achieved by his friends, followed at his backe. Wherefore, least he should come over rashlie to commit himselfe into manifest perill, he staid a little from Buges, and there incamped for that day, as if he ment to abide the comming of his enemies.

The next morrow he raised and returned towards France, the verie same waie that he came, no man pursuing him. For the Englishmen contented with that victorie which they had gotten, thought it not necessarie to follow him with their further hazard. In the meane time, king John receiving newes of this prosperous victorie thus gotten by his people, did wonderfullie reioice for the same, conceiving an hope, that all his businessse would now come forward and growe to good successe.

This is the truth of this historie, as some authors have set it forth. But James Meir in his discourse of Flanders declareth the matter somewhat otherwise, as thus: Upon the thurdate before the Pentecost (saith he) the English fleet setting upon the French navie, which laye at anchor in the haven of Dam, drowned certeine of the French vessels, and toke to the number of foure, which they conveyed afloat with them. Ferdinando the earle of Flanders having an armie of men ready by land, was lodged the same time not far off from the coast, and therefore hearing what had chanced, came the next day, and joined with the Englishmen.

There were yet remaining also divers other of the French ships (besides those which the Englishmen had sunke and taken) which were drawn up further into the land ward. The earle of Flanders therefore, and the English capitains iudged, that it should much hinder the French kings attempts, if they might win those ships also with the towne of Dam, wherein the king had laid up a great part of his provision for the furniture of his warres. Whereupon the Englishmen were set on land, and joining with the earls power, they marched strait towards Dam. This was upon Whitsun euen, on the which day, as they were most busie in assaulting the towne and ships which laye there in the haven, the French king being being come afloat from Gaunt, suddenly set upon them, and though in the beginning he found sharpe resistance, yet in the end the Englishmen and Flemings overset with the great multitude of the Frenchmen, were put to flight, and chased to their ships, with the losse of two thousand men, besides those that were taken prisoners, amongst the which were found to be 22 knights.

The Englishmen and Flemings banquished by the French force.

The earle of Flanders with the earles of Hullen and Sahsburie, doubting to lose their ships, and late gotten bottie, sailed strait into one of the Isles of Zealand called Walcheren. Then the French king constraining them of Gaunt, Bruges, and Ypres, to deliver unto him pledges, caused the towne of Dam, and his ships lieng there in the haven to be burned, doubting lest they should come into the hands of his enemies. This done, he returned into France, leaving his sonne Lewis and the earle of S. Paule in garrison at Lille and Dobbay, and for great sums of monie, which by agreement he received of the townes of Gaunt, Bruges, and Ypres, he restored unto them their pledges. Thus saith Meiret and Matthew Paris differeth not much from him touching the success which chanced to the Englishmen by land. I have writt I think a while in the further narration of this matter, and touch by the way a thing that happened to king John about this present time.

An hermit named Peter of Pontreux, or Walscheld as some writers have. See W. Fox, tome first, pag. 331.

There was in this season an hermit, whose name was Peter dwelling about Porke, a man in great reputation with the common people, because that either inspired with some spirit of prophesie as the people believed, or else having some notable skill in art magike, he was accustomed to tell that should follow after. And for so much as oftentimes his sayings proved true, great credit was given to him as to a verie prophet: which was no good consequence that therefore his predictions comprised undoubted events. Paie rather fith in this pious prophet or false foreteller of afterclaps, these necessarie concurrents (namelic, were wanting, and that he was contrarie qualified to that which this heptastichon comprehendeth, necessarilie it followeth, that he was not as he was taken, but rather a deluder of the people, and an instrument of satan raised up for the enlargement of his kingdom; as the sequels of this discourse importeth. This Peter about the first of Januarie last past, had told the king, that at the feast of the Ascension it should come to passe, that he should be cast out of his kingdom. And whether, to the intent that his words should be the better believed, or whether upon too much trust of his owne cunning he offered himselfe to suffer death for it, if his prophesie proved not true. Whereupon being committed to prison within the castle of Cox, when the day by him prefixed came, without any other notable damage unto king John, he was by the kings commandement drawne from the said castle, unto the towne of Clarham, & there hanged, together with his sonne.

The hermit and his sonne hanged.

The people much blamed king John, for this extreme dealing, because that the hermit was supposed to be a man of great vertue, and his sonne nothing guiltie of the offence committed by his father (if any were) against the king. Moreover, some thought, that he had much wrong to die, because the matter fell out even as he had prophesied: for the day before the Ascension day, king John had resigned the superiority of his kingdom (as they take the matter unto the pope, and had done to him homage, so that he was no absolute king indeed, as authors affirme. One cause, and that not the least which moved king John the sooner to agree with the pope, rose through the words of the said hermit, that did put such a feare of some great mishap in his hart, which should grow through the dissolacoe of his people, that it made him yield the sooner. But to the matter againe.

King John (after his captives in Flanders had sped so well as before we have heard) prepared to make a voyage into Guien, not much regarding the matter, in that the realme stood as yet interdicted. But when he understood by his lords, that they would not go with him except the interdicting might first be released, and he clearlie absolved of the popes curse, to the end that Gods wrath and the popes being folie pacified towards him, he might with better speed move and mainteine the warres, he was constrained to change his purpose, and so coming to Winchester, dispatched forth a messenger with letters, signed with the hands of foure and twentie earles and barons, to the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishops of London, Lincoln, and Hereford, as then sojourning in France, requiring them with all the other banished men to returne into England, promising them by his letters patents, not onelie a safe conduct for their coming over, but that he would also forget all passed displeasures, and frankly restore unto euerie man all that by his means had bene wrongfullie taken from them, and as yet by him detained.

King John wrote to the archbishop and the other bishops to returne.

The archbishop and the other bishops receiving the kings letters, with all speed made hast to come into England, and so arriving at Dover the sixteenth day of Julie, with other the banished men, they went to Winchester, where the king yet remained, who hearing that the bishops were come, went forth to receive them, and at his first meeting with the archbishop of Canturburie, he kneeled downe at his feet, and besought him of forgiveness, and that it would please him and the other bishops also to provide for the release of the miserable state of the realme. Where with the water standing in diuerse of their eyes on both sides, they entred into the citie, the people greatly reioicing to behold the head of the commonwealth agree at length with the members. This was in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 1213.

The bishops do returne.

They came to Winchester 20 of Julie.

The king wrote to the archbishop.

King John required of the archbishop (having as then the popes power in his hands, because he was his legat) to be absolved, promising upon his solemn receipted oath, that he would (as for all things) defend the church and the order of priesthood from receiving anie wrongs. Also, that he would restore the old lawes made by the ancient kings of England, and namelic those of S. Edward, which were almost extinguished and forgotten. And farther, that he would make recompense to all men whom he had by anie means indamaged. This done, he was absolved by the archbishop, & shortly after he sent his oratours to Rome, to intreat with the bishop to take afloat the interdiction of the land. On the morrow after also, the king sent his letters unto all the shiriffes of the counties within the realme, commanding them to summon foure lawfull men of euerie towne belonging to the demesnes of the crowne, to make their appearance at S. Albons, upon the 4 daie of August, that they and other might make inquisition of the losses which euerie bishop had sustained, what had bene taken from them, and what ought to be restored to them as due for the same.

The king himselfe was absolved.

monks to their abbie, and then toke possession of his see, being the two and fortyth archbishop that had ruled the same. In the meane time, the king repaired to Portsmouth, there to take the sea to saile ouer into Portugal, committing the rule of the realme vnto Geoffrey Fitz Peter or Fitz Peters, lord chiefe iustice, and to the bishop of Winchester, commanding them to vse the counsell and aduise of the archbishop of Canturburie, in gouerning things touching the common-wealth. Herewith there came also to the king a great multitude of men of warre, alledging, that they had spent in flaileng for him, and his going ouer sea all their monie, so that he must now needs giue them wages, if he would haue them to passe ouer with him into France. The which when he refused to do, he was constrained to take the water with his owne seruants, arriuing about a thre daies after at the Ile of Jersey: but perceiving that none of his lords followed him according to his commaundement, as one disappointed of aid, he returned backe againe into England, there to take further order for this their misdeuour.

Whilist these things were thus in doing, Geoffrey Fitz Peter, and the bishop of Winchester were come to St. Albons, togither with the archbishop of Canturburie, and other bishops and pères of the realme, where the kings peace being proclaimed to all men, it was on his behalfe streitlie commanded, that the lawes of St. Henrie his grandfather should be obserued vniuersallie within his realme, and that all iustit lawes and ordinaunces should be abrogated. It was also commanded, that no thiriffe, nor forrester, nor other minister of the kings, should vpon paine of life and limme, take violentlie anie thing of any man by waie of extortion, nor presume to wrong anie man, or to fine anie man, as they had afore time bene accustomed to do.

After this, the king being come backe from his tourne, which he purposed to haue made into Portugal, assembled an armie, and went to haue gone against those lords which had refused to go with him, but the archbishop of Canturburie comming to him at Southampton, sought to appease his mod, and to cause him to staie, but yet in his furious rage he went forward till he came to Nottingham, and there with much adoe, the archbishop following him with threatening to excommunicate all those that should aid him, procured him to leaue off his enterprize.

When the archbishop (about the five and twentieth day of August) came to London, there to take aduise for the reformation of things touching the good gouernement of the common-wealth. But here whilist the archbishop, with other pères of the realme deuised orders verie necessaie (as was thought) for the state of the common-wealth, the king doubting least the same should be a hydele for him to restraine his authoritie rofall from doing things to his pleasure, he began to find fault, and seemed as though he had repented himselfe of his large promises made for his reconciliation: but the archbishop of Canturburie so asswaged his mod, and perswaded him, by opening vnto him what danger would insue both to him and to his realme, if he went from the agreement, that he was glad to be quiet for feare of further trouble.

In this hurle burle also the lords and pères of the realme (by the setting on of the archbishop) were earnestlie bent to haue the king to restore and confirme the grant which his grandfather king Henrie the first had by his charter granted and confirmed to his subjects, which to do, king Iohn thought greatlie preiudiciall to his roiall estate and dignitie. The earle of Arholouse hauing lost all his possessions, the citie of Arholouse onelie excepted, came ouer into England, & rendered the said citie into the hands of king Iohn, and receiued at his departure, the summe of ten thousand marks as was reported, by the bountifull gift of king Iohn.

Vpon the second of October, Geoffrey Fitz Peter earle of Essex and lord chiefe iustice of England departed this life, a man of great power and autoritie, in whose politike direction and gouernement, the order of things pertaining to the common-wealth chiefelie consisted. He was of a noble mind, expert in knowledge of the lawes of the land, rich in possessions, and ioined in blood or affinitie with the more part of all the Nobles of the realme, so that his death was no small losse to the commonwelth: for through him and the archbishop Hubert, the king was oftentimes reuoked from such wilfull purposes, as now and then he was determined to haue put in practise, in so much that the king, as was reported (but how trulie I cannot tell) seemed to reioice for his death, because he might now worke his will without anie to controll him.

Matth. Paris.

Peters or Fitz

teth this life.

The same time, to wit, about the feast of saint Michael, came Nicholas the cardinall of Tusculane into England, sent from the pope, to take awaie the interdiction, if the king would stand to that agreement which he had made and promised by his oth to reforme. King Iohn receiued this cardinall in most honorable wise, and gladlie heard him in all things that he had to saie. This legat at his comming to Westminster, deposed the abbat of that place, named William from his roome, for that he was accused both of waisting the reuenues of the house, and also of notable incontinencie. Whereouer the burgeses of the towne of Oxford came vnto him to obtaine absolution of their offense, in that through their presumption, the thre schollers (of whom ye haue heard before) were hanged there, to the great terroze of all the residue. To be short, they were absolved and penance imposed them, that they should strip them out of their apparell at euerie church in the towne, and going barefooted with scourges in their hands, they should require the benefitt of absolution of euerie parish priest within their towne, saing the psalme of Miserere.

After this, the said cardinall called a counsell or conuocation of the cleargie, to reforme such things touching the state of the church as should be thought requisite. And though he handled not this matter with such fauour and byrightnesse as the bishops wished on their behalves, yet he caused king Iohn to restore the most part of all those goods that remained vnspent, and also the value of halfe of those that were consumed and made awaie, vnto those persons as well spirituall as tempozall, from whom they had bene taken in time of the discord betwixt him and the pope. But before all things could be thus quieted and set in order betwixt the king and the bishops, manie meetings were had, as at London, Reading, Wallingford, and in other places.

Now the archbishop and prelates for their parts thought this recompense to be but small, in respect of the great losses and hinderances which they had sustained: and to haue the whole restitution delated, they toke it not well. Wherefore the cardinall leaned so to the kings side (hauing receiued of him to the popes vse the charter of subiection of the realmes of England and Ireland, now bulled with gold, where at the first it was deliuered to Randulph sealed onelie with wax). But their suit came to little effect, and in the end it fell out in such wise, that their complaint was lesse regarded. Whereouer, the rating of the value which the king should restore vnto the archbishop, and the other bishops, was by agreement of the king and them togither, appointed vnto foure barons indifferencie chosen betwixt them.

At length notwithstanding that bewise took no place: for it was otherwise decreed by the pope, that the king should restore to them the summe of forty thousand marks, of the which he had paid already twelve thousand, before the returne of the said archbishop and bishops into the realme, and sithene thousand more at the late meeting had betwixt them at Reading, so that there remained onelie 13000 be hind: for not onelie the king, but also the cardinall had sent to the pope, requiring him to take direction in the matter, and to aduertise him, that there was a great fault in the archbishop and his fellowes. In so much that Wandulph which was sent to him from the legat, declared in fauour of the king, that there was not a more humble and modest prince to be found than king Iohn, and that the archbishop and his fel lowes were too hard, and shewed themselves to co uetous in requiring the restitution that should be made to them for losses sustained in tyme of the in terdiction.

Now the cause wherefore the legat and the king did send unto the pope, was this. There was some grudge betwixt the legat and the archbishop, for that where the pope had writtten to the legat, how he should according to the order of the ancient canons of the church, place in euerie bishops see and abbacie (that was void) meet and able persons to rule and guide the same, the legat presuming on that autho rity granted him by the pope, without the aduise of the archbishop or other bishops, took onelie with him certeine of the kings chaplains, and comming with them to such churches as were vacant, ordeined in them such persons as were nothing meet to take such charge upon them, and that according to the old abuse of England, as Matthew Paris saith. Where upon the archbishop of Canturburie repining at such doings, sent to the legat as then being at Burton upon Crent, two of his chaplains from Dunstable (where he and his suffragans held as then a synod, after the feast of the Epiphanie) commanding him by waile of appeale, in no wise to meddle with institu ting any gouernours to churches, within the precinct of his iurisdiction, where such institutions belonged onelie to him.

Where upon therefore the legat dispatched Wandulph to Rome unto the pope as is aforesaid, and the king likewise sent ambassadors thither, as the bishop of Norwich, and the archdeacon of Northumberland, with others, the which in the end so behaued them selves in their suit, that notwithstanding Simon Langton the archbishops brother earnestlie with stood them, as prodo: for the bishops, yet at length, the pope took order in the matter, writing unto his le gat, that he should see the same fulfilled, and then ab solute the realme of the former interdiction. In this meane time, king Iohn made promission to go ouer into France (as after ye shall heare) but at his go ing ouer he committed the whole ordering of this matter unto the legat, and to William Marshall the earle of Penbroke. The legat therefore upon the re ceipt of the popes bulles, called a counsell at Lon don, and there declaring what was conteined in the same, he took bands for payment of the residue of the forty thousand marks which was behind, being 13000 onelie, as before I haue said.

About the same time also, Walter Gray bishop of Worcester was removed to the gouernment of the see of Ely, which had been vacant euer since the death of the archbishop Geoffrey. This Walter was the thirteenth archbishop that gouerned that see. But now to returne and speake of the kings af faires in the parts beyond the sea. We shall under stand, that hauing set his businesse in some good staile at home with the legat, he applied his studie to the performance of his wars abroad, and therefore he first sent monie into Flanders to paie the soldiers wages, which he had sent thither to aid the erle there against king Philip. Which earle came ouer this yeare into England, and at Canturburie the king receiued him, where he did homage to the king for the whole earldome of Flanders: and on the other part, the king as well to the said earle, as to such lords and bishops which came over with him, declared his roiall liberalitie by princelie gifts of gold, siluer, iewels, and precious stones. After his returne, such captiues as remained in his countrie with their bands at the king of Englands paie, made a iourne into France, and possessed the lands that belonged to the earle of Guisnes, waunne the castell of Espun cham, and rased it, taking within it dauncie men of armes and demnlances. They also waunne by siege the towne of Aire, and burnt it. The castell of Lens they took by assault, and slue manie soldiers that defended it, beside those which they took prisoners.

Moreover, they wasted and destroyed the lands which Lelwes the French kings sonne was possessed of in those parts. In the meane time, king Iohn ha uing prepared a mightie nauie, and a strong armie of valiant soldiers, took sea at Portsmouth on Can dlemas day, with his wife, his sonne Richard, and Eliu no: the sister of Arthur duke of Britaine. He had not many of his earles or barons with him, but a great number of knights and gentlemen, with whom he landed at Rochell in Gascoie, within a few daies after his setting forth. He took ouer with him inestimable treasure, as it was reported, in gold, siluer, and iewels. Immediatlie upon his arrivall at Rochell, the barons of Poitou reuolted from the French king, and comming in to king Iohn, did homage un to him, as to their king and soueraigne lord.

But howsoeuer it was, after the truce began to expire which he had granted unto the earls of Barthe and Augi, on the friday before Whitsunday he came with his armie before the castell of Spetrucant, which belonged unto Geoffrey de Lacygnam, and on the day next ensuing being Whitsun eue, he waunne the same. On Whitsunday he laid siege unto Pouant, an other castell belonging to the same Geoffrey, who as then was lodged in the same, and also two of his sonnes: but within three daies after that the siege was laid, the earle of Barthe came to king Iohn, and did so much pteuall, that through his means, both Geoffrey and his two sonnes were receiued to mer cie, and king Iohn put in possession of the castell. Af ter this, because king Iohn was aduertised, that Lelwes the French kings sonne had now besieged Spountcounter, a castell that was appertaining to the said Geoffrey, he hastied thitherwards, and came to Parthenay, whither came to him as well the fore said earle of Barthe, as also the earle of Augi, and both they together with the said Geoffrey de Lacig nam, did homage to our king, and so became his liege men. The same time also, the ladie Jane the kings daughter was affianced to the said earle of Barthe his sonne, whereas the French king made means to haue hir married to his sonne: but because king Iohn doubted lest that suit was attempted but vnder some cloaked pretence, he would giue no care thereto, but rather made this match with the earle of Barthe, in hope so to assure himselfe of the said earle, that he might stand him in no small stead to defend his cause against his aduersaries of France. But now to the doings in England.

We haue heard before how pope Innocent, or ra ther Accont, who was the root of much mischief and trouble, which qualities are nothing consonant to his name) according to that king Iohn had required of him by sollemne messengers, directed his bulles unto his

King John in the meane time remaining still in France, and finding at the beginning fortune fauor-able inough vnto him, by reason his power was much increased by the aid of the Poitouins, determined to attempt the winning of Britaine, for this cause speciallie, that he might by so doing weaken the French kings power, and partlie also to withdraw him from the wars of Flanders, on which side he had procured likewise the French borders to be inuated with great force, and that not onlie by the earle and such capteins as he had sent thither, and re-trained in wages, but also by the emperor Otho, who in proper person came downe into that countrie himselfe.

King John in-uaded Brit-taine.

Herevpon king John went forth with all his power of horsemen, and entering into Britaine, made robes through the countrie, wasting the same euen to the walles of Haunts: but shortly after the Britaines assembled together, vnder the leading of Peter, the son of Robert earle of Flanders (the French kings uncle, who had married the ladie Adela, daughter to duke Guie of Britaine) and marching forth into the field to defend their countrie from the enimies, came to ioin with them in battell. At the first there was a berie sharpe encounter, but at length the Britains being vanquished and put to flight, a great number of them were taken prisoners, and amongst other their capteins, the foresaid Peter was one, whom king John sent awaie with all the rest vnto Angiers, to be kept in safegard untill he should returne.

After this, he besieged a castell that stood vpon the banke of the riuer of Loier, called La Roch au moine, inforcing his whole indouour to haue wone it. But per he could attaine his purpose, he was aduertised that Lewes the sonne of king Philip was comming towards him with a great power to raise his siege. Wherefore hauing no great confidence in the Poitouins, and vnderstanding that Lewes brought with him a berie strong armie, he toke ad-uise of his counsell, who iudged that it should be best for him to breake vp his siege and to depart, which he did, and went streight waies to Angiers. Lewes (after king John was thus retired) brought the Poitou-ins againe to subiection, and put the chiefe authours of the rebellion to death. In the meane time also his father king Philip with like successe, but in a foughten field, vanquished the emperor Otho at the bridge of Bouins on the 28 day of Iulie, as in the historie of France more at large appeare. There among other prisoners, the three earles of Flanders Salisbury and Wallogne were taken.

Now king John being aduertised of that ouer-throw, was maruellouslie sad and sorrowfull for the chance, in somuch that he would not receiue any meat in a whole daie after the newes thereof was brought vnto him. At length turning his sorrow into rage, he openlie said, that since the time that he made himselfe & his kingdom subiect to the church of Rome, nothing that he did had prospered well with him. Indeed he condescended to an agreement with the pope (as may be thought) more by force than of deuotion, and therefore rather dissimuled with the pope (as he could not otherwise choise) than agreed to the covenants with any hartie affection.

But to the purpose. Perceiuing himselfe now destitute of his best friends, of whom diuerse remained prisoners with the French king (being taken at the battell of Bouins) he thought good to agree with king Philip for this present, by way of taking some truce, which by mediation of ambassadours riding to and fro betwixt them, was at length accorded to endure for five yeares, and to begin at Easter, in the yeare of our Lord, 1215. After this, about the 19 daie of October he returned into England, to appease cer-teine tumults which began already to shoot out buds of some new ciuill dissention. And suerlie the same spred abroad their blossoms so freshlie, that the fruit was knit before the growth by anie timelie prouisi-on could be hindered. For the people being set on by diuerse of the superiours of both sorts, finding themselues grieved that the king kept not promise in restoring the ancient lawes of S. Edward, determined from thenceforth to vse force, since by request he might not preuaile. To appease this furie of the people, not onlie policie but power also was required, for the people undertaking an euill enterprise, speciallie raising a tumult or ioining in a conspiracie are as hardlie suppressed and banquished as hydra the monster hauing manie heads: and therefore it is well said, that

The Nobles supposing that longer delate therein was not to be suffered, assembled themselues together at the abbete of Burie (vnder colour of going thither to do their deuotions to the bodie of S. Edmund which late there insyned) where they uttered their complaint of the kings tyrannicall maners, alledging how they were oftentimes called forth to serue in the wars & to fight in defense of the realme, and yet notwithstanding were still oppressed at home by the kings officers, who (vpon confidence of the lawes) attempted all things whatsoever they conceiued. And if anie man complained, or alledged that he receiued wrong at their hands, they would answer by and by, that they had law on their side to doe as they had done, so that it was no wrong but right which they did, and therefore if they that were the lords and pates of the realme were men, it stood them vpon to prouide that such inconueniences might be auoided, and better lawes brought in vse, by the which their ancestours liued in a more quiet and happie state.

A cloked dissimulation.

There was brought forth and also read an ancient charter made sometime by Henrie the first (which charter Stephen the archbishop of Canturburie had deliuered vnto them before in the citie of London) concerning the grant of certeine liberties according to the lawes of king Edward the confessor, profitable to the church and barons of the realme, which they purposed to haue vniuersallie executed ouer all the land. And therefore being thus assembled in the queene of the church of S. Edmund, they refused a solemn oath upon the altar there, that if the king would not grant to the same liberties, with others which he of his owne accord had promised to confirme to them, they would from thenceforth make warre upon him, till they had obtained their purpose, and enforced him to grant, not onlie to all these their petitions, but also yield to the confirmation of them under his seale, for ever to remaine most stedfast and inuincible.

Bernewell.

The these cause that moued the lords to this conspiracie, rose by reason the king demanded escauage of them that refused to go with him into Poitou: and they on the other part mainteined, that they were not bound to paie it, for any warres which the king made in the parts beyond the seas. But he to proue that he ought to haue it, declares how in his fathers and brothers time it was paid, and therefore he ought to haue it. Such adoe there was about this matter at the first broyching thereof, and more adoe there had bene, if the legats presence had not somewhat staid the parties. But after they had gotten the charter of king Henrie the first at the hands of the archbishop of Canturburie, they made such a sinister interpretation thereof, that supposing it to serue their turnes, they proceeded in their wilfull opinions (as aboue is mentioned.)

Finallie it was determined amongst them, that shortly after Christmase, they should go to the king, and require of him that they might haue those laws restored, which he had promised to them (as is aforesaid.) But forasmuch as they knew well that their sute would not be thankfullie accepted, in the meane time they provided themselves of horse, armour, and other furniture for the warre, thereby to be in the better readinesse and safegard, if in exhibiting their request, the matter did grow to any such enforcement. They appointed also diuerse of the most ancient lords to moue the said matter to the king, in all their names, who was as then at Worcester, and being advertised of this conspiracie, as soon as the feast of Christmase was past, he went straight to London: thither came the lords also with like speed, leaving their men in the townes and villages abroad, to be readie upon any sudden warning to come vnto them, if need should so require.

The lords present their request to the king.

Being come into his presence, they required of him that it might please him, first, to appoint the exercise and vse of those ancient lawes vnto them, by the which the kings of England in times past ruled their subjects: secondlie, that according to his promise, he would abrogate those newer lawes, which euerie man might with good cause name mere wrongs, rather than lawes: and thirdlie they required of him the performance of all other things, which he had most faithfullie of late undertaken to obserue. The king, (though somewhat contrarie to his nature) hauing heard their request, gaue them a verie gentle answer. For perceiving them readie with force to constrain him, if by gentleness they might not prevaille, he thought it should be more safe and easie for him to turne their vnquiet minds with soft remedies than to go about to breake them of their willes by strong hand, which is a thing verie dangerous, especially where both parts are of like force. Therefore he promised them within a few daies, to haue consideration of their request.

request.

And to the intent they might giue the more credit to his words, he caused the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Ely, with William Marshall earle of Penbrooke (vnto whom he had given his daughter Elianor in marriage) to undertake for him, and as it were to become his sureties: which willinglie they did. Wherewith the minds of the pobilitie being somewhat pacified, returned home to their houses. The king soon after also, to assure himselfe the more effectuallye of the allegiance of his people in time to come, caused euerie man to renew his homage, and to take a new oath to be faithfull to him against all other persons. And to prouide the more suretie for himselfe, on Candlemasse day next ensuing, he took upon him the crosse to go into the holie land, which I thinke he did rather for feare than any deuotion, as was also thought by other, to the end that he might (under the protection thereof) remaine the more out of danger of such as were his foes. In which point of dissimulation he shewed himselfe patient, obseruing the counsell of the wiseman, inlufum corde dolorem Disimula atq. tace, ne deteriora subinde Dumma feras.

Some say that a great part of this variance that chanced betwene king John and his barons, was because the king would without skillfull aduise haue eriled the earle of Chester, and for none other occasion than for that he had oftentimes aduised him to leaue his cruell dealing, and also his accustomed adulterie with his brothers wife and others. Other wryte, that the same dissention rose by reason of the great crueltie, and vnreasonable auarice, which the king vsed towards all the states and degrees of his subjects, as well towards them of the spiritualtie, as of the temporalitie. The prelates therefore of the realme sore re- pinning at his doings, for that they could not patientlie suffer such exaction to be leuiued of their livings (contrarie as they toke it to the libertie of the church) found means through practise, to persuaade both the kings of Scotland and France to aid and support them against him, by linking themselves together with sundrie noblemen of England. But these seeme to be coniectures of such wryters as were euill affected towards the kings cause.

Now therefore to the sequelle of the matter. The king hauing sent awaite the barons with a gentle answer, though he minded nothing lesse than to satisfie them in that they did demand, because it made much against his roiall prerogatiue: and therewith for esaking that the matter would be like to grow at length to be tried by force, he began to dout his owne estate, and therefore prepared an armie, and fortified diuerse castles and places with men, munition, and vittels, into the which he might retire for his safetie in any time of need. The barons which understood the kings diligence herein, and coniecturing thereof his whole intent, made readie also their power, appointing for their generall one Robert Fitz Walter, a man both excellent in counsell, and valiant in warre. Herewith they came vnto the archbishop of Canturburie, presenting vnto him a booke, wherein was contained a note of all the articles of their petitions, & required him to understand the kings mind touching the same. The archbishop coueting to extinguish the sedition (whereof he himselfe had bene no small kindler) which was like to grow, if the nobilitie were not pacified the sooner, talked with the king, and exhorted his grace verie instantlie to satisfie the requests of his barons, and herewith did shew the booke of the articles which they had deliuered vnto him.

The king, when he saw that they demanded (which in effect was a new order in things touching the whole state of the common wealth) swore in a great furie, that he would neuer condescend vnto those petitions. Whereof when the barons had knowledge, they gat them strait vnto armour, making their assemble at Stamford in the Easter weeke, whither they had draiue vnto them almost the whole nobilitie, and gathered an exceeding great armie. commons flocked unto them from euerie part, because the king was generallie hated of the moze part of his subiects.

It was conjectured that there were in that armie the number of two thousand knights, beside peomen on horsebacke or demillances (as I may call them) and footemen apparelled in diuerse sorts of armour. The chiefe ringleaders of this power were these, whose names insue: Robert Fitz Walter, Gossace Clesie, Richard Perrie, Robert Ross, Peter de Beuse, Nicholas de Stuteuill, Sacre earle of Winchestre, Robert erle of Clare, Henrie earle of Clare, Richard earle of Bigot, William de Mowbray, William de Cressy, Ralph Fitz Robert, Robert de Mere, Foulke Fitz Warren, Will. Pallet, William de Montacute, William de Beauchampe, Simon de Bime, William Parthall the younger, William Sparduit, Robert de Pontibigonis, John Fitz Robert, John Fitz Alane, G. Lauale, D. Fitz Alane, W. de Hobzug, D. de Wales, G. de Gaunt, spaurice de Gaunt, Robert de Bakesley, Robert de Spounschet, Will. de Lanualley, G. de Spaunde, ule earle of Essex, Thomas de Spuleton, Conan Fitz Helie, and manie other; they had also of counsell with them as chiefe the archbishop of Canturburie.

The king as then was at Drford, who hearing of the assemble which the barons made, and that they were come to Bakesley, on the mondaie next after the octaues of Easter, he sent vnto them the archbishop of Canturburie, in whom he reposed great confidence, and William Parthall earle of Denbroke, to vnderstand what they meant by that their assembling thus together. Whereupon they deliuered to the same messengers a roll containing the ancient liberties, priuiledges and customs of the realme, signifying that if the king would not confirme the same, they would not cease to make him warre, till he should satisfie their requests in that behalfe.

The archbishop and the earle returning to the king, shewed him the whole circumstance of that which the barons demanded, who took great indignation thereat, and cozenfullie said: Why do they not aske to haue the kingdome also? Finallie, he affirmed with an oth, that he would neuer grant any such liberties, whereby he should become a slaue. Whereupon the archbishop and the earle of Denbroke returned to the barons, and declared the kings denial to confirme their articles. When the barons naming their host the armie of God and the holie church, set forward, and first came vnto Northampton, and besieging the towne, when they could not preuaile, because the same was well prouided for defence aforesaid, they departed from thence, and came towards Bedford to besiege the castell there, in which sir William Beauchampe was captaine, who being secretly confederate with them, deliuered the place incontinentlie into their hands.

Whilst they remained here a certeine time to fortifie and furnish the castell with necessarie provision, there came letters to them from London, giuing them to vnderstand, that if they would send a conuenient power of souldiers to defend the citie, the same should be receiued therein at some meet and reasonable time in the night season by the citizens, who would iointly with them in that quarell against the king to the uttermost of their powers. The lords were glad of these newes, to haue the chiefe citie of the realme to take part with them, and therefore they sent foure bands of souldiers streight waies thither, which were brought into the citie in the night season

(according to order aforesaid taken.) But as Matt. Paris saith, they were receiued into the citie by Algate, the 24 of Maie being sundaie, whilst the citizens were at masse. The next day they made open rebellion, took such as they knew fauoured the king, brake into the houses of the Iewes, & spoiled them.

The barons having thus gotten possession of the citie of London, wrote letters vnto all those lords which as yet had not iointed with them in this confederacie, threatening that if they refused to aid them now in this necessitie, they would destroie their castles, manours, parkes, and other possessions, making open warre vpon them as the enemies of God, and rebels to the church. These were the names of those lords which yet had not sworn to mainteine the foresaid liberties, William Parthall earle of Denbroke, Raimulfe earle of Chester, Nicholas earle of Salisbury, William earle Warren, William erle of Albemarle, H. earle of Cornwall, W. de Albemarle, Robert de Weipount, Peter Fitz Herbert, William de Lisle, G. de Lucie, G. de Furnuall, Thomas Basset, H. de Braibroke, J. de Basingborne, W. de Cantlow, H. de Cornwall, John Fitz Hugh, Hugh de Beuill, Philip de Albente, John Parthall, and William Beter. All these vpon receipt of the barons letters, or the moze part of them came to London, and iointed themselves with the barons, vntillie renouncing to aid king John.

Also the ples in the eschequer ceased, and the riskes staid from executing their office. For there was none that would paie anie monie to the kings vble, nor anie that did obeie him, in somuch that there remained with him but onelie seven horsemen of all his traine at one time (as some write) though some after he had a great power, which came to him to the castell of Windsoze, where he then late, and meant to haue led the same against the lords with all speed. But hearing now of this new rebellion of the Londoners, he changed his purpose and durst not depart from Windsoze, being brought in great doubt least all the other citie of the realme would follow their example. Whereupon he thought good to assaie if he might come to some agreement by waie of communication, and incontinentlie sent his ambassadours to the barons, promising them that he would satisfie their requests, if they would come to Windsoze to talke with him.

Hobwell, the lords having no confidence in his promise came with their armie within three miles of Windsoze, and their pitch downe their tents in a meadow betwixt Stanes and Windsoze, whither king John also came the 15 daie of Iune, and shewed such friendlie countenance towards euerie one of them, that they were put in good hope he meant no deceit. Being thus met, they fell in consultation about an agreement to be had. On the kings part (as it were) late the archbishops of Canturburie and Dublin, the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Bath, Worcester, Conentre, Rochester, and Pandulph the popes Nuncio, with Almerike master of the knights templers: the earles of Denbroke, Salisbury, Warren, Arundell, Alane de Caloway, William Fitz Gerald, Peter Fitz Herbert, Alane Basset, Hugh de Beuill, Hubert de Burgh seneschall of Poitou, Robert de Kopley, John Parthall, and Philip de Albente. On the barons part, there were innumerable, for all the nobilitie of England was in a maner assembled there together.

Finallie, when the king measuring his owne strength with the barons, perceived that he was not able to resist them, he consented to subscribe and seale to such articles concerning the liberties demanded, in forme for the most part as is contained in the two charters Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, beginning gaining Iohannes Deigratia, &c. And he did not onlie grant vnto them their petitions touching the forsaide liberties, but also to win him further credit, was contented that they should choose out certeine graue and honourable personages, which should haue authoritie and power to see those things performed which he then granted vnto them.

There were twentie five of those that were so elected, namely these. The earles of Clare, Albemarle, Gloucester, Winchester, and Hereford: also earle Roger, earle Robert, earle Marshall the younger, Robert Fitz Walter the younger, Gilbert de Clare, Eustace de Melie, Hugh Bigot, William de Mowbray, the maior of London, Gilbert de la Maie, Robert de Ros, John constable of Chester, Richard de Percie, John Fitz Robert, William Mallet, Geoffrey de Saie, Roger de Mowbray, William de Huntingfield, Richard de Pountichey, and William de Albanie. These five and twentie were sworne to see the liberties granted and confirmed by the king to be in euerie point obserued, but if he went against the same, then they should haue authoritie to compell him to the obseruing of euerie of them.

Moreover, there were other that were sworne to be obedient, and as it were assistant vnto these five and twentie peeres in such things as they should appoint, which were these. The earle of Arundell, the earle Warren by his attorney, Henrie Doltie, Hubert de Burgh, Mattheu Fitz Herbert, Robert de Pinkie, Roger Huscarse, Robert de Melburgh, Henrie de Pont Audoin, Rafe de la Hay, Henrie de Brentfield, Warren Fitz Gerald, Thomas Basset, William de Buckland, William de saint John, Alan Basset, Richard de Kuers, Hugh de Boneuale, Jordan de Sackville, Rafe Pulgrane, Richard Sikelward, Robert de Kopley, Andrew de Beauchampe, Walter de Dunstable, Walter Foliote, Foukes de Brent, John Marshall, Philip Daubnie, William de Perce, Rafe de Normandie, William de Percie, William Agoulin, Engerand de Pratellis, William de Cirenton, Roger de Zuche, Roger Fitz Barnard, and Godfre de Grancombe. It was further ordered, that the chateilains or constables (as I may call them) of the four castles of Portsmouth, Wallingworth, Nottingham, and Scarborough, should be sworne to the five and twentie peeres, to gouerne those castles in such wise as they should haue in commandement from the said five and twentie peeres, or from the greater part of them: and that such should be placed as chateilains in the same, as were thought to be most true and faithfull vnto the barons and the realme. ¶ It was also decreed, that certeine strangers, as Flemings and other, should be banished out of England.

The king hereupon sent his letters patents vnto the shiriffes of all the counties of this realme, commanding them to see the ordinances and liberties which he granted and confirmed, to be diligentlie obserued. And for the more strengthening of this his grant, he had gotten the pope to confirme a like charter granted the yeare before. For the pope (with king John was become his obedient vassall, and the apostolicke kingeaslie granted to graunt both him and his lords herein, and so was the grant of the liberties corroborated & made good with a double confirmation, and so sealed, that it was impossible for them to be separated in funder, the kings grant being annexed to the popes bull.

Immediatlie also upon the confirmation now made by the king, diuerse lords came to him, and required restitution of such possessions, lands, and houses, as he had in his hands, the right whereof (as they alleged) appertained to them: but he excused the matter, and shifed them off, till by inquest taken, it might appeare what right enerie man had to those things which they then claimed: and furthermore assigned them a date to be holden at Westminster, which was the sixteenth day of Iulie. But per he restored at that time the castell of Rochester vnto the archbishop of Cantuarburie, the barons hauing obtained a great peece of their purpose (as they thought) returned to London with their charter sealed, the date whereof was this: Given by our owne hand, in the meadow called Kuningmede or Rime-mede, betwixt Stanes and Windfore, the fifteenth of Iune, in the eighteenth yeare of our reigne.

Great reioicing was made for this conclusion of peace betwixt the king and his barons, the people iudging that God had touched the kings heart, and mollified it, whereby happie dates were come for the realme of England, as though it had bene deliuered out of the bondage of Aegypt: but they were much deceiued, for the king hauing condescended to make such grant of liberties, farre contrarie to his mind, was right sorrowfull in his heart, cursed his mother that bare him, the houre that he was borne, and the paps that gaue him sucke, wishing that he had receiued death by violence of sword or knife, in stead of naturall nourishment: he whetted his teeth, he did bite now on one staffe, and now on another as he walked, and oft brake the same in peeces when he had done, and with such disordered behaviour and furious gestures he uttered his grieue, in such sort that the noble men verie well perceiued the inclination of his inward affection concerning these things, before the breaking vp of the counsell, and therefore sore lamented the state of the realme, getting what would follow of his impatiencie and displeasent taking of the matter.

Whereupon they said among themselves, Who be to vs, yea rather to the whole realme that wanteth a sufficient king, and is gouerned by a tyrant that seeketh the subuersion thereof. Now hath our sonerigne lord made vs subiect to Rome, and to the Romish court, so that we must henceforth obtaine our protection from thence. It is verie much to be feared, least we do feele hereafter some further peece of mischance to light vpon vs suddenlie. We neuer heard of any king that would not gladlie inuade, to withdraw his necke from bondage & captiuitie, but ours of his owne accord voluntarilie submitteth himselfe to become vassall to euerie stranger. And thus the lords lamenting the case, left the king, and returned to London (as before ye haue heard.)

But the king disquieted not a little, for that he was thus diuened to yeld so farre vnto the barons, notwithstanding as much as was possible he kept his purpose secret, deuised by what means he might dis-appoint all that had bene done, and promised on his part, at this assemblie betwixt him and the lords a pacification (as ye haue heard.) Wherefore the next day verie late in the euening, he secretlie departed to Southampton, and so ouer into the Ile of Wight, where he toke aduice with his counsell what remedie he might find to quiet the minds of his lords and barons, and to bring them vnto his purpose. At length after much debating of the matter, it was concluded by the aduise of the greater part, that the king should require the popes aid therein. And so Walter the bishop of Worcester, & John the bishop of Norwich, with one Richard Marsh his chancellor, with all speed were sent as ambassadors from the king vnto pope Innocent, to instruct him of the rebellion of the English Nobilitie, and that he constrained by force had granted them certeine lawes and privileges, hurtfull to his realme, and preiudiciall to his crowne.

Moreover, with that all this was done by the means of the thoritic of the pope, the king besought him to make the same void, and to command the barons to obey him being their king, as reason required they should. There were also sent by him other messengers, as Hugh de Bours and others, into diuerse parts beyond the sea, to bring from thence great numbers of men of war and souldiers, appointing them to meet him at Douer, at the feast of saint Michaell next ensuing. He sent likewise unto all his chateleins and constables of castles within the realme, requiring them to prouide themselves of all things necessarie for defense of the holds committed to their charge, if they should chance to be besieged, though it were on the next morrow.

His ambassadours and other messengers being thus dispatched, and hauing but few persons left about him, or in manner none, except such of the bishop of Norwich his seruants as he had borrowed of him, he fell to take pilles as any ships came by suspected not to be his friends, so seeking to win the fauour of the mariners that belonged to the cinke ports, and so lay close in the Ile of Wight and there about the sea-coasts for the space of thre moneths together. In which meane time, manie things were reported of him, some calling him a filther, some a merchant, and some a pirat and rouer. And manie (for that no certeine newes could be heard of him) iudged that he was either drowned, or dead by some other means. But he still looking for some power to come ouer to his aid, kept himselfe out of the way, till the same should be arriued, and dissembled the conceit of his reuenge and hart-grudge, till opportunitie serued him with conuenient securitie to put the same in execution. message.

Mauch. Paris.

The lords all this while lay at London, and began to doubt the matter, because they could heare no certeine newes where the king was become: for doubting (as I said) the suertie of his person, he conueied himselfe secretly from one place to another, lodging and taking his diet oftentimes more meanlie than was decent for his estate: and still he longed to heare how his ambassadours sped with the pope, who in the meane time comming unto Rome, and declaring their message at full, took it upon their solempne oath, that the right was on the kings side, and that the fault rested onlie on the lords, touching the whole controuersie betwene them and him, who sought with great rigour and against reason to byle him at their pleasures.

They shewed also a note of certeine articles contained in the charter, which seemed to make most for the kings purpose, and withall declared that the king in open assemblie, where he and the barons met to talke of such matters, had protested that the kingdome of England speciallie appertained (as touching the souerainetie) unto the church of Rome, wherupon he neither could nor ought without knowledge of the pope to ordaine anie thing anew, or change ought within that kingdome in prejudice thereof. Wherefore whereas he put himselfe and all the rights of his kingdome by way of appealing vnder the protection of the apostolike see: the barons yet without regard had to the same appeale, did seise into their possession the citie of London, and getting them to armour, enforced the king to confirme such unreasonable articles, as there appeared for him to consider.

answer vnto

The pope hauing heard their tale, and considered of the articles, with bending blowes (in witness of his indignation) made forthwith this short answer: the kings am-to expell their king, which hath taken upon him the crosse, and is remaining vnder the protection of the apostolike see? And do they meane indeed to transtate the dominion that belongeth to the church of Rome vnto another? By S. Peter we cannot suffer this iniurie to passe unpunished. Hereupon (crediting the ambassadours words) by the aduice of his cardinals, he decreed that all those priuiledges, which the king had granted vnto the lords and barons of this realme, as enforced thereto by their rebellious attempt, should be accounted void and of none effect. Also he wrote vnto the lords, admonishing them by his letters that they should obey their king, vpon paine of his curse if they should attempt anie thing that founded to the contrarie.

At the same time there was in the court of Rome (as Hector Boetius saith) a cardinall named Gualo o: Guallo, a verie couetous person, and such a one (as in that place some are neuer wanting) which for mo-nie passed not what he did to further anie mans suit, without regard either to right or wrong, by whose chiese trauell and means the pope was greatlie induced to fauour king Iohns cause, and to iudge with him in prejudice of the lords purposes, as before is expressed.

Hect. Boetius.

But to proceed. The ambassadours being dispatched, and hauing the popes prescript, and such other his letters with them as they had obtained of him, returned with all speed into England vnto the king (who was come a little before vnto Windsor castell) and there declared vnto him how they sped. King Iohn being sofull in that they had brought the matter so well about for his purpose, caused the popes decree to be declared vnto the barons, commanding them strictlie to obey the same. The barons taking the matter grieuouslie to be thus mocked, with great indignation both blamed king Iohns vniust dealing, and the popes wrongfull iudgement, in that he had pronounced against them, without hearing what they had of right to alleadge for themselves. Whereupon out of hand (notwithstanding the popes prohibition and prescript to the contrarie) they determined to trie their cause by dint of sword, and with all speed assembled their powers, which for the greater part they had latelie dismissed and sent home. They furnished the castell of Rochester with a strong garrison of men, and placed therein as capitaine one William Albeney, a verie skilfull warriour.

King Iohn, after he understood that the barons

King John then having recovered strength about him, and being advertised that William de Albemarle was entered into the castle of Rochester with a great number of knights, men of arms and other soldiers, he with his whole army and besieged them within, insinuating himself by all waies possible to win the castle as well by battering the walls with engines, as by giving thereto manie assaults: but the garrison within, consisting of nintie and foure knights beside demurancers, and other soldiers, defended the place verie manfully, in hope of rescue from the barons, which late as then at London: but they coming forward one daie towards the castle, when they heard that the king was coming forward in good array of battell to meet them, upon consideration had of their owne forces, for that they were not able to match him with footmen, they returned backe againe to the citie, breaking that assured promise which they had made and also confirmed by their solemn othes, which was that if the castle should chance to be besieged, they would not faile but raise the siege.

At length they within for want of vittells were constrained to yield it up unto the king, after it had bene besieged the space of three daies: during which time they had beaten backe their enemies at sundrie assaults, with great slaughter and losse. But the king having now got the possession of that hold, upon grasse conceived for the losse of so manie men, and also because he had liue so long about it yet he could winne it, to his insupportable costs and charges, was determined to have put them all to death that had kept it. But Sauezie de Bauleon advised him otherwise, lest by such crueltie, the barons in any like case should be occasioned to use the same extremitie towards such of his people, as by chance might fall into their hands. Thus the king spared the Nobles and gentlemen, sending William de Albemarle, William de Lancaster, William de Gineford, Thomas de Spoleton, Robert Gifford, Robert de Bobie, Domes de Albemarle, and diuerse other to the castle of Corfe, there to be kept as prisoners. But Robert Gifford, Richard Gifford, and Thomas de Lincoln were sent to Nottingham, and so other were sent to other places. As for all the demurancers or peomen (if I shall so call them) and the archbishops which had laine manie of his men during the siege, as Matthew Paris saith, the king caused them to be hanged, to put other in feare that should so obstinatie resist him.

After the lesse as the booke that belonged to Bernevell abbe saith, there was not any of them hanged, saving one archbishop onely, whom the king had brought up of a child. But howsoever the king dealt with them after they were yielded, true it is, as by the same booke it appeareth, there had bene no siege in those daies more earnestlie enforced, nor more obstinatie defended: for after that all the limmes of the castle had bene reuered and spoiled downe, they kept the maister tower, till halfe thereof was also overthrowne, and after kept the other halfe, till through famine they were constrained to yield, having nothing but horse flesh and water to susteine their liues withall.

Here is to be remembered, that whilst the siege lay thus at Rochester, Hugh de Soues a valiant knight, but full of pride and arrogance, a Frenchman borne, but banished out of his countrie, came downe to Calice with an huge number of men of warre and soldiers to come to the aid of king John. But as he was upon the sea with all his people, meaning to land at Dover, by a sudden tempest which rose at that instant, the said Hugh with all his company was drowned by shipwrecke. Some after the beate of the same Hugh with the carraiges of other innumerable, both of men, women, and children, were found not farre from Perrinow, and all along that coast. There were of them in all fiftie thousand, as saith Matthew Paris, for of all those which he brought with him, there was (as it is said) not one man left alive.

The king, as the same booke, but how true I knowe not, had given by charter unto the said Hugh de Soues, the whole countie of Northfolke, so that he might have expelled the old inhabitants, and to have peopled it with strangers. But whether this was so or not, sure it is that he was verie sorrowfull for the losse of this income and also which thus perished in the seas, though it happened verie well for the subjects of England, that should have bene fore oppressed by such multitude of strangers, which for the most part must needs have liued upon the countrie, to the better breeding of the inhabitants wherefore they should have come.

Here is to be noted, that during the siege of Rochester, as some write, there came out of France to the number nere hand of ten thousand men sent from the French king unto the aid of the barons, at the suit of Saer de Domicie earle of Winchester and other ambassadors that were sent from the barons, during the time of this siege, although it should seeme by Matthew Paris, that the said earle was not sent till after the pope had excommunicated the barons, as after we shall heare. The Frenchmen that came over at this first time landed at Owell, and at other haues there nere adjoining.

About this season, the canons of Poike, because the archbishops see there had remained void a long time, obtaining licence of the king, assembled together about the election of an archbishop. And though the king had once againe earnestlie moved them to preferre Walter Craie bishop of Worcester, yet they refused so to do, and therefore chose Simon de Langton, brother to the archbishop of Cantuarburie, which election was afterward made void by the earnest frauel of the king to the pope, because his brother the said archbishop of Cantuarburie was known to fauour the part of the barons against him, so that the said Walter Craie was then elected and promoted to the guiding of the see of Poike, according to the kings speciall desire in that behalf.

About the same time also, pope Innocent being certified, how the barons of England would not obey his prescript, indged them enemies to the church and gave commandement to Peter the bishop of Winchester, to the abbat of Reading, and to the subdeacon Wandulph, to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against them. But they could not at the first execute the popes commandement herein, by reason that the archbishop of Cantuarburie, who fauoured the barons cause, would not permit them. Therefore the same archbishop was interdicted out of the church, and from sauing diuine seruice, and also being cited to appeare at Rome, was in danger to be deprived of his mitre; had not certeine cardinals intreated for him, and obtained his pardon. The archbishop being gone to Rome, as well to excuse himselfe in this matter, as to be present at the generall counsell there holden at that time for he was ready to go take the sea thitherwards when the bishop of Winchester and Wandulph came to him with the popes letters, the said bishop of Winchester and Wandulph proceeded to the pronouncing of the excommunication against the barons, renewing the same excommunication and holiday: albeit the barons, because none of them were excommunicated in the popes letters, letters made none account of the censure, reputing it as void, and not to concerne them in any manner of point. But now to returne to king Iohn.

After he had wonne the castell of Rochester (as before you haue heard) he hasted to S. Albons, and there diuided his armie into two parts, appointing the one to remaine about London, whilste he himselfe with the other might go into the north to waste and destroe the possessions of certeine lords there, which (as he was informed) went about to raise an armie against him. He made captains of that armie which he left behind him, his brother William earle of Salisburie, Saucerie de Mauleon, Will. Belwer, Walter Bue, and others. He himselfe departed from S. Albons about the 21 day of December, leading his said armie northwards: in which were chiefe captains these that follow, William erle of Albemarle, Philip de Albene, and John Marshall. Also of strangers, Gerard de Sotigam, and Godfayll, with the Flemings, the crossebowes, and others.

The first night he laie at Dunsstable, and from thence passing forwards towards Northampton, he destroyed by the waie all the manours, places and houses, which belonged to the aduersaries, and so kept on his iourne till he came to Nottingham, where he laie in the castell on Chyffmasse day, and in the morning (being S. Stephens day) he went to Langar, and lodged there that night, sending his summons in the morning to the castell of Beaumont, willing them within to yield. This castell appertained to William Albene, who had committed the custodie thereof unto his sonne Nicholas de Albene, priest, to sir William de Stodham, and to sir Hugh Charnelles knights: the which came to the king with the keyes of the castell, and surrendered the same unto him, with condition that he should be good to their master the said William Albene, and grant unto them their horses and armour, wherewith they would remaine with him vnder his peace and protection. On the next morrow (being S. Johns day) the king went to the castell, and receiuing the same, deliuered it to the keeping of Geoffrey Buteville, and his brother Wilner.

After this the castell of John Lacie at Dunnington was taken and laid flat to the ground, by commandement of the king, who hauing accomplished his will in those parties, dreyd towards Porshehire, and at his coming thither destroyed the houses, townes and manours of those lords and gentlemen which were against him. It is horrible to heare, and lothsome to rehearse the crueltie which was practised by the souldiers and men of warre in places where they came, who counting no honour or renowne more excellent, nor glorie (as warriours say)

Maior nulla quidem quam bello parata videtur, Horrida Mauroris tractare ferociter arma, Hostilique suam temerare in sanguine dextram, and therefore were wholie bent to spoile and ransacke the houses of the people without pittie or compassion, besides the robberies, spoiles and great outrages vsed by the souldiers generallie against the common people. Few there were in that countrie of great linage or wealth, whom the king for their assembling themselves with the barons either spoiled not, or put not to execution. Thus with his armie (to the great desolation of the countrie) he passed forth to the borders of Scotland, and entring that realme, took the castell of Barwike, and other places of strength in those parts, meaning to haue wonne more from the Scots, if other urgent businesse had not called him backe againe. This being done, he committed the countrie which lieth betwixt the riuer of These, and the confines of Scotland, to the keeping of Hugh de Baloll and Philip de Hulcotes, assigning to them such conuenient number of men of warre as was thought expedient, and the custodie of the castles in Porshehire he deliuered to Robert de Aepount, to Brian de Lisle, and to Geoffrey de Lucie.

Finallie, when he had so ordered things in the North parts as stood with his pleasure, so that there remained no more but two castles, that is to saie, Mountsorrell, and another in Porshehire that appertained to Robert de Roos in possession of the barons, he returned by the borders of Wales into the south parts: and by all the way as he passed, he shewed great crueltie against his aduersaries, besieging and taking their castles and strong houses, of the which some he caused to be fortified with garrisons of souldiers to his owne vse, and some he rased. The like feats were wrought by the other armie in the parts about London: for William earle of Salisburie, and Foukes de Bient, with the other captains which the king had left behind him there, perceiuing that the citie would not easilie be wonne by anie siege, first furnished the castell of Windsor, Hertford, and Barkhamsted, with such strong garrisons of souldiers as might watch, vpon occasion giuen to assaile those that should either go into the citie, or come from thence: they marched forth with the residue of the armie, and passing through the countie of Essex, and Hertford, Middlesex, Cambridge, Huntingdon, they wasted the countie, and made the townes become tributaries to them. As for the houses, manour places, parkes, and other possessions of the barons, they wasted, spoiled and destroyed them, running euen hard to the citie of London and setting fire in the suburbs.

In this meane time, whilste the king went forwards on his iourne northwards, vpon the 18 of December last past, the castell of Hantlap was taken by Foukes de Bient, which appertained unto William Manduit. On the same day also was the castell of Tunbridge taken by the garrison of Rochester, which castell of Tunbridge belonged to the earle of Clare. Moreover, the foresaid Foukes de Bient coming vnto Bedford, won both the towne and castell: for they that had the castell in keeping, after 7 daies respite (which they obtained at the hands of the said Foukes) when rescue came not from the lord William Beauchampe their master, they deliuered it vnto the said Foukes. Vnto whom John gaue not onlie that castell, but also committed to his keeping the castles of Northampton, Oxford and Cambridge.

The king had this Foukes in great estimation, and amongst other waies to aduance him, he gaue to him in marriage Margaret de Riuers, a ladie of high nobilitie, with all the lands and possessions that to hir belonged. Moreover, to William earle of Albemarle the king deliuered the custodie of the castles of Rockingham, Sawey and Biham. To one Ranulfe Teutonicus, the castell of Barkhamsted, and to Walter Godzeuill seruant to Foukes de Bient, he betooke the keeping of the castell of Hertford. Thus what on the one part, and what on the other, the barons lost in maner all their possessions from the south sea vnto the borders of Scotland, the king seizing the same into his hands, and committing them to the keeping of strangers, and such other as he thought more trustie and conuenient. All this while the barons laie at London banquetting and making merrie, without attempting anie exploit praise-worthy. But yet when they heard by certeine aduertisement, what haucke and destruction was made of their houses & possessions abroad, they could not but lament their miseries, and amongst other their complaints which they vttered one to another, they sore blamed the pope, as a cheefe cause of all these Indeed about the same time pope Innocent, who before at the instant suit of king Iohn had excommunicated the barons in generall, did now excommunicate them by name, and in particular, as these. The armie which king Iohn had left behind him in the south parts, under the leading of the earle of Salisbury and other, laie not idle, but scowring the countries abroad (as partlie per haue heard) came to S. Edmundsburie, and hauing intelligence there, that diuerse knights, ladies and gentlewomen that were there before their coming, had fled out of that towne, and for their more safetie were withdrawne into the Isle of Elie, they followed them, besieged the Ile, and assailed it on eche side, so that although they within had fortified the passages, and appointed men of warre to remaine vpon the gard of the same in places where it was thought most needfull; yet at length they entred vpon them by force, Walter Bueke with his Barabanders being the first that set foot within the Ile towards Herbie. For by reason the waters in the fenes and ditches were hard frozen, so that men might passe by the same into the said Ile, they found means to enter, and spoiled it fro side to side, together with the cathedrall church, carrying from thence at their departure a marvellous great prey of goods and cattell.

The barons of the realme being thus afflicted with so manie mischances all at one time, as both by the sharpe and cruell warres which the king made against them on the one side, and by the enmitie of the pope on the other side, they knew not which way to turne them, nor how to seeke for releafe. For by the losse of their complices taken in the castell of Rochester, they saw not how it should any thing auaille them to ioine in battell with the king. Therefore considering that they were in such extremitie of despair they resolued with themselves to seeke for aid at the enemies hands, and there vpon Saer earle of Winchester, and Robert Fitz Walter, with letters vnder their seales were sent vnto Lewes the sonne of Philip the French king, offering him the crowne of England, and sufficient pledges for performance of the same, and other couenants to be agreed betwixt them, requiring him with all speed to come vnto their succour. This Lewes had married (as before is said) Blanch daughter to Alfonse king of Castile, neere to king Iohn by his sister Elianor.

Now king Philip the father of this Lewes, being glad to haue such an occasion to inuade the realme of England, which he neuer loued, promised willingly that his sonne should come vnto the aid of the said barons with all conuenient speed (but first he receiued foure and twentie hostages which he placed at Campaine for further assurance of the couenants accorded) and herewith he prepared an armie, and diuerse ships to transport his sonne and his armie ouer into England. In the meane time, and to put the barons in comfort, he sent ouer a certeine number of armed men, under the leading of the chateleine of saint Emers and the chateleine of Arras, Hugh French Thacon, Gufface de Semille, Baldwin Barcell, William de Times, Giles de Selun, W. de Beaumont, Giles de Herlie, Bisset de Fertie, and others, the which taking the sea, arriued with one and forty ships in the Thames, and so came to London the twentieth of Februarie, where they were receiued of the barons with great ioy and gladnesse.

10 Therefore the said Lewes wrote to the barons, that he purposed by Gods assistance to be at Calice by a day appointed, with an armie redie to passe ouer with all speed vnto their succours.

The fridaie before Candlemasse day, Saer de Mauleon, and other capitaines of the kings side, laid siege to the castell of Colchester, but hauing intelligence that the barons which laie at London made forward with all speed to come to succour that castell, on the Wednesday after Candlemasse day, being 20 the third of Februarie, they raised their siege, and went backe towards S. Edmundsburie.

Rafe Cog.

In the meane while, the R. being gone (as per haue heard) to the borders of Scotland, a brute was raised that he was dead, and secretlie buried at Reading. But this rumour had not time to worke any great alteration, for after he had dispatched his businesse in the north, as he thought expedient, he returned, and comming into the east parts about the midst of Lent himselfe in person besieged the castell of Colchester, and within a few daies after his comming thither, 30 it was deliuered vnto him by Frenchmen that kept it, with condition that they might depart with all their goods and armour, vnto their fellowes at London, and that the Englishmen there in companie with them in that castell, might likewise depart vpon reasonable reasons.

But although that couenant was kept with the Frenchmen, yet the Englishmen were staied and committed to prison. Where vpon when the French 40 men came to London, they were apprehended and charged with treason for making such composition, whereby those Englishmen that were fellows with them in arms were secluded from so beneficiall conditions as they had made for themselves. They were in danger to haue bene put to death for their euill dealing herein, albeit at length it was concluded that they should remaine in prison till the comming of Lewes, vnto whose pleasure their cause should be referred.

50 After this the castell of Wingham was toone, which belonged vnto earle Robert de Here. Then the king prepared to besiege London, but the Londoners were of such courage, that they set open their gates, and hearing of the kings approach, made readie to issue forth to giue him battell: whereof the king being aduertised, withdrew backe, but Saer de Mauleon was suddenly set vpon by the Londoners, lost manie of his men, and was sore hurt and wounded himselfe.

60 The king perceiuing that it would not please him to attempt the winning of the citie at that time, drew alongst the coast, fortified his castles, and prepared a great namie, meaning to encounter his enemy Lewes by sea: but through tempest the ships which he had got together from Portsmouth, Dunwich Lin, and other hauens, were disperfed in sunder, and manie of them cast awaie by rage and violence of the outrageous winds.

Somewhat before this time also, when he heard of the compact made betwixt the barons and his aduersaries the Frenchmen, he dispatched a messenger in all hast to the pope, signifying to him what was in hand and practised against him, requiring further

The pope desirous to helpe king John all that he might (because he was now his bassall) sent his legat Gualo into France, to dissuade king Philip from taking any enterprise in hand against the king of England. But king Philip though he was content to heare what the legat could saie, yet by no meanes would be turned from the execution of his purpose, alledging that king John was not the lawfull king of England, hauing first vsurped and taken it awaie from his nephew Arthur the lawfull inheritor, and that now sithens as an enimie to his owne roiall dignitie he had giuen the right of his kingdome awaie to the pope (which he could not do without consent of his nobles) and therefore through his owne fault he was worthilie deprived of all his kingly honor. For the kingdome of England (saith he) neuer belonged to the patrimonie of S. Peter, nor at any time shall. For admit that he were rightfull king, yet neither he nor any other prince may giue awaie his kingdome without the assent of his barons, which are bound to defend the same, and the prerogative roiall, to the uttermost of their powers. Furthermore (saith he) if the pope do meane to mainteine this error, he shall giue a perillous example to all kingdomes of the world. Herewithall the Nobles of France then present, protested also with one voice, that in defense of this article they would stand to the death, which is, that no king or prince at his will and pleasure might giue awaie his kingdome, or make it tributarie to any other potentate, whereby the Nobles should become thrall or subiect to a forren gouernour. Math. Paris.

Lewes on the morrow following, being the 26 of Aprill, by his fathers procurement, came into the councell chamber, and with frowning looke beheld the legat, where by his procurator he defended the cause that moued him to take upon him this iourne into England, disprouing not onelie the right which king John had to the croune, but also alledging his owne interest, not onelie by his new election of the barons, but also in the title of his wife, whose mother the quene of Castile remained onelie aloue of all the brethren and sisters of Henrie the second late king of England (as before ye haue heard.) The legat made answer hereunto, that king John had taken upon him the crosse, as one appointed to go to warre against Gods enimies in the holie land, therefore he ought by decree of the generall councell to haue peace for foure yeares to come, and to remaine in succour vnder protection of the apostolike see. But Lewes replied thereto, that king John had by warre first inuaded his castles and lands in Picardie, and wasted the same, as Buncham castle and Liens, with the countie of Guisnes which belonged to the see of the said Lewes.

But these reasons notwithstanding, the legat warned the French king on paine of cursing, not to suffer his sonne to go into England, and likewise his sonne, that he should not presume to take the iourne in hand. But Lewes hearing this, declared that his father had nothing to do to forbid him to prosecute his right in the realme of England, which was not holden of him, and therefore required his father not to hinder his purpose in such things as belonged nothing to him, but rather to licence him to seeke the recouerie of his wiues right, which he meant to pursue with perill of life, if need should require.

The legat perceiuing he could not preuaile in his sute made to king Philip, thought that he would not spend time longer in vaine, in further treating with him, but sped him forth into England, obtaining yet a safeconduct of the French king to passe through his realme. Lewes in like maner, purposing by all meanes to preuent the legat, first dispatched forth ambassadours in all hast vnto the court of Rome to exerce himselfe to the pope, and to render the reasons that most speciallie moued him to proceed forward in his enterprise against king John, being called by the barons of England to take the croune thereof upon him. This done, with all conuenient speed he came downe to Calice, where he found 680 ships well appointed and trimmed, which Eustace furnished the monke had gathered and prepared there ready against his coming.

Lewes therefore forthwith imbarcking himselfe with his people, and all necessarie prouisions for such a iourne, toke the sea, and arrived at a place called Stanchore in the Ile of Lenet, vpon the 21 day of Maye, and shortly after came to Sandwich, & there landed with all his people, where he also incamped vpon the shore by the space of thre daies. In which meane time there came vnto him a great number of those lords and gentlemen which had sent for him, and there euerie one apart and by himselfe swore fealtie and homage vnto him, as if he had bene their true and naturall prince.

King John about the same time that Lewes thus arrived, came to Douer, meaning to fight with his aduersaries by the way as they should come forward towards London. But yet vpon other aduancement taken, he changed his purpose, because he put some doubt in the Flemings and other strangers, of whom the most part of his armie consisted, because he knew that they hated the French men no more than they did the English. Therefore furnishing the castle of Dotter, with men, munition, and vittels, he left it in the keeping of Hubert de Burgh, a man of notable prouesse & valiance, and returned himselfe vnto Canturburie, and from thence toke the high waie towards Winchester. Lewes being aduertised that king John was retired out of Kent, passed through the countie without any encounter, and wan all the castles and holds as he went, but Douer he could not win.

At his coming to Rocheſter, he laid siege to the castle there, and wan it, causing all the strangers that were found within it to be hanged. This done, he came to London, and there receiued the homage of those lords and gentlemen which had not yet done their homage to him at Sandwich. On the other part he toke an oath to mainteine and performe the old lawes and customes of the realme, and to restore to euerie man his rightfull heritage and lands, requiring the barons furthermore to continue faithfull towards him, assuring them to bring things so to passe, that the realme of England should recouer the former dignitie, and they their ancient liberties. Howsoever he vſed them so courteously, gaue them so faire words, and made such large promisses, that they beleued him with all their hearts. But alas! Cuius vincit opinio verum?

The rumour of this pretended outward courtelie being once spread through the realme, caused great numbers of people to come flocking to him, among whom whome were diuerse of those which before had taken part with king John, as William earle Warren, William earle of Arundell, William earle of Salisbury, William Marshall the younger, and diuerse other, supposing verelie that the French kings sonne should now obtaine the kingdome, who in the meane time ordeined Simon Langton afore mentioned, to be his chancelour, by whose preaching and exhortation, as well the citizens of London as the barons that were excommunicated, caused diuine seruice to be celebrated in their presence, intuced thereto, because Lewes had already sent his procurators to Rome before his coming into England, there to shew the goodnesse of his cause and quarrell.

But this auailed them not, neither toke his excuse any such effect as he did hope it should: for those ambassadors that king John had sent thither, replied against their assertions, so that there was hard hold about it in that court, albeit that the pope would decree nothing till he heard further from his legat Gualo, who the same time (being aduertised of the proceedings of Lewes in his iourne) with all diligence hastened over into England, and passing through the middle of his aduersaries, came vnto king John, then sojourning at Gloucester, of whome he was most ioufullie receiued, for in him king John reposed all his hope of victorie. This legat immediatlie after his coming did excommunicate Lewes by name, with all his fauours and complices, but speciallie Simon de Langton, with bell, boke, and candle, as the manner was. Howbeit the same Simon, and one Cernase de Hobzug beane of S. Pauls in London, with other, alledged that for the right and state of the cause of Lewes, they had already appealed to the court of Rome, and therefore the sentence published by Gualo they toke as void.

At the same time also, all the knights and men of warre of Flanders and other parts beyond the seas, which had serued the king, departed from him, the Scots being onlie excepted: and part of them that thus went from him resorted vnto Lewes, and entered into his wages; but the residue repaired home into their owne countries, so that Lewes being thus increased in power, departed from London, and marching towards Winchester, he won the castles of Wigat, Gilsford, and Farnham. From thence he went to Winchester, where the citie was yielded vnto him, with all the castles and holds thereabout, as Winchester, Doham, and Beaumerc.

¶ Whilest the said Lewes was thus occupied in Suffex, about the subduing of that countrie vnto his obeisance, there was a young gentleman in those parts named William de Collingham, being of a valorous mind, and loathing foreyn subiection, who would in no wise doe fealtie to Lewes, but assembling togither about the number of a thousand archers, kept himselfe within the woods and desert places, whereof that countrie is full, and so during all the time of this warre, shewed himselfe an enimie to the Frenchmen, slaying no small numbers of them, as he toke them at any aduantage. O worthy gentleman of English blood! And so Grandia que aggreditur fortis discrimina virtus!

In like manner, all the fortresses, townes, and castles in the south parts of the realme were subdued vnto the obeisance of Lewes (the castles of Douer and Winbore onlie excepted.) Within a little while after, Will. de Mandeuille, Robert Fitz Walter, and William de Huntingfield, with a great power of men of warre, did the like vnto the countries of Essex and Suffolke. In which season, king John fortified the castles of Wallingford, Colfe, Watham, Wiltshir, the Ales, and diuerse others with munition and vittells. About which time letters came also vnto Lewes from his procurators, whom he had sent to the pope, by the tenor whereof he was aduertised, that notwithstanding all that they could doe or say, the pope meant to excommunicate him, and did but onelie staie till he had receiued some aduertisement from his legat Gualo.

The chiefe points (as we find) that were laid by Lewes his procurators against king John were these, that by the murder committed in the person of his nephew Arthur, he had bene condemned in the parlement chamber, before the French king, by the peeres of France, and that being summoned to appeare, he had obstinatelie refused so to doe, and therefore had by good right forfeited not onelie his lands within the precinct of France, but also the realme of England, which was now due vnto the said Lewes as they alledged, in right of the ladie Blanch his wife, daughter to Clauis quene of Spaine. But the pope refelld all such allegations as they produced for proofe hereof, & seemed to defend king Johns cause verie pithilie; but namely, in that he was under the protection of him as supreme lord of England: againe, for that he had taken vpon him the crosse (as before yee haue heard.) But now to returne where we left.

About the feast of saint Margaret, Lewes with the lords came againe to London, at whose coming, the tower of London was yielded by to him by appointment, after which the French capitains and gentlemen, thinking themselves assured of the realme, began to shew their inward dispositions and hatred toward the Englishmen, and forgetting all former promises (such is the nature of strangers, and men of meane estate, that are once become lords of their desires, according to the poets words, Aperius nihil est humilium surgit in altum) they did manie excellent outrages, in spoiling and robbing the people of the countrie, without pittie or mercie. Moreover they did not onelie breake into mens houses, but also into churches, and toke out of the same such vessels and ornaments of gold and silver, as they could laie hands vpon: for Lewes had not the power now to rule the greedy soldiers, being wholie giuen to the spoile.

But most of all their tyrannie did appeare in the east parts of the realme, when they went through the countries of Essex, Suffolke and Northfolke, where they miserablie spoiled the townes and villages, reducing those quarters vnder their subiection, and making them tributaries vnto Lewes in most seruile and slauiish manner. Furthermore, at his coming to Norwich, he found the castell void of defence, and so toke it, without any resistance, and put into it a garison of his soldiers. Also he sent a power to the towne of Lin, which conquered the same, and toke the citizens prisoners, causing them to paie great summes of monie for their ransoms. Moreover, Thomas de Burgh, chafeleine of the castell of Norwich, who vpon the approach of the Frenchmen to the citie, fled out in hope to escape, was taken prisoner, and put vnder safekeeping. He was brother vnto Hubert de Burgh capteine of Douer castell.

Now when Lewes had thus finished his enterprises in those parts, he returned to London, and shortly therevpon created Gilbert de Gaunt earle of Lincoln, appointing him to go thither with all convenient speed, that he might resist the illnes made by them which did hold the castles of Nottingham and Newark, wasting and spoiling the possessions and lands belonging to the barons nere adjoining to the same castles. This Gilbert de Gaunt then, togither with Robert de Kopley, coming into that countrie, toke the citie of Lincoln, and brought all the countrie vnder subiection (the castell onlie excepted.)

In the meane time, Lewes was brought into some god hope thorough meanes of Thomas de Burgh, whom he toke prisoner (as before you have heard) to persuade his brother Hubert to yeld up the castell of Dover, the siege whereof was the next enterpryse which he attempted. For his father king Philip, hearing that the same was kept by a garrison, to the behoofe of king Iohn, wrote to his sonne, blaming him that he left behind him so strong a fortresse in his enemies hands. But though Lewes inforced his whole endeavour to win that castell, yett all his travell was in vaine. For the said Hubert de Burgh, and Gerard de Sotigam, who were chiefe captains within, did their best to defend it against him and all his power, so that despairing to win it by force, he assaied to obtaine his purpose, by threatening to hange the captains brother before his face, if he would not yeld the sooner. But when that would not serue, he sought to win him by large offers of gold and silver. Howbeit, such was the singular constancie of Hubert, that he would not give anie eare unto those his flatering motions. When Lewes in a great furie menaced that he would not once depart from thence, till he had won the castell, and put all them within to death, and began to assaile it with more force than before he had done.

The barons also, which at this season lay at Lon-and after went forth into Northfolke and Suffolke (as it were to gather by such scraps as the French had left) spoiling those countries verie pitifullie, churches and all. They constrained the townes of Yer-mouth, Dunwich & Gipswich, to pay to them great summes of monie by waie of ransoming. And at length returning by Colchester, they used like practises there. From thence they returned to London, and shortly after, under the conduct of the earle of Bevers (upon a sudden) going to Windsoze, they laid a strong siege about that castell; in the which was capitaine Ingelard de Athie, with fiftie valiant knights, & other men of war of their suit, the which mantullie stood at defense.

In the month of August, Alexander king of Scotland came through the countrie unto the siege of Dover, and there did homage unto Lewes, in right of his tenure holden of the kings of England, and then returned home, but in his coming by, as he came by castell Bernard in the countrie of Warwickshire (which appertained unto Hugh de Balioll) he lost his brother in law the lord Cusface de Belesie, who was stricken in the forehead with a quar-rell, as he rode in companie of the king nere unto the same castell, to view if it were possible upon anie sbe to win it by assault.

About the same time, or rather in the yeare last past as some hold, it fortuneth that the vicount of Melune a French man, fell sicke at London, and perceiving that death was at hand, he called unto him certeine of the English barons, which remained in the cite, upon safegard thereof, and to them made this protestation: I lament (saith he) your destruction and desolation at hand, because ye are ignorant of the perils hanging over your heads. For this understand, that Lewes, and with him 16 earles and barons of France, have secretlie swozne (if it shall fortune him to conquere this realme of England, & to be crowned king) that he will kill, banish, and confine all those of the English nobilitie (which now do serue under him, and persecute their owne king) as traitours and rebels, and furthermore will dispos-se all their linage of such inheritances as they now hold in England. And because (saith he) you shall not have doubt hereof, I which lie here at the point of death, do now asseure unto you, and take it on the perill of my soule, that I am one of those sixteen that haue swozne to performe this thing: wherefore I advise you to provide for your owne safeties, and your realmes which you now destroye, and keepe this thing secret which I have uttered unto you. After this speech was uttered he straightwaies died.

When these words of the lord of Melune were opened unto the barons, they were, and not without cause, in great doubt of themselves, for they saw how Lewes had already placed and set Frenchmen in most of such castles and townes as he had gotten, the right whereof indeed belonged to them. And against it grieved them much to understand, how besides the hatred of their prince, they were euerie sunday and holie daie openly accursed in euerie church, so that manie of them inwardly relented, and could haue bin contented to haue returned to king Iohn, if they had thought that they should thankfullie haue bene received.

In this yeare, about the 17 of Julie, pope Innocent died, at whose death (being knowen in England) all they that were enemies to king Iohn greatly rejoiced, for they were in great hope that his successor would haue rather inclined to their part, than to the kings. But it fell out otherwise, for Honorius the third that succeeded the same foresaid Innocent, maintained the same cause in defense of king Iohn, as earnestlie or rather more than his predecessour had done, sending with all speed his bulls over into England to confirme Guallo in his former authoritie of legat, commanding him with all endeavour to proceed in his businesse, in maintaining the king against Lewes, and the disolall English nobilitie that aided the said Lewes. But now to our purpose, King Iohn being all this while at Winchester, and having knowledge how his aduersaries were daily occupied in most hard enterprises, as in besieging sundry strong and innincible places, sent forth his commissioners to assemble men of warre, and to al-lure unto his service all such, as in hope of prey, were minded to follow his standard, of the which there resorted to him no small number. So that having gotten together a competent armie for his purpose, he brake forth of Winchester, as it had bene an hideous tempest of weather, beating downe all things that stood in his waie, sending forth his people on eche side to wast the countreies, to burne by the townes and villages, to spoile the churches & churchmen. With which successe still increasing his furie, he turned his wile violence into Cambridgehire, where he did exceeding great hurt. Then entring into the countries of Northfolke and Suffolke, he committed the like rage, wast, and destruction, in the lands and possessions that belonged unto the earle of Arundell, to Roger Bigot, William de Huntingfield, and Roger de Cressley.

The barons in the meane time that lay at siege before the castle of Windsoze, hearing of that banocke which king Iohn had made in the east parts of the realme, secretly in the night season raised their camps, and leaving their tents behind them, with all speed made towards Cambridge. But king Iohn by faithfull espials, hauing aduertisement of their intent, which was, to get betwixt him and the places of his refuge, withdrew him and got to Stamford, yer they might reach to Cambridge, so that missing their purpose, after they had taken some spoiles abroad in the countrie, they returned to London. King Iohn from Stamford, marched toward Lincoln, because he heard that the castell there was besieged.

But those that had besieged it, as Gilbert de Gaunt, and others, hearing that king Iohn was comming towards them, durst not abide him, but fled, and so escaped. The king then turned his iourne towards the marches of Wales, and there did much hurt to those places that belonged to his aduersaries. After this also, and with a verie puissant armie he went eithers eastwards, and passing through the countries, came againe into the counties of Northfolke and Suffolke, wasting and afflicting all that came in his waie, and at length comming to Lincolne, was there iustlicie receiued. Then keeping forth northwards, he spoiled the townes and abbeyes of Peterburgh and Crowland, where a number of the kings enemies were withdrowne into the church, but Sauerie de Hauleon, being sent forth to seeke them, found them in the church the morrow after. So he seized, and drew them out by force, spoiled the house, and getting a great bootie and prey of cattell and other riches, he with his people conueied the same abroad at his departing, after he had ransacked euery corner of the church, and other the houses and places belonging to that abbey.

Thus the countrie being wasted on each hand, the king hastied forward till he came to Wellesstreme sands, where passing the wathes he lost a great part of his armie, with horses and carriages, so that it was iudged to be a punishment appointed by God, that the spoile which had bene gotten and taken out of churches, abbeyes, and other religious houses, should perith, and be lost by such means together with the spoilers. Yet the king himselfe, and a few other, escaped the violence of the waters, by following a good guide. But as some haue written, he took such greife for the losse sustained at this passage, that immediately thereupon he fell into an ague, the force and heat wherof, together with his immoderate feeding on rawe peaches, and drinking of new ster, so increased his sicknesse, that he was not able to ride, but was faine to be carried in a litter presently made of twigs, with a couch of strawe vnder him, without any bed or pillow, thinking to haue gone to Lincoln, but the disease still so ragged and grew vpon him, that he was informed to staie one night at the castell of Laforde, and on the next day with great paine, caused himselfe to be caried vnto Netwarke, where in the castell through anguish of mind, rather than through force of sicknesse, he departed this life the night before the nineteenth day of October, in the yeare of his age sixtie and one, and after he had reigned seauenteene yeares, six moneths, and seauen and twentie daies.

¶ There be which haue written, that after he had lost his armie, he came to the abbeye of Swinhead in Lincolnshire, and there understanding the cheapnesse and plentie of corne, thebed himselfe greatly displeased therewith, as he that for the hatred which he bare to the English people, that had so traitorously revolted from him vnto his aduersarie Lewis, wished all miserie to light vpon them, and thereupon said in his anger, that he would cause all kind of graine to be at a farre higher price, yer manerdaies should passe. Whereupon a monke that heard him speake such words, being moued with zeale for the oppression of his countrie, gave the king poison in a cup of ale, wherof he first took the draught, to cause the king not to suspect the matter, and so they both died in manner at one time.

There are that write, how one of his some seruants did conspire with a conuert of that abbeye, and that they prepared a dish of peares, which they poisoned, three of the whole number excepted, which dish the said conuert presented vnto him. And when the king suspected them to be poisoned indeed, by reason that such precious stones as he had about him, cast forth a certaine sweate, as it were betwixt the poison, he compelled the said conuert to fast and eat some of them, who knowing the three peares which were not poisoned, took and eat those three, which when the king had sene, he could no longer abstaine, but fell to, and eating greedilie of the rest, died the same night, no hurt happening to the conuert, who thorough helpe of such as bare no god will to the, found shift to escape, and conueied himselfe atwaie from danger of receiuing due punishment for so wicked a deed.

Beside these reports which yee haue heard, there are other that write, how he died of surfeiting in the night, as Rafe Niger; some, of a blowe stricken, as one faith that writeth an addition vnto Roger Houeden, And Rafe Coghehall faith, that comming to Lincolne, (where he appointed Sauerie de Hauleon to be captain), and to take order for the fortifying of that towne, he took a surfeit there of immoderat diet, and withall fell into a laske, and after his laske had left him, at his comming to Laforde in Lindsey, he was let blood: furthermore to increase his other griefes and sorowes for the losse of his carriage, horses and men, in passing ouer the wathes, which troubled him sore; there came vnto him messengers from Hubert de Burgh, and Gerard de Sotegam capitains of Dover castell, aduertising him, that they were not able to resist the forceable assaults and engins of the enemies, if speedie succour came not to them in due time. Whereat his greife of mind being doubled, so as he might seeme euen oppressed with sorow, the same increased his disease so vehementlie, that within a small time it made an end of his life (as before yee haue heard.)

The men of warre that serued vnder his ensignes, being for the more part hired souldiers and strangers, came together, and marching forth with his bodie, each man with his armour on his backe, in warlike order, conueied it vnto Worcester, where he was pompously buried in the cathedrall church before the high altar, not for that he had so appointed (as some write) but because it was thought to be a place of most surtie for the lords and other of his friends there to assemble, and to take order in their businesse now after his deccasse. And because he was somewhat fat and corpulent, his bowels were taken out of his bodie, and buried at Croton abbey, a house of monks of the order called Premostratenses, in Staffordshire, the abbat of which house was his physician.

impair the credit of the storie: but certeine it is that he came to his end, let it be by a surfeit, or by other means ordained for the shortening of his life. The manner is not so materiall as the truth is certeine. And suerlie, he might be thought to haue procured against himselfe manie molestations, manie anguishes & vexations, which nippt his hart: & gnawed his very bowels with manie a fore symptome or passion: all which he might haue withstood if fortune had bene so fauourable, that the totaltie of his subjects had remained towards him inuolable, that his Nobles with multitudes of adherents had not with such shamefull apostasie withstood him in open fight, that forren force had not weakened his dominion, or rather robbed him of a maine branch of his regiment, that he himselfe had not sought with the spoile of his owne people to please the imaginations of his ill affected mind; that courtiers & commoners had with one assent performed in dutie no lesse than they pretended in veritie, to the preservation of the state and the securitie of their soueraigne: all which presupposed plagues concurring, that happinesse could the king arrogate to himselfe by his imperfall title, which was through his owne default so imbezelled, that a small remanent became his in right, when by open hostilitie and accursed papasie the greater portion was pluckt out of his hands.

Here therefore we see the issue of domesticall or homebred broiles, the fruits of variance, the gaine that riseth of dissention, whereas no greater nor safer fortification can betide a land, than when the inhabitants are all alike minded. By concord manie an hard enterprise (in common sense thought vnpossible) is atchieued, manie weake things become so defended, that without manifold force they cannot be dissolued. From diuision and mutinies do issue (as out of the Troiane host) ruines of roialties, and decays of communalities. The sinewes of a realme is supposed of some to be substance and wealth; of other some policie and power; of other some conuenient defenses both by water and land: but a most excellent description of a well fortified countrie is that of Plautus, set downe in most pithie words and graue sentences; no lesse worthy to be written than read and considered. The description is this.

Plaut. in Pers.

Si incola bene sent morati pulchre munus regni arbitror: Perfidia & peculatus ex urbe & auaritia seculent, Quarta inuidia, quinta ambitio, sexta obrestatio, Septimum peritrium, octaua indulgentia, Non a iniuria, decima quod pessimum aggressu scelus: Et ac nisi inde aberit, ceu plex murus reb. secundis parū est.

And therefore no maruell though both courtiers and commoners fell from king Iohn their naturall prince, and took part with the enimie; not onelie to the disgrace of their soueraigne, but euen to his overthrow, and the depopulation of the whole land; sith these maine bulwarks and rampiers were wanting; and the contrarie in most ranke sort and detestable manner extended their virulent forces.

But we will surceasse to aggravate this matter, sith the same is sufficientlie bigged in the verie course of the historie concerning his acts and deeds, continued to the verie day of his death, and the verie time of his burfall, whereof I saie thus much, that whether it was his will to be interred, as is aforesaid, or whether his corpe being at the disposing of the survivors, to elect the place as a conuenient house for a princes bones, I leave it as doubtful, and therefore vnderdetermined, esteeming the lesse to labour therein, because the truth can hardlie by certeinie be winnowed out, but by coniecturall supposals aimed and shot at. Notwithstanding, in my poore iudgement it is verie likelie first in respect of the time which was superstitious and poppish; secondlie by reason of the custome of funerall rites then commonlie vsed; that he was buried in the said place for order sake, & his bodie (if I may presume so farre by warrant of mine author) wrapped in a monks cowle and so laid in his graue or tome. For the manner was at that time, in such sort to burie their Nobles and great men, who were induced by the imaginations of monks and fond families of freres to beleue, that the said cowle was an amulet or defensitiue to their soules from hell and hellish hags, howe or in what soener sort they died; either in sorrow and repentance for sinne, or in blasphemie, outrage, impatiencie, or desperation.

This forme of funeralls was frequented in Wales, hauing bene first vsed and broched in England, from whence (if we may giue credit to our late Chronographers) as from a poisoned spring it spred it selfe into Wales. For the first abbeie or frierie that is read to haue bene erected there, since the dissolution of the noble house of Bangor, which sauoured not of Romish dregs, was the Twy Chwyn, which was builded in the yeare 1146. Afterwards these vermine swarmed like bees, or rather crawled like lice ouer all the land, and drew in with them their lowlie religion, tempered with that not howe manie millions of abominations; hauing vtterlie forgotten the lesson which Ambrosius Telepinus had taught them [who writ in the yeare 540, when the right Christian faith which Ioseph of Arimathea taught the Isle of Aualon] reigned in this land, before the proud and bloodthirstie monke Augustine infected it with the poison of Romish errors in a certeine ode, a part whereof are these few verses insuing,

This (as not impertinent to the purpose) I haue recorded, partlie to shew the palpable blindness of that age wherein king Iohn liued, as also the religion which they reposed in a rotten rag, esteeming it as a Scala coeli or ladder to life; but speciallie inferred to this end, that we may fetch some light from this cleere candle (though the same seeme to be dusky & dim) whereby we may be lead to conceiue in reason and common sense, that the interment of the king was according to the custome then in vse and request, and therefore by all likelihoods he was buried as the peeres and states of the land were wont to be in those daies, after the maner aboue mentioned.

But to let this passe as a cold discourse of a coffin of bones covered with clods of clate; you shall vnderstand that he left behind him posteritie of both sexes. For he had issue by his wife queene Isabella two sonnes, Henrie who succeeded him in the kingdom, and Richard; three daughters, Joane married to Alexander king of Scotland, Isabella coupled in matrimonie with the emperour Frederike the second, cond. and Elianor whome William earle of Gloucester had to wife. He had also another daughter (as some haue left in writing) called Elianor.

King Iohn's

He was comelie of stature, but of lowke and countenance displeasing and angrie, somewhat cruell of nature, as by the writers of his time he is noted, and not so hardie as doubtfull in time of perill and danger. But this seemeth to be an enuious report uttered by those that were giuen to speake no good of him whome they inwardlie hated. Howbeit some giue this witnesse of him (as the author of the booke of Bernewell abbete and other) that he was a great and mightie prince, but yet not verie fortunate, much like to Marius the noble Romane, tasting of fortune both waies: bountifull and liberall vnto strangers, but of his owne people (for their baslie treasons practised towards him) a great oppressour, so that he trusted more to forreiners than to them, and therfore in the end he was of them utterlie forsaken.

¶ Heretofore whosoever shall consider the course of the historie written of this prince, he shall find, that he hath bene little beholden to the writers of that time in which he liued: for scarcelie can they asoide him a good word, except when the trueth inforceth them to come out with it as it were against their willes. The occasion whereof (as some thinke) was, for that he was no great friend to the clergie. And yet vndoubtedly his deede shew he had a zeale to religion, as it was then accounted: for he founded the abbete of Beaulieu in the new forest, as it were in recompense of certeine parish churches, which to enlarge the same forest he caused to be thowne downe and ruined.

He builded the monasterie of Farendon, and the abbete of Hales in Shropshire; he repaired Godstow where his fathers concubine Rosamund late interred; he was no small benefactor to the minster of Litchfield in Staffordshire; to the abbete of Crokesden in the same shire, and to the chapell at Thetford in Norfolk. So that (to say what I thinke) he was not so void of deuotion towards the church, as diuers of his enemies haue reported, who of mere malice conceale all his vertues, and hide none of his vices; but are plentifull in setting forth the same to the uttermost, and interpret all his doings and sayings to the worst, as may appeare to those that aduisedlie read the works of them that write the order of his life, which may seeme rather an inuictue than a true historie: neuerthelesse, sith we cannot come by the truth of things through the malice of writers, we must content our selues with this briefe andlie description of his time. Certeinlie it should seeme the man had a princelie heart in him, and wanted nothing but faithfull subiects to haue assisted him in reuenging such wrongs as were done and offered by the French king and others.

Howeuer, the pride and pretended authoritie of the cleargie he could not well abide, when they went about to wrest out of his hands the prerogative of his princelie rule and gouernement. True it is, that to mainteine his warres which he was forced to take in hand, as well in France as elsewhere, he was constrained to make all the shift he could deuise to reuer monie, and because he pinched their purses, they conceived no small hatred against him, which when he perceived, and wanted peradventure discretion to passe it ouer, he discoursed now and then in his rage his immoderate displeasure, as one not able to bide his affections, a thing verie hard in a stout stomach, and thereby misdeed now and then to compass that which otherwise he might verie well haue brought to passe.

It is written, that he meant to haue become feudarie (for maintenance sake against his owne dissolall subiects, and other his adueraries) vnto Piramunelme the great king of the Saracens: but for the truth of this report I haue little to saie, and therefore I leaue the credit thereof to the authors. It is reported likewise, that in time when the realme stood interdicted, as he was abroad to hunt one day, it chanced that there was a great stag or hart killed, which when he came to be broken vp, proued to be verie fat and thicke of flesh. Wherewith he was so pleased, that he was led, and yet in all his daies he neuer heard masse. To conclude, it may seeme, that in some respects he was not greatlie superstitious, and yet not void of a religious zeale towards the maintenance of the cleargie, as by his bountifull liberallitie bestowed in building of abbetes and churches (as before we haue hard) it may partlie appeare.

In his daies manie learned men liued, as Gregorie Winefaute, Simon Fraxinus alias Ali, Adamus Doensis, Gualter de Constantijs first bishop of Lincoln and after archbishop of Rouen, John de Erford, Colman surnamed Sapient, Richard Canonius, William Peregrine, Alane Lekeburie, Simon Thurnae, who being an excellent philosopher but standing too much in his owne conceit, vpon a sudden did so forget all his knowledge in learning, that he became the most ignorant of all other, a punishment (as was thought) appointed him of God, for such blasphemies as he had wickedlie uttered, both against Moses and Christ. Gernastus Dozobernenis, John Hantwill, Rigell Wozeke, Gilbert de Holland, Benet de Peterburgh, William Warms a monke of Peterburgh, Roger Houeden, Hubert Walter, first bishop of Salisbury and after archbishop of Canturburie, Alexander Theologus, of whom we haue heard before, Gernastus Liberienensis, Syluester Giraldus Cambrensis, who wrote manie treatises, Ioseph Denontus, Walter Spas, Radulfus de Diceto, Gilbert Legley, Mauricinus Porzanius, Walter Porzanius, John de Fozdeham, William Leicester, Joceline Wakeland, Roger of Crowland, Hugh White alias Candibus that wrote an historie intituled Historia Petreburchensis, John de saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray an historiographer and bishop of Norwich, Walter of Couentrie, Radulphus Riger, &c. Thus farre king Iohn.

Henric

Henrie the third, the eldest sonne of king Iohn.

Anno Reg. 1.

1216

William Marshall earle of Penbrooke.

Henrie, the third of that name, the eldest sonne of Iohn, a child of the age of nine yerres, began his reigne ouer the realme of England the nineteenth day of October, in the yere of our Lord 1216, in the seventh yere of the emperour Frederike the second, and in the 36 yere of the reigne of Philip 10 the second king of France.

Immediatlie after the death of his father king Iohn, William Marshall earle of Penbrooke, general of his fathers armie, brought this yong prince with his brother and sisters into Glocester, and there called a counsell of all such lordes as had taken part with king Iohn. Anon after it was once openlie knowne, that the sonnes and daughters of the late deceased prince were brought into a place of safetie, a great number of the lordes and chiefe barons of the realme hasted thither, I meane not onelie such as had holden with king Iohn, but also diuerse other, which vpon certeine knowledge had of his death, were newlie reuolted from Lewes in purpose to aid yong king Henrie, to whome of right the crowne did apperteine.

Math. Paris.

Whither also came Wallo or Guillo the popes legat (an earnest defender of the kings cause) with Peter bishop of Winchester, & Jocelin bishop of Bath: also Ranulph earle of Chester, William Ferrers earle of Derby, Iohn Marshall, and Philip de Albemarle, with diuerse other lordes and peeres of the realme, and a great number of abbats and priors, who by and by fell to counsell together what waite should be best to take, for the good order of things now in so doubtfull and perillous a time as this. The peeres of the realme being thus assembled, William earle of Penbrooke, bringing the yong king into their presence, and setting him before them, spake these words following.

The earle of Penbrooks short and sweet oration as it is borrowed out of maister Fox.

Behold right honourable and wel-beloued, although we haue persecuted the father of this yong prince for his euill demeanour, and worchile, yet this yong child to whome here you see before you, as he is in years tender, so is he pure and innocent from those his fathers doings. Wherefore, in so much as euerie man is charged onelie with the burden of his owne works and transgressions, neither shall the child (as the scripture teacheth vs) beare the iniquitie of his father: we ought therefore of dutie and conscience to pardon this yong and tender prince, and take compassion of his age as y^e see. And now, for so much as he is the kings naturall and eldest sonne, and must be our souereigne king, and successour in this kingdome, come and let vs appoint him our king & gouernour, let vs remouue from vs this Lewes the French kings sonne, and suppress his people, which are a confusion and shame to our nation: and the yoke of their seruitude let vs cast from off our shoulders.

When the barons had heard this earles words, after some silence and conference had, they allotted of his sayings, and immediatlie with one consent, proclaimed the yong gentleman king of England, whome the bishops of Winchester and Bath did crowne and annoint with all due solemnities at Glocester, vpon the day of the feast of the apostles Simon & Jude, in presence of the legat. Being thus crowned, he was committed to the gouernance of his brother in law, the foresaid William Marshall earle of Penbrooke, who to win the good will of the people towards the yong king, sent forth messengers with letters into all parts of the realme, to signifye the newes of the kings coronation, with an offer also of pardon to all such of the barons side as would turne to his part: and likewise of great rewards to those, which hauing hitherto continued faithful, would so remaine vntill this trouble should be ouerpast. By this means it came to passe, that his frends greatlie reioiced at these newes, and manie of those which till that time had aided the Frenchmen, reuolted from them, and in hope of pardon and reward turned to king Henrie.

It is reported by writers, that amongst other things, as there were diuerse which withdrew the hearts of the Englishmen from Lewes, the consideration of the confession which the vicount of P^elune made at the houre of his death, was the principall. The order whereof, in the later end of the life of king Iohn, y^e haue heard. Cruellie how little god will in wardlie Lewes and his Frenchmen bare towards the English nation, it appeared sundrie waies. And first of all, in that they had them in a manner in no regard or estimation at all, but rather sought by all means to spoile and keepe them vnder, not suffering them to beare anie rule, nor putting them in trust with the custodie of such places as they had brought them in possession of. Secondlie, they called them not to counsell, so often as at the first they vsed to doo, neither did they proceed by their directions in their business, as before they were accus-

med. Thredie, in all manner of their conuersation, neither Lewes nor his Frenchmen vsed them so familiarly, as at their first coming; but as their manner is, shewing more lesse countenances toward them, they greatly increased the indignation of the English lords against them, who might euill abide to be so over-ruled.

To conclude, where great promises were made at their entering into the land, they were slowe enough in performing the same, so as the expectation of the English barons was quite made void: for they perceived daily that they were despised & scoffed at for their disloyalty shewed to their owne naturall prince, hearing now and then mys and talents openly by the Frenchmen, that as they had shewed themselves false and vntrusty to their owne lawfull king, so they would not continue any long time true vnto a stranger. Thus all these things laid together, gaue occasion to the English barons to remember themselves, and to take iust occasion to revolt vnto king Henrie, as before was haue mentioned. But now to the purpose of the historie.

We haue heard how Lewes had spent long time in vaine about the besieging of the castell of Douer, for although he plagued them within verie soze, yet Hubert de Burgh and Gerard de Sotigam bare themselves so manfully, and therewith so politicklie, that their aduersaries could not come to vnderstand their distresse & danger within the castell, in so much that despairing to win it in any short time, such before the death of king John was knowne (as some write) Lewes was contented to grant a truce to them that kept this castell, till the feast of Easter next ensuing: but as it appeareth by other this truce was not concluded till after the death of king John was signified to Lewes, who greatly reioicing thereat, supposed now within a short time, to bring the whole realme vnder his subiection: and therefore raising his siege from Douer, in hope to compass enterprises of greater consequence, he came backe vnto the citie of London.

When they within the castell of Douer saw the siege removed, they came forth, and burnt such houses and buildings as the Frenchmen had raised before the same castell, and coming abroad into the countie, got together such buttels and other necessarie provision, as might serue for the furnishing of their fortresse for a long season. After that Lewes was returned vnto London, he remained not long there, but with a great armie marched forth vnto Hertford, where he besieged the castell, which was in the keeping of Walter de Godardule seruant in household vnto Foulke de Barent, who defended the place from the feast of St. Martine, vntill the feast of St. Nicholas, and then deliuered it by composition, that he and his people might depart with all their goods, horse and armour. From thence Lewes went vnto Berkehamsted, and besieged the castell, which was valiantly defended by a Duch capteine named Maheron, who with his people behaued himselfe so manfully, that a great number of Frenchmen and other of them without, were left dead in the ditches. At an iller also made vpon the side, towards the north where the barons lay, they spoiled the carriage and trusse of the said barons, and took therewithall the standard of William Barons. Finally about the 20 day of December, they yet yielded the place vnto Lewes, because they were no longer able to keepe it their liues, goods, horse and armour saved.

Muth Paris.

Lewes having furnished this castell with a sufficient garrison, returned backe towards London, and coming to St. Albons, constrained the abbat to giue vnto him foure score marks of silver, for a fine, in recognisance of doing his homage till the feast of the purification of our lady next ensuing. Which pope abbat was made to believe, that he ought to take this dealing to be an act of great courtesie, the earle of Winchester being an earnest meane for him that he might so easilie escape. About the same time was a generall truce taken betwixt the king and Lewes, and all their partakers, till the 20 day after Christmasse, for the obtaining of which truce (as some write) the castell of Berkehamsted was surrendered vnto the same Lewes, as before ye haue heard.

After Christmasse, and whilst the truce yet durd, Lewes and the barons assembled at the council which they held at Cambridge, & the lords that took part with the king met likewise at Oxford, and much talke there was, and great traueil imploied to haue concluded some agreement by composition betwixt the parties, but it would not be, nor yet any longer truce (which was also sought for) could be granted: whereupon Lewes besieged the castell of Wybitham, the which together with the castells of Forwich, Colchester, and Oxford, were surrendered vnto him, to haue a truce granted vntill a moneth after Easter next ensuing. And so by this meanes all the east part of the realme came vnto the possession of Lewes. For the Isle of Elie was won by his people a litle before the last truce, whilst he himselfe lay in siege at Berkehamsted, except one fortresse belonging to the same Isle, into the which the souldiers that serued there vnder the king were withdrawen. But yet although Lewes might seeme thus partlie to preuaile, in hauing these castells deliuered into his hands, yet being aduertised that daily there revolted diuerse of the barons of England vnto king Henrie, which before had taken part with him: he stood in great doubt and feare of the rest, and therefore furnished all those castells which he had wonne with conuenient garrisons, and namelie the castell of Hertford, and after went to London, there to vnderstand what further trust he might put in the rest of the English lords and barons: for as diuerse had already forsaken him, as it is said, so the residue were doubtfull what they were best to doe.

For first they considered, that the renouncing of their promised faith vnto Lewes, whome they had sworn to mainteine as king of England, should be a great reproch vnto them: and againe they well saw that to continue in their obedience towards him, should bring the realme in great danger, sith it would be hard for any louing agreement to continue betwixt the French & Englishmen, their natures being so contrarie. Thredie, they saw somewhat in feare of the popes curse, pronounced by his legat, both against Lewes and all his partakers. Albeit on the other side, to revolt vnto king Henrie, though the loue which they did beare to their countie, and the great forwardnesse which they saw in him greatly maned them; yet sith by reason of his young yeares, he was not able either to followe the wars himselfe, or to take counsell what was to be done in publicke gouernement, they iudged it a verie dangerous case. For whereas in wars nothing can be more expectant than to haue one head, by whose appointment all things may be gouerned: so nothing can be more hurtfull than to haue manie rulers, by whose authoritie things shall passe and be ordered.

Wherefore these considerations staied and kept one part of the English lords still in obedience to Lewes, namelie, so: that diuerse of the considerats thought that it did not with their honours so to forsake him, till they might haue some more honorable colour to revolt from their promises: so that the matter should be taken up by some indifferent agreement to be concluded out of hand betwixt them. upon they resorted in like maner vnto London, and there with Lewes toke counsell what was to be done with their businesse touching the whole state of their cause. ¶ Here ye shall note, that before the concluding of this last truce, Fouks de Bzent the capteine of the castell of Bedford gat together a number of souldiers out of the garrisons of the castells of Wyford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windsor, and comming with them to S. Albons the 22 of February, he spoiled the towne & abbey, in like maner as he had done all the townes and villages by the way as he passed through the countrie, from Bedford vnto S. Albons.

The messengers which Lewes had remaining in the court of Rome, signified vnto him about the same time, that except he departed out of England, the sentence of excommunication, which Gualo or Walo the legat had pronounced against him, should be confirmed by the pope on Maundie thursdaie next ensuing. Whereupon Lewes was the more inclined to yield to the truce before mentioned, that he might in the meane time go ouer into France to his father, who had most earnestlie written and sent in commandement to him, that in any wise he should returne home to talke with him, and so about midlent after the truce was concluded, he prepared himselfe, and sailed ouer into France, and as Polydor saith (but with what authoritie I know not) the king of Scots went also with him.

After his departure ouer, William earle of Salisbury, William earle of Arundell, William earle Warren, and diuerse other reuolted to king Henrie. Moreover, William Marthall earle of Penbroke so trauelled with his son William Marthall the younger, that he likewise came to take part with the young king: whereby the side of Lewes and his Frenchmen was sore weakened, and their harts no lesse appalled for the sequels of their affaires. Lewes returned yet into England before the truce was expired. The lords that held on the kings part in the absence of Lewes, were not forgetfull to vse opportunitie of time: for beside that they had procured no small number of those that before time held with Lewes to reuolt from him to the kings side, they at one selfe time besieged diuerse castells, and recovered them out of their aduersaries hands, as Marleborough, Farnham, Winchester, Cicester, and certeine other, which they ouerthrew and rased, because they should not be taken and kept againe by the enimie. For ye must vnderstand, that the going ouer of Lewes now at that time, when it stood him most by on to haue bene present here in that troublesome season (which he ought to haue regarded with singular circumspection, and warlike to haue watched, for brought no small hinderance to the whole state of all his businesse, in so much that he was neuer so highlie regarded afterwards among the Englishmen as before.

Saer de Quince
earle of win-

About the same time Ranulfe earle of Chester, William earle of Albermarle, William earle Ferrers, Robert de Weipount, Brian de Lisle, William de Cantlow, Philip de Marc, Robert de Gaugi, Fouks de Bzent, & others assembled their powers, and comming to Dunstable beside Loughborough in Leicestershire, besieged the castell there: the capteine thereof was one Henrie de Warbroke. This Henrie defended the place right manfully, and doubting to be in distress by long siege, sent with all speed to the earle of Winchester, Saer de Quince as then being at London with the Frenchmen, requiring him to send some succour to remoue the siege. Whereupon the earle of Winchester, to whom that castell belonged, required Lewes that some conuenient powder might be sent, whereby the siege might be remoued. Wherefore upon counsell taken with deliberate aduise, it was ordeined that an armie should be sent thither with all speed, not onlie to raise the siege, but also to subdue that countrie vnto the obedience of Lewes. Wherewith there went out of London 600 knights, and with them about twentie thousand men in armour, grædie (as it seemed) to haue the spoile of other mens goods.

Their chiefe capteins were these: Saer de Quince earle of Winchester, Robert Fitzwater, and others, and they did set forward upon the last of Aprill, which was the mondaie before the Ascension daie, passing through S. Albons, where they lodged the first night, and so to Dunstable, and by the waie such souldiers as were bled to spoile and pillage, pladed their parts, not sparing to rob and ranfacke as well religious houses as other. From Dunstable keeping on their iournie northwards, at length they came to Mountfozell, but the earle of Chester and the other lords, aduertised of their approach, were retired before to Potingham, determining there to abide, till they might vnderstand what waie the enimies would take.

The earle of Chester rais-eth his siege.

In the meane time the earle of Winchester and the other barons, finding their enimies departed and the siege raised, determined forthwith to go vnto Lincolne, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had kept siege a long time before the castell, but yet in vaine. For there was a noble ladie within that castell named Nichola, who demeaned hir selfe so valiantlie in resisting all assaults and enterprises, which the enimies that besieged hir could attempt by anie meanes against hir, that they rather lost than wan honour and estimation at hir hands bailie. Wherefore Robert Fitzwater and the other leaders of this armie, to the end they might get that castell out of hir and other their enimies hands, toke their iournie forward, and passing through the vale of Beaumere, all things there that came to sight fell into the hands of the grædie souldiers. For the French souldiers, which were as it had bene the scum & refuse of their countrie, least nothing vntouched that they might lay hands vpon, not sparing church or churchyard, nor halloved place more than common or prophane. For they were so poore and ragged, that they had scarce anie tatters to couer their priuie parts withall. Finally comming vnto Lincolne, they assaulted the castell with all maner of engins, and assailed by all waies possible whereby they hoped to aduance their purpose.

French souldiers.

Thus whiles the barons with the Frenchmen were much busied about the siege of Lincolne castell, William Marthall earle of Penbroke, by the aduise of the legat Gualo or Walo, and of Peter bishop of Winchester, and other of the counsell with king Henrie, caused summons to be given to all capteins and chateleins on the kings part, to be at Dewarke vpon mondaie in Whitsuneweke, with such powder as they might make, from thence to march to Lincolne, there to raise the siege, and deliuer the countrie from imminent oppression. Whereupon there assembled at the daie and place prefixed, a great puissance of people desirous to fight for the defense of their countrie against the Frenchmen and other aduersaries, rebels to the pope, and excommunicated persons, so that when the muster was taken, there was numbered 400 knights, 250 crossebowes, besides demilances and horsemen in great numbers, which for need might haue supplid and serued in stead of men of armes, being verie well furnished for the purpose, and armed at all points.

William

William Marshall the younger, Peter bishop of Winchester, a man right skillfull in feats of warre, Ranulph earle of Chester, William earle of Salisbury, William earle Ferrers, William earle of Albemarle, besides barons, as William de Albemarle late released out of captiuitie, John Marshall, William de Cantlow, and William his sonne, Foukes de Bzent, Thomas Bassett, Robert de Clerpount, Brian de Lisse, Geoffrey de Lucie, Philip de Albemarle, with manie other chateleins and constables of sundrie castles.

The legat accursed Lewes & his complices.

The legat being there present also on the fridaie in the Whitfunwake aforesaid, reuested in a white albe, accompanied with the cleargie, accursed in solemne wise Lewes the French kings sonne, with all his saviours and complices, & especiallie those which held siege before the castell of Lincolne, with all the citie: and the more to encourage all those that should passe forth in this armie, to raise the siege, he granted to them free remission of all their sins, whereof they were trulle confessed, and by authoritie which he had from almightie God, and the apostolike see, he promised to them the guerdon of euerlasting saluation. Here with when the armie had receiued absolution, and the legats blessing, euerie man marched forth in his order and place appointed, and coming to Stow, an eight miles from Lincolne, they lodged there all night.

In the morning they passed forth towards Lincolne, under the conduct of the said earle of Pembroke as generall of the whole armie, who being come thither, compassed about the citie with his armie. And to cause the enimie the sooner to leaue the siege of the castell, he assaulted the gates of the citie, insuring his power to beare downe and breake them open. The Frenchmen perceiuing all the danger to be about the gates, withdrew a little from the assailing of the castell, and resorting to the walles of the citie, did their best with shooting and casting of stones and other things, to diuine their aduersaries from the gates.

Foukes de Bzent.

Thus whiles they were occupied on both parts, Foukes de Bzent entered into the castell by a posterne gate on the backside, and a great number of souldiers with him, and rushing into the citie out of the castell, he began a fierce battell with the citizens within the citie: which when the Frenchmen perceiued, by the noise and cry raised at their backs, they ran to the place where the skirmish was, doing their best to beat backe the aforesaid Foukes de Bzent with his companie. But in the meane time the Englishmen, under the leading of Hauerie de Spauleon, a Poitouin (of whom you haue heard in the life of king John) brake open the gates and entered the citie. When the fight was soze increased and maintained for a time with great furie: so that it was hard to iudge who should haue the better. But at length the Frenchmen and those English lords that were with them, being soze laid at on ech side, began to retire towards the gates, and finalie to turne their backs and so fled awaie: but being beset round about with the kings horsemen, they were straightwaies either slaine or taken for the most part of them.

The Frenchmen put to flight at Lincolne.

The earle of Berchaine.

Poble me taken prisoners.

Gilbert de Gaunt by the gift of Lewes.

Amongst other that were there slaine, the earle of Berch a Frenchman was one, who being gotten into a churchyard manfullie defended himselfe till his horse was killed under him, and laddie himselfe was also beaten downe and slaine. There were taken of Englishmen, Saer de Quincie erle of Winchester, and Humphrey de Bohun earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt earle of Lincolne by the gift of Lewes, Richard de Montichet, William de Spowbaie, William de Beauchampe, William de Spanduit, Oliuer de Harecourt, Roger de Cressie, William de Coleuill, William de Ros, William de Kopeley, Ralfe Chantuit, and diuerse other: so that of knights there were taken to the number of foure hundred, beside such multitude of demilances, and other horsemen and footmen, as could not well be numbered. Moreover, all the prouision, trulle, and baggage laden in carts, clothfacks, and males belonging to the barons and Frenchmen was taken, and the citie was spoiled, rifled and sacked.

This enterpryse and discomfiture at Lincolne, which was in derision called Lewes his faire, chanced the 14 kalends of June, being saturday in the Whitfunwake. Manie honest matrons of the towne were poisoned, as they were got into boates to auoid the danger of their persons, wanting skill how to guide the same boates. The earle of Penbroke the same daie before he receiued any repast, rode backe in post to the king, whom he had left at Stow, and there declared the sofull netwes of his god sped, in vanquishing of the enimies. On the next morrow, netwes came to the king, that they which had kept the castell of Mountsozell were fled out of the same, and had left it void. Whereupon immediatlie he sent in commandement vnto the shiriffe of Spotinghamshire, that going thither in his owne person, he should ruinat the said castell, & make it plaine with the ground.

Lewes his faire.

The R. com mandeth the shiriff of Spowbaie to be executed.

The Frenchmen which escaped with life from the slaughter of Lincolne, as the Marshall of France, the chateleine of Arras, with others, made towards London with all possible sped, in hope to escape so well as they might: but manie of them, and namelie the footmen were slaine by the countrie people where they passed, and that in great numbers: for the husbandmen fell vpon them with clubs and swords, not sparing those whom they got at aduantage. Two hundred knights or men of armes (as we may call them) getting to London, presented vnto Lewes the sofull report of their misadventure, and were of him not moaned, but blamed and soze rebuked, for that they had fled, and shamefullie left the residue of their companies to be distressed, taken, and slaine by the aduersaries, where if they had manfullie stood to it, they might happily haue saved their fellowes, and obtained victorie.

The Chronicle of Dunstable theweth in deed that Simon de Deschre and Henrie Baulzoc, perceiuing that Foukes de Bzent was entered into the citie, and that they were now assailed both afront, and on the backes, they withdrew, and getting together 80 French knights or men of armes (if we shall so call them) departed out of the citie, and fleeing through the countrie by Lin and saint Edmundsburie, at length got through to London. Whos sooner they were welcomed of Lewes, certaine it is, that the lords that took part with king Henrie, were put in no small hope by the atchining of this so great a victorie, to bring within a short time all the realme to the obedience of king Henrie: and hereupon marching forth into the countrie, put the people in such feare, that they submitted themselves vnto the gouernment of king Henrie in all places where soeuer they came.

Chr. Dunst.

On the other part, Lewes who all this season remained at London, being soze dismayed for the losse of his people, began to feare euerie daie more and more, least by some practise he should be betrayed and deliuered into his enimies hands. Wherefore he went about to make himselfe as strong as was possible, & fortifying the citie, sent messengers into France, to requite his father to send him more aid. His father soze to heare of his sons distress, and loth that he should take the soile, caused his daughter the wiue of Lewes, to prepare a power of men, that the same might might passe with all speed ouer into England to the aid of his husband. For the French king himselfe would not seeme to aid his sonne, because he was communicated: but his daughter in law, hauing licence and commission thereto, gat together three hundred knights, or men of armes, whome with a great number of other souldiers and armed men, she sent downe to Caleis, where Eustace the monke had provided a nauie of ships to conueie them ouer into England. But how they sped you shall heare anon.

In the meane time the earle of Penbroke approached towards London, purposing to assault the citie now in this opportunitie of time, letting passe no occasion that might further his proceedings, night and day studieng how to recouer the realme wholie out of the Frenchmens hands, and to set the same at libertie: so that what was to be deuised, he did deuise, and what was to be done, that he did, not following any occasion or opportunitie that might be offered. The English barons also calling to mind the benefit which they had receiued at the Frenchmens hands in time of their most need, sought now by all means possible, some waie how to procure a peace betwixt king Henrie and the said Lewes, thinking by that means to benefit themselves, and to gratifie him in lieu of his former courtesie bountifullie shewed in a case of extremitie, which because it was obtained in a wished time was the more acceptable, whereas being lingered it had bene the lesse welcome, as one saith,

Gratia que tarda est ingrata est, gratia namq; Quam fieri properat gratia grata magis.

Whereupon they caused daile new articles of agreement to be presented in writing vnto the said Lewes, as from king Henrie. But while these things were a doing, the earle of Penbroke and other the lords that took part with king Henrie, hauing aduertisement, that a new supplie of men was ready to come and aid Lewes, they appointed Philip de Albennie and John Sparshall to associat with them the power of the cinque ports, and to watch for the coming of the aduersaries, that they might keepe them from landing, who on saint Bartholomewes day set forth to Caleis, in purpose to arrive in the Thames, and so to come vp the riuer to London. Hubert Herbert de Burgh capteine of the castell of Douer, together with the said Philip de Albennie and John Sparshall, with other such power as they could get together of the cinque ports, hauing not yet about the number of 40 ships great & small, vpon the discomring of the French fleet, which consisted of 80 great ships, besides other lesser vessels well appointed and trimmed, made forth to the sea. And first coasting a litle from them, till they had got the wind on their backs, came finally with their maine force to assault the Frenchmen, and with helpe of their crossbowes and archers at the first joining, made great slaughter of their enemies, and so grappling together, in the end the Englishmen bare themselves so manfully, that they vanquished the whole French fleet, and obtained a famous victorie.

Eustace the monke was found amongst the capteins, who although he offered great summes of gold for his ransom, so that he might haue had his life saued, and also to serue king Henrie, yet the English capteins would none of that: but Richard the bastard sonne of king John, took him, and cut off his head, and sent it vnto king Henrie his brother, as a witnesse of this their achieved victorie. This Eustace was a Fleming boyne, and sometime a monke, but renouncing his coule to receiue such heritage as fell to him by the death of his brethren, deceasing without issue, he became a notable pirat, and had done in his daies much mischief to the Englishmen, and therefore was now rewarded according to his demerits. For

The spoile and prey of the French ships was verie rich, so that the Englishmen being laden with riches and honour, vpon their safe returne home were receiued with great ioy and gladnesse. But Lewes, after he understood of this mischance happening to his people that came to his aid, began not a litle to despair of all other succour to come vnto him at any time hereafter: wherefore he inclined the sooner vnto peace, so that at length he took such offers of agreement as were put vnto him, and receiued further more a sum of monie for the release of such hostages as he had in his hands, together with the title of the kingdome of England, and the possession of all such castels and holds as he held within the realme. The French chronicle (to the which the chronicle of Dunstable and Matthew Paris doe also agree) affirmeth that he receiued fiftene thousand marks. Whereafter, the popes legat absolved Lewes and all those that had taken his part in the offense of disobedience shewed in attempting the waite against the popes commandement.

Then Lewes with all his complices that had bin excommunicated swore vpon the holie euangelist, that they should stand to the iudgement of holie church, and from thenceforth be faithfull vnto the pope and to the church of Rome. Whereafter, that he with his people should incontinentlie depart out of the realme, and neuer vpon euill intent returne againe. And that so farre as in him late, he should procure his father king Philip, to make restitution vnto king Henrie of all the right which he had in the parts beyond the sea: and that when he should be king of France, he should resigne the same in most quiet manner.

On the other part, king Henrie took his oath together with the legat, and the earle of Penbroke gouernour of the realme, that he should restore vnto the barons of his realme, and to other his subiects, all their rights and heritages, with all the liberties before demanded, for the which the discord was moued betwixt the late king John and his barons. Whereafter, all prisoners on both parts were released and set at libertie, without paying any ransom: yea and those which had covenanted to paie, and vpon the same were set at libertie before the conclusion of this peace, were now discharged of all summes of monie which then remained vnpaid.

This peace was concluded on the eleuenth day of September, not farre from Stanes, hard by the riuer of Thames, where Lewes himselfe, the legat Guallo, and diuerse of the spiritualtie with the earle of Penbroke lord gouernour of the realme, and others, did meet and talke about this accord. Now when all things were ordered and finished agreeable to the articles and covenants of the peace, so farre as the time present required, the lords of the realme (when Lewes should depart homeward) attended him to Douer in honorable wise, as appertained, and there took leaue of him, and so he departed out of the realme about the feast of saint Michaele.

King Henrie by this meanes being put in full possession of the realme, according to the prescript of that article contained in those conditions of the peace lastelie specified, pardoned all those that had aided his aduersarie Lewes during the wars, except certeine of the spiritualtie, which were put to such fines, that they were compelled to laie all that they had to pledge, to leaue such summes of monie, as they might with the same obtaine the kings fauour againe: and before that, to sue to Rome for their entire absolution compelled to paie a thousand marks to the popes vse for recourcie of his bishopricke, & an hundred marks also to the legat of god and latysfull monie. Such che-well persons secular as regular, that he got together twelve thousand marks towards his charges, whereby it appeared, that he lost no time in England. But

Fouks de Went.

The realme now being quiet and in all outward felicitie, a number of unruly persons, such as delighting in idlenesse, knew not how to lue in time of peace, assembled themselves together and appointing Fouks de Went, who was a man of great stomack and more rashnesse, to be their capteine and ringleder began to make warre against the king, and to spoil the townes and countries about them, so that their euill doings might haue caused no small perill to haue ensued by some great ciuill sedition, if the earle of Penbroke had not in time prevented their attempts. For he assembling the kings power, hasted towards the rebels, and what by his owne au-thoritie, and by the reuerend regard of some bishops in his companie; more than by using any force of armes, he staid the matter for that time, so that no further mischefe followed of this mutinie.

Marth. Paris.

Besides the foresaid Fouks de Went, there were other of the Nobilitie also which practised the like disorder, as William earle of Albemarle, Robert de Cleipoint, Brian de Lisle, Hugh de Balloll, Philip de Sparre, and Robert de Gangi, the which Robert withheld the castell of Petwarke that belonged to the bishop of Lincolne, and would not deliuer it, till the king with William Sparthall erle of Penbroke had laine at siege before it an eight daies, in the end of which terme by mediation of friends the matter was taken vp, and the bishop recovered his castell, paieing to the said Robert de Gangi an hundred pounds sterling for the viuals which he left within the same castell.

Some after this, Ranulph earle of Chester was sent into the holie land by king Henrie, with a good the christians there against the infidels, which at the same time had besieged the cite of Damietta in Aegypt, in which enterprize the valiancie of the same earle after his comming thither, was to his great praise most apparant. There went with him in that tourne Saer de Quincie earle of Winchester, William de Albanie earle of Arundell, besides di-uerse barons, as the lord Robert Fitz Walter, John

The next yeare, which was after the birth of our lord 1219, William Sparthall the foresaid earle of Penbroke died, gouernour both of the realme and also of the kings person, a man of such worthinesse both in stoutnesse of stomack and martiall knowlege, as England had few then liuing that might be compared with him. He was buried in the new temple church at London upon the Ascension day. The same yeare also Wallo or Guallo the legat returned to Rome, and Ranulph, who (as before is expresed) did the message so stoutlie from pope Innocent to king John, was also made bishop of Norwich.

Moreover, the gouernement of king Henrie after the death of William Sparthall the elder, earle of Penbroke, was committed vnto Peter bishop of Winchester: for the yong king was almost destitute of any of his kindred that were worthie to haue the rule of him: so much as his mother quene Isabell was lately married to Hugh Blume the earle of Sparth in France, vnto whome she was promised before king John took her to wife, as in the life of the same king John is mentioned.

The bishop of Winchester being now in the possession of the kings person, doubting least he had taken a greater charge vpon him than he might well answer, caused diuerse sage and honourable personages to be admitted of the kings counsell, to assist him in the administration of the common-wealth and good gouernance of the realme. Which being done, a parlement was holden at London, wherein a subside was granted to the king of two shillings to be gathered and lenied of euerie ploughland within his dominions, towards the relieuing of the great charges which he had sustained by the warres against the foresaid Letwes.

About the same time also he began the building of the new worke of the church at Westminster. In which meane time the cite of Damietta afore mentioned, was twone by the christian princes, and Ranulph earle of Chester returned home, leauing the earle of Arundell with a great number of souldiers behind him there in aid of the christians against the Saracens, which dailie attempted the recourcie of the same. Moreover, in the yeare ensuing, which was of our lord 1220, and vpon the seauententh day of Maie being Whitsunday, the king was effronles solemnelie crowned at Westminster, to the end it might be said, that now after the ertinguisment of all seditious factions, he was crowned by the generall consent of all the estates and subiects of his realme.

The same yeare also was the bodie of Thomas archbishop of Cantuarburie translated, and Hugh bishop of Lincolne canonized for a saint. In like manner in the vigile of Peter and Paule, the king finding the castels of Rokingham and Saunreie at that present unpurueied of viuals, took the same into his hands against the will of William of Albemarle which before held the same. This yeare also was a proclamation made in London, and throughout all the realme, that all strangers should auoid the land before the feast of saint Michael then next following except those that came with merchandise. Further, more Ranulph earle of Chester, after he was come from the holie land, began to build the castels of Chartleie and Bexston, and afterward he also builded the abbeie of Dieu Rencrese, commonlie called Delacresse of the white order. Toward his charges sustained about the building of which castels and abbeie, he took toll throughout all his lordships of all such persons as passed by the same with any cattell, chaffre or merchandise.

This yeare deceased Henrie de Boun earle of Hereford, and Saer de Quincie earle of Winchester in their tourne which they made into the holie land. Also the same yeare the priests or canons that inhabited within the kings castell of old Salisburie, remoued with the bishops se into new Salisburie, which by the king was made a cite. The bishop Richard procured this remouing, through the kings helpe, who was verie willing therevnto, as it seemed by his charters largelie granted in that behalfe. After this, king Henrie held his Christmasse at Oren-ford, at that time William de Fitz earle of Albemarle meaning to trouble the kings peace, and to set things in a new broile, departed from the court in the night season, without leave or licence, and hastid with all speed vnto the castell of Bisham, where he assembled a sort of youthfull persons, giuen to lewd demeanor, and wearie of quietnesse (as to whome theft and robberies were verie pleasant) by whose helpe he spoiled diuers townes and villages about him, as Tenham and Deping, with others.

There were of counsell with him also (as was thought) Fouls de Bient, Philip de Marc, Peter de Mauldon, Engellard de Athis, and manie other, who priuile sent men to his aid, and furthered him in his tumultuous affaires, that they might partitipat with him the sweetnesse of the spoile, which is the marke whereat euery one thoteth that is

In the meane time the countrie people withdrew to the churches, and gat their goods into the churchyards. Moreover, the peeres of the realme assembled themselves in counsell at Westminster where the king was present, whither the earle of Albermarle was summoned to come, who faining as though he had meant to haue gone thitherward directly, turned suddenly his waie to the castell of Fordinghey, and toke it vpon the sudden, furnishing it also with a garrison of souldiers, to be kept hereafter to his owne vse. That castell was in the keeping of the earle of Chester, who at that instant had but few souldiers there in garrison, wherby it was the sooner surprised. When these newes were brought to the king, he raised a power and came with all speed to the castell of Wyham, vpon the wednesdaie next after the feast of Candelmasse, and then compassing the same about with a strong siege, he constrained them within by force of such engins as they used in those daies, that finally on the eight daie of Februarie they came forth, and submitted themselves and all that they had vnto the kings pleasure. Who caused them to be safely kept, till he might take further aduicement what should be done with them.

In the meane while also came the earle of Albermarle, who by the helpe & means of the archbishop of Doke, and the legat Pandulph, purchased peace at the kings hands, the rather indeed because he had faithfully serued both the king and his father king John in their wars, before that time. All those men of armes & souldiers also, which had submitted themselves and remained as prisoners, were pardoned. Which ouer-great clemencie caused other brutish persons to attempt the like offense of rebellion shortly after. At the very selfe same time the Welshmen began to furre, and vnder their prince and leader Leolin they entered vpon the English marches, and with great crueltie spoiled and robbed the same, wherevpon it was determined by the counsell, that the king (as he was comming toward the castell of Wyham) should diuide his armie, and so he did, leauing one part thereof against the Welshmen: wher vpon Leolin, after he understood that the kings power came toward him, as one not able to resist the same, cast off his armour, and submitted himselfe to his mercie.

There be which write, that where prince Leolin had besieged the castell of Buert belonging to Reginald de Bente, the same Reginald besought the king to helpe to remoue that siege. The king contented with his request, came with a puissant armie into those parts, and therewith the siege was raised, for the Welshmen (according to their accustomed manner) fled. The king then entring further into the countrie, came to the place where Mountgomerie now standeth, and perceiving the site of the same to be well so fortified, he caused a castell to be builded there, to restrain the Welshmen from their accustomed trade of harrieng the countrie. And so after he had forsaied those quarters, and taken order for the full accomplishment of that castell, he returned, the Nobles granting to him of euerie knights for two markes of silver.

Things being thus in quiet, the king (who by daily experience of matters grew to more knowledge from time to time) began now of himselfe to order his affaires for his owne behalfe, namelie touching the estate of his kingdome: and because he was minded to assaie the recourie of those places which his father had lost in France, he ordeined Sauerie de Mauldon to be his lieutenant in Guien, whereof a great part as yet remained in his hands, and moreover sent ambassadours vnto the French king, requiring of him restitution of those places which he had taken from his father.

These oratours being come into France, and admitted to the kings presence, receiued answer, that nothing ought to be restored, which by law of armes was rightlie conquered: and other redresse at that time would none be granted. But a maruell it was to consider here at home, in how short a space the state of the English common-wealth was changed, and from a troubled source reduced to a flourishing and prosperous degre: chiefelie by the diligent heed and carefull prouision of the king himselfe. So much auaileth it to haue him that ruleth, to attend that which belongeth to his office.

After this, to the intent that while he might be occupied in warres abroad, he should not be troubled with ciuill discord at home, he deuised to soine in affinity with the Scots, giuing his sister Ione in marriage vnto Alexander the king of Scotland, and Hubert of Burgh on the other side married the sister of the same Alexander called Margaret. These marriages were solemnized at Doke on the morrow after the feast of S. John Baptist, in the presence of a great number of the Nobles both of England and Scotland. A counsell also was holden by the archbishop of Canturburie at Orford for reformation of the state ecclesiasticall and the religion of monks. In which counsell two naughty felowes were presented before him, that of late had bene apprehended, either of them naming himselfe Christ, and preached manie things against such abuses as the cleargie in those daies used. Moreover, to proue their error to haue a shew of truth, they shewed certeine tokens and signes of wounds in their bodies, hands and feet, like vnto our sauour Iesus that was nailed on the crosse. In the end being well apposed, they were found to be but false dissemblers, wherefore by doome of that counsell they were iudged to be nailed vnto a crosse of wood, and so those to whom the execution was assigned, had them forth to a place called Arboherie, where they nailed them to a crosse, and there left them till they were dead. The one of them was an Hermaphrodite, that is to say, both man and woman. Also there were two women condemned, of whom the one had taken vpon hir to be that blessed virgine Marie, and the other fained hir selfe to be Marie Magdalene.

Ralph Coghshall sheweth this matter otherwise, and saith, that there were two men and two women brought before the archbishop at this counsell, of the which one of the men being a deacon, was accused to be an apostata, & for the loue of a woman that was a Jew, he had circumcised himselfe: & being herof conuicted & disgraced, he was committed to the secular power, & so burnt by the seruants of Fouls de Bient. The other being a young man, was accused of contemning the sacraments of the church, & that he suffered himselfe to be crucified, hauing the prints of the five wounds appearing in his bodie, and counterfeiting himselfe to be Christ, reioiced to haue the two women giue out and spread the rumour abroad, that he was Christ in deed, one of the which women being verie aged, was also accused of witcherie, ha-

This yeare also was the building of the steeple belonging to the church of S. Paule in London first shew. And this yeare also upon saint James day the citizens of London kept a plaie of defense and westling at the hospitall of saint James, against other their neighbours of the suburbs, and the quarters next adjoining. In the end wherof it so fortuned, that the Londoners had the upper hand: and amongst other that were put to the soile, the steward of the ab-bat of Westminster with his folkes went alwaie with the two: to their great grefe. Whereupon the same steward devised an other game of wrestling to be holden at Westminster on Lammas day next following, and that whosoever could get the upper hand there, should haue a ram for the price, which the steward had prepared.

At the day appointed, there was a great assembly, and the steward had got together out of all parts the best wrestlers that might be heard of, so that there was hard hold betwixt them and the Londoners. But finally, the steward upon desire of revenge, procured them to fall together by the eares without any iust cause, so that the Londoners were beaten and wounded, and constrained to flee backe to the cite in great disorder. The citizens soe offended to see their people so mistreated, rose in tumult, and rang the common bell to gather the more companie to them. Robert Scire maior of the cite would haue pacified the matter, persuading them to let the matter passe, till by orderlie plaint they might get redresse, as law and iustice should assigne. But a certaine stout man of the cite named Constantine Fitz Arnulfe, of godd authoritie amongst them, souised the multitude not to barken into peace, but to seeke revenge out of hand (wherein he shewed himselfe so farre from true manhood, that he beloued himselfe rather to haue had a womans heart, —quod vindicta still prosecuting the strife with tooth and naile, and blowing the coles of contention as it were with full bellows, that the houses belonging to the abbat of Westminster, and namelic the house of his steward might be ouerthrowne and beaten downe flat with the ground.

This lewd counsell was some receiued and executed by the outrageous people, & Constantine himselfe being cheefe leader of them, cried with a loud voice, Spout top mount top, God be our aid and our soueraigne Lefwes. This outrageous part comming to the notice of Hubert de Burgh lord chefe iustice, he gat together a power of armed men, and came to the cite with the same, and taking inquisition of the chefe offenders, found Constantine as constant in affirming the deed to be his, as he had before constantlie put it in practise, whereupon he was appehended and two other citizens with him. On the next day in the morning Foulke de Barent was appointed to haue them to execution: and so by the Thames he quietlie led them to the place where they should suffer. Now when Constantine had the halter about his necke, he offered fiftene thousand marks of siluer to haue bene pardoned, but it would not be. There was hanged with him his nephew named also Constantine, and one Geoffrey, who made the proclamation devised by the said Constantine. The cry also which Constantine used to the setting forward of his un-lawfull enterprise in the name of Lefwes most of all offended the kings friends, as the lord chefe iustice and others, who not satisfied with the death of the three before remembred persons, but also entering the cite againe with their bands of armed men, apprehended diuerse of those whome they took to be culpable, not onely putting manie of them into prison, but also punishing other of them, as some with losse of a foot, some of an hand, and other of their eye-sight. The king furthermore to reuenge this matter, deposed all the magistrats of the cite, and ordeined new in their roues. Which caused great hartburring against di-uerse of the Nobilitie, but cheselic the lord Hubert and Foulke de Barent, on whome in time they hoped to haue reuenge.

As this boile boied the cite of London, so in this yeare there chanced great tempest of thunder, lightning and raine, whereby much hurt was done in di-uerse parts of the realme, and at sundrie times, as by throwing downe of steeples, churches, and other bul-dings, with the rotting of trees, as well in woods as orchards, herie strange to consider, cheselic on the eight day of Februarie at Crantham in Lincolnshire, where there chanced (beside the thunder) such a stinke and filthie fauour to follow in the church, that the people fled out, so that they were not able to abide it. Likewise in the day of the exaltation of the crosse, a generall thunder happened throughout the realme, and thereupon followed a continuall season of foule weather and wet, till Candelinmas next after, which caused a dearth of corne, so as wheat was sold at twelue shillings the quarter. Likewise on the day of saint Andrew an other terrible tempest of thunder happened throughe the realme, throwing downe and shaking buildings in manie places, in so much that at Willerdeson in Northwiltshire, in a knights house, the ladie thereof and six other persons were destroyed by the same. And a turbarie thereby compassed about with water and marrelle was so dried up, that neither grasse nor mire remained, after which ensued an earthquake. Moreover on the euen of saint Lucie, a mightie wind raged, which did much hurt in sundrie places of the realme. Furthermore, about this time there appeared in England a wonderfull comet or blasing starre. The sea also rose with higher tides and spings than it had bene accustomed to do.
All which wonders were afterward iudged to be token and signifie the losse which the christians suffered the same yeare in Egypt, when they were constrained to surrender the cite of Damietta into the Saracens hands, which latelie before (as yet haue heard) they had wonne with long and chargeable siege.
After the yielding up of Damietta, William de Albenie earle of Arundell (whome Ranulfe earle of Chester left behind him in the holie land) with manie souldiers and men of warre (when he returned from thence) came now homewards towards England, and died by the waie.

About the same time John the sonne of David earle of Anguith in Scotland, sisters some unto Ra-nulfe earle of Chester, married the daughter of Leo-lin prince of Wales, as it were to procure a firall accord betwene the said Leolin and Ranulfe. After which marriage, king Henrie held his Christmaste at Wrenford, and shortly after the twelfside came to London: where assembling a counsell of his barons, he was earnestlie required by the bishop of Canturburie and other peres, to confirme the liberties, franchises, and free customes of the realme, for which the warres in his fathers time had bene moued: which advantage of his souereigne, but that it is likelie he he might not with ante reason, sith he had couenanted (and all the baronage with him) to see the same obserued, by the articles of the peace concluded with Lewes, when the same Lewes departed the realme.

Hereupon William Brelwer one of the kings counsell, hearing the archbishop so earnest in these matters, told him, that sith these liberties were procured & extorted rather by force than otherwise, of the king being vnder age, they were not to be obserued. Wherevnto the archbishop replied, that if he loved the king, he would be loth to seeke to trouble the quiet state of the realme. The king perceiuing the archbishop to be chafed, & taking the tale himselfe, made a courteous answer, and further aduise had in the matter, sent forth writs to the shiriffe of euerie countie, commanding them by inquirie of a sufficient iurie impanelled, to make certifficat within the quindene of Ester, what were the liberties in times past of his grandfather A. Henrie, died within the realme of England.

The same yeare, whiles William Sparshall earle of Penbroke was busie in Ireland in war against Hugh Lacie, Leolin prince (or king) of Wales, as some haue intituled him, toke by force two castles that belonged to the same earle: whereof when he was aduertised, with all speed he returned out of Ireland, raised an armie, and recovered the said castles, putting to death all such as he found in the same, to requite Leolin with the like damage as he had thewed him befoze in his absence. This done he entered into the land of Leolin, waisting and spoiling the same, whereof when the said Leolin was informed, he assembled an host of Welshmen, and comming into the field gaue battell, but the victorie rested on the earle of Penbrokes side: so that there were taken and slaine in this bickering to the number of 9000 Welshmen. There was in this yeare a conspiracie also begun by the earle of Chester, and other Noble men, against Hubert de Burgh lord chiefe iustice of England, by whose counsell (as it was thought) the king was moze strict towards the nobilitie and other his subiects, in staing his grant to confirme the charter of liberties, than otherwise he would haue bene, if the same Hubert and other had not aduised him to the contrarie.

In this season also John de Bzen king of Jerusalem, and the lord great master of the knights hospitallers came into England, where they were honorablie received of king Henrie, and liberally rewarded. The cause of their comming was to requite aid of the king for the recouerie of the holie land out of the possession of the Saracens. In like maner about the same time Leolin prince of Northwales, with certeine English lords, as Hugh Lacie and others, by an hatred which they bare towards king Henrie for his fathers sake, supposing that so euill a stocke as they toke him to be, could not bring forth antie good branch, fought by open warres to bring William Sparshall earle of Penbroke and other barons that were faithfull friends to the king vnto their purpose: but the whole countrie rising against them, they were disappointed to their owne confusion, and so they could neuer bring that to passe which they so earnestly intended.

In this yeare Philip the French king departed this life, and after him succeeded Lewes his sonne, vnto whom king Henrie sent in ambassage the archbishop of Canturburie with three other bishops, to require, that (according to his oth made and receiued at his returne out of England) he would restore and deliuer vp to him the dukedome of Normandie, with other such lands and possessions as his father in times past had taken from king John, and still did wrongfullie withhold. A. Lewes answered herevnto, that he held Normandie & the other lands by good right and iust title, as he could well proue and iustifie, if king Henrie would come to the parlement in France to heare it. And as touching the oth which he had swozne in England, he affirmed that the same was first broken by king Henrie, both in that his men which had bene taken at Lincolne were put to greuous ransoms, and also for that their liberties for which the warre first began, were not obserued, but denied to the English subiects, contrarie to that which was concluded at the agreement betwixt them at the same time made.

Moreouer, king Henrie sent other ambassadours to Rome, who purchased a bull of the pope, whereby he was adiudged to be of age sufficient to receiue the gouernement of the kingdome of England into his owne hands, thereby to order and dispose all things at his pleasure, & by the aduise of such counsellours as he should elect and chuse to be about him. Whereupon after the said ambassadours were returned, all those earles, barons and nobles, which held ante castles, honors, manors or places apertaining to the king, were commanded to deliuer and resigne the same to his vse, which caused much trouble, as after shall appeare. For diuerse Noble men, whose hartes were filled with couetousnesse, would not obeye the popes order herein, but sore repined; yet not so much against the king as against the lord Hubert de Burgh, by whose counsell the king was most led and ruled. And therefore they did put him in all the blame, as one that should set the king against them, and staie him from suffering them to inioy those liberties, which they from time to time so much laboured to haue had to them granted and confirmed.

Upon this occasion therefore, they sued to the king for the restitution of the ancient lawes according to his promise, who to pacifie them for the time, gaue them a gentle answer, assuring them, that he would performe all that he had promised, so lone as opportunity would permit and suffer him so to do. Wherebeit, afterwards by the aduise of certeine old counsellours, which had bene of the priuie counsell with king John his father, he found a shift to disappoint them of their demands, by requirring them on the other side, to restore vnto him those things which they had in times past receiued of his ancestors. Furthermore, because he would the moze easilie obtaine his purpose, and make the residue afraid to followe a suit so displeasing and irksome, he thought best to begin with the chiefe authors and first procurers of the said petitions, and to take from them whatsoeuer they held belonging to his crowne.

Hereupon therefore assembling a great power about him, he demanded of Ranulph earle of Chester the restitution of certeine lordships which ancientlie appertained to the crowne of the realme, which earle not being as then able to resist, readily obeyed the kings pleasure, and resigned them all. By this entrance of the king into the execution of his purpose, diuerse of the rest of the barons were brought into such feare, that they were contented also to do the like, so that by this meanes the lords being cut off and weakened in power, increased as then from molesting the king antie further with the demand of other lands or liberties.

The archbishop of Canturburie also threatened them with the dact of excommunication, if they went about to disquiet the realme with antie ciuill commotions, though no man was moze desirous to haue that matter go forward than he, as appeared by his diligent trauell therein (hoping as now in those processe of time, and that by courteous meanes, to persuade

Whereupon diuerse mistaking his dealing herein, withdrew themselves secretly, some into one place, and some into another, to the intent they might avoid the daile light of such abuses, as they for the most part could not well abide to beate.

Disceord betwixt Saucerie de Haukeon and the earle of Salisbury.

Whilist king Henrie thus politikelie prouided for his affaires at home, Saucerie de Haukeon made prouision in Guen to withstand such perils and dangers as he saw most likelie to insue by the practices of the Frenchmen. But as he was most busilie occupied about the puruiance of such things as should be verie necessarie for his doings, there sprang a great disention betwixt him and William the earle of Salisbury, who was sent ouer into that countrie with commission to surueie the state thereof, and by colour of the same commission, toke vpon him to order all things at his owne pleasure. Whereas the foresaid Saucerie de Haukeon (being a man of high parentage in those parts where he was borne) iudged it to be a matter nothing standing with his honour, that another man should order things at his will and commandement within the countrie, where of he himselfe had the chiefe charge, as the kings lieutenant; and therefore determined not to suffer it anie longer.

Saucerie de Haukeon revolteth to the French king.

March. Paris. Marc. Westm. Foukes de Bient an emie to rest and quietnesse.

Hereupon verelie arose the contention betwixt them, which the English souldiers that were there, did greatlie increase, fauouring the earle as the kings vnckle, and contemning the lieutenant as a stranger borne, by meanes whereof the foresaid Saucerie doubting least if he should fight with his enemies, and through such disceord as was now amongst them, be put to the worse, the fault should be laid wholie on his necke: he secretly departed and fled to Lewes the French king, who was latelie come to the crowne of France by the death of his father king Philip, as you before haue heard: wherein he dealt wisely in respect of safetie. For Quid potuit iustitiam esse fuga?

About the same time Foukes de Bient, being a man of an vnquiet mind, readie to mischief and loth to liue in peace (as some saie) conspired against the king of England, and aduertised the king of France that if he would boldlie begin the warres against king Henrie in France, he would not faile but raise warre against him here in the midst of his realme of England, hauing diuerse noble men in readinesse, that would willingly take his part. But how soeuer it fell out, certaine it is that this Foukes hauing fortified his castell of Bedford, attempted manie enterprises greatlie to the prejudice of the kings peace, as well in robbing and spoiling the countrie about him, as otherwise.

March. Paris. Henrie B. broke taken by Foukes de Bient, and unpunished.

And now fearing to be punished therefore by order of law, he shewed his malice against such as had the execution of the same lawes chieflie in their hands. Hereupon he toke prisoner Henrie B. broke, one of the kings iudices of his bench, and led him to his castell of Bedford, and there shut him vp close as his lawfull prisoner. Indeed the said Henrie de B. broke, with Martine de Patrishull, Thomas de Spinton, and other of the kings iudices were come to keepe their circuit at Dunstable. Where, upon information giuen and presented before them, Foukes de Bient was condemned to the king in great summes of monie. Therewithall this Foukes toke such indignation and displeasure, that he commanded his men of warre which lay in the castell of Bedford, to ride vnto Dunstable, and thence to apprehend the said iudices, and to bring them vnto Bedford, where (as he said) he meant to commen further with them. But they hauing knowledge of his purpose, fled quicklie out of the towne, seeking to escape euerie man which waite he might best deuise. Whobebet, the souldiers vsed such diligence, that Henrie de B. broke fell into their hands, & so was brought captiue to Bedford as their maister had commanded them.

The king aduertised hereof by the gréuous complaints of his subiects, was as then at Southampton (where he had assembled his parlement) and thereupon hauing gathered speedilie a power, with all expedition he hasted towards Bedford. At his coming thither, he besieged the castell on eche side, and at length after two moneths, though not without much adoe, he toke it, and hanged them all which were taken within, being in number 80 or about: and amongst other William de Bient, the brother of the said Foukes was one. There were but thre that escaped with life, who were pardoned, vpon condition they should passe into the holic land, there to serue among the Templers. The siege began on the Ascension euent, and continued till the 15 daie of August, being the feast daie of the assumption of our ladie.

Bedford castle besieged.

Foukes himselfe, whilst the siege continued, lay aloofe in Cheshire, and on the borders of Wales, as one watching to do some mischief: but after the castell was towe, he got him to Couentric, and there was per long apprehended, and brought to the king, of whom he obtained pardon of life, but yet by the whole consent of the nobles and pères of the realme, he was exiled the land for euermore, and then went to Rome, where he knew to purchase his pardon easilie inough for mony, of what crime soeuer he should be iudged culpable. His wife, because she neuer consented to his doings, nor yet willingly to the marriage had betwixt hir and him, was acquitted of all blame, and so likewise was his sonne Thomas.

He was in the borders of Wales, where the earle of Cheshire was lord.

Whobebet at length the foresaid Foukes, hauing obtained his purpose at Rome (by meanes of his chapleine Robert Pallew an Englishman, who was his solicitor there) as he returned towards England in the yeare ensuing, was poisoned and died by the waie, making so an end of his inconstant life, which from the time that he came to yeares of discretion was neuer bent to quietnes. Which may be reported of him, not to his honour or remembrance (for alas what fame is gotten by giuing occasions of euill) but to his euermore shame and infamie, for the same shall neuer die, but remaine in perpetuall memorie, as one saith right well,

But now to leaue these things, and returne to the doings in France where we left. We shall vnderstand, that after Saucerie de Haukeon was revolted to the French king, the said king with all speed determined to make warre vpon king Henrie, and to win from him certaine townes and fortresses within the countrie of Poidou.

The French writers affirme, that king Lewes recovered out of the Englishmens hands the townes of Rior, St. Johns d'Angell, & Rochell, before Saucerie de Haukeon revolted from the French part. In deed, the chronicle of Dunstable saith, that after the truce toke end, this yeare the French king raised an armie, and toke Rior, and after they of St. John d'Angell submitted themselves vnto him. From thence he went to Rochell, within the which at that present was the said Saucerie de Haukeon with seuentie knights, and Richard Craie, with Geoffrey Beull, who had in their retinue fiftie knights. These with the forces of the towne sallied forth, & encountering with the French armie, due manie of their aduersaries, uerlaries, and loſt ſome of their owne people. Yet after this, the French king beſieged the towne, and in the end won it, whileſt the king of England being occupied about the beſieging of Bedford caſtell, neglected to ſend them within Rochell neceſſarie ſuccours.

But Polydor Virgil writeth, that now after that Sauerie de Mauleon was become the French king his man, the Doſcouins ſent vnto king Henrie, ſignifying, that they were readie to reuolt from the French kings ſubiection, and yeld themſelues vnto him, if he would ſend vnto them a power of men to defend their countie from the French men.

Now king Henrie hauing receiued theſe letters, intertained them that brought this meſſage verie courteouſlie, and promiſing them to ſend ouer aid with all expedition, he cauſed his nante to be made readie for that voyage. In the meane time, the French king ſent forth an armie vnder the leading of Sauerie de Mauleon, who then toke Poſt and Rochell, placing in the ſame ſundry garrifons of ſouldiers, but cheſe he fortified Rochell, which had bene long in the Engliſhmens hands, and alwaies ſerued them to verie good purpoſe, for the handſome landing of their people, when any occaſion required.

The French king therefore hauing got it, fortified it, and meant to keepe it, to the intent the Engliſhmen ſhould not haue hereafter in time of warre, ſo neceſſarie a place for their arrivall in thoſe coaſts.

King Henrie holding his Chriſtmaſſe at Weſtminſter, called his high court of parlement there the ſame time, and demanded a releſe of monie, toward the maintenance of his warres in France, and had granted to him the fifteenth penie in value of all the moveable goods to be found within the realme, as well belonging to the ſpiritualtie as temporallie, but vnder condition that he ſhould conſirme vnto his ſubiecs their often demanded liberties. The king vpon deſire to haue the monie, was contented to condeſcend vnto their requeſts, and ſo the two charters were made, and by the king confirmed, the one intituled Magna Charta, & the other Charta de Forreſta. Thus at this parlement were made and confirmed theſe good lawes and landable ordinances, which haue bene from time to time by the kings and princes of this realme confirmed, ſo that a great part of the law now in uſe dependeth of the ſame. The ſame charters alſo were directed and ſent forth into euerie countie within the realme to be proclaimed.

It was moreover decreed, that at a certeine daie after Eaſter, there ſhould be an inquiſition taken by the inqueſt of a ſubſtantiall iurie, for the ſeuring of forreſts, the new from the old, ſo as all thoſe grounds which had bene made forreſts, ſince the daies of king Henrie the grandfather of this Henrie the third, ſhould be diſforeſted. And therevpon after Eaſter, Hugh de Reuill, and Brian de Lille, were ſent forth as commiſſioners, to take that inquiſition. By force thereof, manie woods were aſſerred and improued to arable land by the owners, and ſo not onely men, but alſo dogs, which for ſafegard of the game were accuſtomed to loſe their clawes, had good cauſe to reioiſe for theſe confirmed liberties.

In the meane time, and about the feaſt of the purification, king Henrie (hauing ſuff occaſion to purſue the warre, for recouerie of thoſe towneſ taken, as beſore you haue heard by the Frenchmen) ſent ouer his brother Richard, whom he had made earle of Cornewall and Poitou, with a mightie nante of ſhips vnto Calceigne. This earle, hauing in his company the earle of Salisburie, Philip de Albene, and others, with prosperous wind and weather arrived at Burdeaw with foure hundred ſailles, and there landing his men, went ſtraight vnto the towne of ſaint Spachaire, ſituated vpon the banke of Saron, where, vpon his firſt comming, he gat the caſtell, and ſacked the towne, and then paſſing further, wan diuerſe other towneſ, as Longuille, Bergerat, and other, and after went with great diligence to beſiege and recouer Rochell, or rather Rioll. The French king aduerted of the earls arrivall, and of theſe his atchieued enterpriſes, ſent forth by and by the earle of Champaigne with a mightie armie into Guien to aid his people there.

The earle of Cornewall vnderſtanding of the coming of that French armie, toke a part of his hoſt, and therewithall went to meet his enimies, and lying in ambuſh for them by the way, had them at a good aduantage, and ſlew great numbers of them. After this, the earle of Champaigne keeping his men within their trenches and campe, without attempting any other exploit, the earle of Cornewall thought it ſufficient, if he might keepe the Calceignes in obedience, which had alreadie practiſed a rebellion, by ſending letters and meſſengers for the ſame intent vnto the French king, and therefore breaking by his ſiege beſore the Rioll, he ſtaied a while from exploiting any further enterpriſe. About the ſame time, the earle of Salisburie returning homewards out of Calceigne, was ſo toſſed and turmoiled on the ſeas by tempeſts of weather, that he fell ſicke thereof, and within a few daies after his arrivall died.

This yeare alſo, there came forth a decree from the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and his ſuffragans, that the concubines of preſts and clearkes within orders (for ſo were their wiues then called in contempt of their wedlocke) ſhould be denied of chriſtian buriall, except they repented whileſt they were alive in perfect health, or elſe ſhewed manifeſt tokens of repentance at the time of their deaths. The ſame decree alſo prohibited them from the receiuing of the paſt at maſſe time, & alſo of holic bread after maſſe, ſo long as the preſts kept them in their houſes, or vſed their companie publihelie out of their houſes. Moreover, that they ſhould not be purified when they ſhould be deliuered of child, as other good women were, unleſſe they found ſufficient ſueritie to the archdeacon, or his officiall, to make ſatisfaction at the next chapter or court to be holden, after they ſhould be purified. And the preſts ſhould be ſuſpended, which did not preſent all ſuch their concubines as were reſiſtant within their pariſhes. Alſo, all ſuch women as were conuict to haue dealt carnallie with a preſt, were appointed by the ſame decree to doe open penance. Where the queſtion may be aſked, whether this decree was extended to preſts wiues or no? Wherevnto anſwer may be made, that as a quadrangle in geometrie compriſeth in it a triangle, and a quaternion in arithmetike containeth a ternion; ſo in lo- gike a vniuerſall propoſition comprehendeth a particular. But it is ſaid here, that all ſuch women as had carnall knowledge with a preſt, were to be puniſhed, therefore ſome, and conſequentlie all preſts wiues. But yet this ſeemeth not to be the meaning of that decree, for preſts were allowed no wiues, naie Sericius the pope iudged that all ſuch of the cleargie as had wiues could not pleaſe God, becauſe they were in carne, which words he and the reſidue of that litter reſtrained to marriage, admitting in no caſe that churchmen ſhould inuade the rights of matrimo- nie. *Nature imperio: facias peiora necesse est,

This yere, or (as some saie) in the next, the king granted to the citizens of London free warren, that is to saie, libertie to hunt within a certeine circuit about London, & that all wiers in the Thames should be plucked up and destroyed. Also in this tenth yere of his reigne, king Henrie granted to the citizens of London, that they might haue and vse a common seale. About the tyme of the making of which ordinances, whio the cardinal of S. Nicholas in Carcere Tulliano came as legat from pope Honorius into England to king Henrie, presenting him with letters from the pope. The tenour wherof when the king had well considered, he declared to the legat, that without the whole assent of the estates of his realme, he could do little in that which the pope as then required.

Hereupon therefore he caused a parlement to be summoned at Westmynster, there to be holden in the octaves of the Epiphanie: this legat also moued the king in the behalfe of Fouks de Bzent, that he might be restored to his possessions, and inioyn his wife as before tyme he had done: but the king declared that for his manifest treason committed he was iustlie exiled, and not onlie by his, but by the sentence of the nobles and other estates of the whole realme: which answer when the legat had heard, he left off to sollicit the king for Fouks, and from thenceforth talked no more of that matter. Shortly after by waie of prorie, the said legat gathered a dutie which he claimed of the spiritualtie, that was of euerie conuientuall church within the realme two markes of silver.

In this yere the king held his Christmasse at Winchester, and after comming to Sparlebridge, chanced there to fall sicke, so that he laie in despaire of life for certeine daies together. In the meane time also came the daie appointed for the parlement to begin at Westmynster, where the legat and other of the spiritualtie and temporaltie being assembled, the said whio shewed the popes letters, and according to the tenour and purport of the same, was earnestlie in hand to haue the priests to grant the yereleie payment of a certeine pension or tribute to the pope, towards the maintenance of his estate, which they generally denied. When he saw that this bait would not take, he onlie demanded a tenth part of all their spirituall linings for maintenance of the wars against the Saracens, which was easilie granted, as more reasonable than the first.

Where by diuerse credible wyters of god credit, it should appeare, that the pope demanded to haue assigned vnto him out of euerie cathed; all church two prebends, one out of the portion belonging to the bishop, & another out of the portion belonging to the deane and chapter: and likewise of the abbeyes, where there were severall portions, that is to saie, so much of the conuent as belonged to the finding of one monke, and as much also of euerie abbats lining as should counteruaile the same. The cardinal used tollie persuasions to induce the prelates to assent to this grant, alledging that the church of Rome was run in great sander for taking of monie in dispatch of suiters causes, which arose by meanes there was no maintenance of living sufficient for the churchmen there: and therefore he added, how it was the parts of naturall children to relieue the necessitie of their louing mother, and that except the charitable deuotion of them and other god and well disposed persons were shortly extended, they should want necessarie maintenance for the sustentation of their lines, which should be altogether an vnseemlie thing for the dignitie of the Romane church.

The clergie resorting together to take aduise what answer they should make, at length vpon their resolute determination, John the archdeacon of Bedford was appointed to tell the tale for them all: who comming before the cardinal, declared boldly vnto him, that the demand which he had proponed, touched the king especiallie, and generallie all the nobilitie of the realme, which were patrons of anie churches. He added furthermore, how the archbishops and bishops, and manie other of the prelates of England (sithe the king by reason of his sicknesse could not be there) were also absent, so that they which were there present, being but as it were the inferior part of the house, neither might nor ought to make anie resolute answer as then in this matter. Immediately herewith also came the lord John Sparthall, and other messengers from the king vnto all the prelates that held anie baronies of the king, straightlie commanding them, that they should in no wise bind and indanger his laie sae vnto the church of Rome, whereby he might be depriued of his due and accustomed seruices, and so euerie man hereupon departed and went home.

This yere, the ples of the crowne were pleaded in the tower of London. And on the fiftenth daie of March in this tenth yere of his reigne, the king granted by his charter insealed, that the citizens of London should passe toll free through all England, and if anie of them were constrained in anie cite, borough or towne within the realme, to paie toll, that then the thiriffes of London might attach anie man of the said cite, borough or towne, where such toll was eracted, being found within the liberties of London, and him reteine with his goods and cattels, till the citizens that paid such toll were satisfied, by restitution of the same, with all costs and charges sustained in the suit. Howbeit, about the same tyme, the king constrained the Londoners to giue vnto him the summe of five thousand markes as a fine, for that they had aided and succoured his aduersarie Lewes against him, and lent to the said Lewes at his departure out of the realme a like summe. But it may rather be thought they gaue vnto the king the said five thousand markes for his fauour shewed in granting vnto them the aboue mentioned freedoms and liberties. At the same tyme, he had also twelue hundred pounds of the burgessees of Southampton, besides the fifteenth, which not onlie they, but also the Londoners, and all other generally through the realme, paid accordinglie as it was granted.

In Februarie, the king called a parlement at Bedford, in the which he made open declaration vnto all the assemblee, that he was now of lawfull age to gouerne of himselfe, without anie to haue rule over him, and so whereas before he was gouerned first by the earle of Denbroke lord protectour, whilest he liued, & after by the bishop of Winchester and others, he now remoued them from him by the counsell of the lord chiefe iustice, taking the regiment wholie to himselfe, & to such as should please him from thenceforth to appoint. Also in the same parlement, he did cancell and disanull the two charters before mentioned, after that the same had bene used through the realme for the space of two yeres, pretending them to be of no value, sith they were sealed and signed whilest he was vnder age. This deed of the king was graueouslie taken, and all the blame put in the lord chiefe iustice. Herewith all such also as claimed anie manner charters of liberties, were appointed to remoue the same (a practise onlie to get monie) and to get them confirmed with the kings new seale, the old being made void and pronounced of none effect.

In this yere died the French king Lewes the eighth, and his son Lewes the ninth succeeded him.

a child of twelue yeares of age, by reason of whose infancie diuerse partes of the realme began to withdraw their obedience from him, as Theobald earle of Champaigne, Hugh earle of Warth, and Peter duke of Britaine. Whereof, the earle of Champaigne was easilie rebued againe to his former obedience, by the high wisdom and policie of the queene mother, who had the gouernement of hir sonne the yong king and his realme committed vnto hir. But the earle of Warth constant in his purpose, came ouer to king Henrie, whose mother he had married, and declared vnto him, that now was the time for him to reouer those places, which king Philip had vniustlie taken from his father king John: and to bring the same to passe, he offered himselfe and all that he could make, in the furthering of this voyage. The king being thus pricked forward with the earle of Warth his words, determined without delaie to take in hand the warre.

¶ Here authors varie, for some write, that king Henrie sent ouer certaine persons, as the archbishop of Poike, the bishop of Careleill, and the Lord Philip Dablenie, to vnderstand the minds of the Flo-mans, the Britains and Poitouins. And for that those that were sent, brought word againe that the said people were not greatlie minded to forsake the French gouernment, he succceeded from attempting any exploit at that time. Other write, that gathering a great summe of monie of his subjects, towards the maintenance of his charges, he prepared a nauie of ships, and sailed ouer with the said earle of Warth into Britaine, and there waisted the confines of the French dominions, and that when the French king was readie with an armie to succour his subjects, he suddenlie retired to his ships, and returned into England, without achieving anie enterprise worthie of remembrance, so that whether he went himselfe or sent, it forceth not: for certeine it is that he profited nothing at that season, either by sending messengers to procure him friendship, or by going ouer himselfe to make an entrie to the warres.

When the French affaires were thus at a state, within a few moneths after, Richard earle of Cornewall returned forth of Gascoigne into England, and shortlie after, because he heard and was crediblie informed, that a certeine manour place which Wale-rane the Duchman, capitaine of Berkmsted castell held, by the gift and assignement of king John, appertained to his earldome of Cornwell, he seized the castell into his hands. So that Walerane being thus dispossessed, exhibited his bill of complaint to the king, who incontinentlie sent to the earle, commanding him to make restitution, which he bitterlie refused to do. But forthwith, comming to the king, and without reteining any aduocate, he declared his right which he offered to auerre in open presence, & in any of the kings courts, before what soeuer peres of the realme should be there assembled.

This addition [the peres of the realme] nothing pleased the king and his counsell, namelye the lord chefe iustice, by whose aduice the king meant to haue apprehended the earle the same night, after he was withdrawne to his lodging. But the earle warned thereof, secretlie departed, accompanied onelie with one man, and neuer drewe vnto out of his horses mouth, untill he came to Reading (whither his ser-uants resorted to him) and from thence he rode straight to Warlebyrge, where he found his deare friend William earle of Warthall, to whom he did impart the danger likelie to haue befallen him. Then they drewe to the erle of Chester, & taking order with him for the raising of an armie, there met shortlie after at Stamford the persons whose names hereafter insue; Ranulfe earle of Chester, William Warthall earle of Penbroke, Richard earle of Cornwell the kings brother, Gilbert earle of Gloucester, William earle Warren, Henrie earle of Hereford, William earle Ferrers, William earle of Warwike, and di-uerse barons, lords and knights, hauing there with them a great puissance of warlike personages.

The king hauing vnderstanding as well of their demeanor, as also what they required by their letters and messengers to him daile sent, thought good for a time to pacifie their furie, and thereupon appointed a day at Northampton, where he would meet, and minister such iustice vnto them, as should be thought reasonable, and to stand with their good willes and contentation. Whereupon, the parties comming to Northampton at the day assigned, he granted to the earle his brother (at the instant desire of the lords) all his mothers dowrie, with all those lands which belonged to the earle of Britaine within England, and withall, those lands also that appertained to the earle of Bullongne deceased. Thus the matter being pact-fied, euerie man departed to his home, whereas if the king had bene forward (as he was mild and patient, knowing that warres had immediatlie bene raised betwixt them, namelie, because manie of the lords bare a secret grudge towards the king, for that he had reuoked certeine liberties which in the beginning of his reigne he had granted to be holden, though now to take a-waite the enuie which might be conceiued towards him for his doing, he alledged, that he did not infringe any thing that he had then granted, but such things as his gouernours had suffered to passe whi-lest he was vnder age, and not ruler of himselfe: he caused them therefore to redeme manie of the same priuileges, whereby he gained great finance for the setting to of his new seale (as before we haue heard declared.)

Moreover, in this yeate there were sent certeine persons from pope Gregorie the ninth (that succeeded Honorius) into all the parts of Europe, to moue by preaching the christian people to make a iourne into the holie land against the Saracens. Such a multitude by means hereof did assemble together from all parts, and that within a short time, as the like had si-dome times bene heard of. It is said, that amongst them there should be to the number of fortie thousand Englishmen, of whom Peter bishop of Wilt-chester, and William bishop of Excester were the chefe. Captains also of that great multitude of cro-sed souldiers that went forth of sundrie countries were these, Theobald earle of Champaigne, and Philip de Albennie, through whose negligence the sequels of this noble enterprise came but to small effect. But to proceed.

About this time the king minding the benefit of the commonwealth, caused the weights and measures generallie within the land to be reformed after one standard. Furthermore, he created Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent, the which Hubert how much praise so euer he got at the beginning for his valiancie shewed in the defending of Dover castell, and in vanquishing the French fleet that was comming to the succour of Aewes by battell on the sea, it is certaine, that now he purchased himselfe double as much hatred and euill will, because that being of secret counsell with the king, and thereby after a long sequestred from the lords, he was knowne to dissuade the said prince from restoring of the ancient lawes and customs vnto the people, which the barons oft required: whereby it came to passe, that the more he grew in fauour with the prince, the further he came into the enuie of the nobilitie, and hatred of the pro-

Furthermore, upon the ninth of Julie Stephan the archbishop of Canturburie died, after he had governed that see the terme of 21 yeares, after whome succeeded Richard Wetherstede deane of Paules, who was the thre and fortith archbishop of that see. The monks of Canturburie had first elected one of their owne convent, named Walter de Helme: thain: which election was made by the same monks the thir dale of August next insuing the death of their said archbishop Stephan, but the king would not consent that he should have the place for diverse causes, which he obiected: as first, for that he knew him to be such a man as should be unprofitable, both to him and to his kingdom. Secondlie, because his father was a heretic, and thereof being convicted, suffered death upon the gallows. Thirde, for that he himselfe had stood against king John in time of the interdictiō.

A new trouble about the election of the archbishop of Canturburie.

Fabian.

Polydor. The earle of March sought to induce the Normans & Poitouins to favour the king of England. The Normans wrote to the king of England.

Math. Paris.

The Welsh besiege the castle of Mountgomerie.

On the other side, the bishops asstragans to the church of Canturburie obiected also against him, that he had used the familiar companie of a nunne, and begot of hir certeine children. Wherupon they alleged, that no election without their consent, could be good, nor ought to take place. But the monke making his appeale, stood in it, and taking with him certeine of his fellow monks of Canturburie, went to Rome, and there made supplication to the pope, that his election by his authoritie might be ratified and confirmed. Whereof the king and the other bishops being advertised, did put their objections in writing under their seales, & sent the same to Rome to be exhibited to the pope by the bishops of Weshchester and Rochester, and John the archdeacon of Bedford, who used such means, that his election was judged void, & then the said Richard Wetherstede was out of hand elected & confirmed. In that yeare also, a grant was made to the citizens of London, that they should have and use a common seale.

In this means while, Hugh the earle of March so laboured with the Normans and Poitouins in the behalfe of the king of England, that they began to incline to his purpose: whereupon he sent his letters by secret meanes unto king Henrie, signifying to him, that if it would please him to come over with an armie to make warre against the French king, they would be ready to turne unto his side, and receive him as their soueraigne. King Henrie taking aduise what to answer and do herein, with his welbeloued counsellour Hubert of Burgh, thought it not good to attempt any thing rashlie in this matter, because the dealings of the Normans were neuer without some fraud: but yet to satisfie the request of his friends, he promised to come over shortly unto them, if in the meane time he might perceiue that they remained stedfast in their purpose, giuing them furthermore manie great and hartie thanks for their good meaning and singular kindnesse towards him.

Now things beyond the sea standing in this order, it happened in the moneth of August, that the soldiers which late in garrison within the castle of Mountgomerie, took in hand to stocke up a wood not farre from the said castle, through which lay an high waie, where oftentimes manie felonious robberies and murders were committed by the Welsh. As the soldiers were busie at worke in stocking up the wood, there came upon them an ambushment of Welshmen, which not onlie drave them awaie from their worke, but also took and slew diuerse of them, constraining the residue to flee into the castle, which immediatlie the Welshmen inuironed also about with a strong siege, thinking to find the defendants unprovided.

They with in advertised Hugh de Burgh, the lord chiefe iustice (to whome the castle belonged by the kings late gift) of the exploit and enterprize attempted by their enemies, with all possible hast: whereupon the king at request of the said Hubert lent a power, and came to raise the siege. But the Welshmen hearing of the kings approach, fled awaie like sheepe, so that comming to the castle, he found no resistance: howbeit, for so much as he saw the foresaid wood to be troublesome and an annoyance to the said castle, he willed it to be destroyed. True it is, that the same wood was verie thicke and rough, and further it contained also five leagues or sixtene miles in length: yet by such diligence as was used, the same was waisted, stocked up, and quicklie rid out of the waie by fire and other means, so that the countrie was made plaine a great waie about.

After this, the king departed forth into the Welsh confines, and comming to an abbete of the white monks called Cride, caused it to be burnt, because it serued as a refuge for his enemies. Then by the aduise of the lord chiefe iustice Hubert de Burgh, he set in hand to build a castle there, because the place seemed verie fit for fortification. But after the king with his armie had laine there thre months, through lacke of vittells (the Welshmen still cutting the Englishmen off as they went abroad to fetch in forrage and other provision) he was constrained to fall to a greement with Leolin their prince, and receiving of the said prince the summe of thre thousand marks, he was contented that so much of the castle as was already builded, should be raced and made flat againe with the ground, before his departure from thence. Whereupon, manie men took occasion to tell at the lord chiefe iustice and his doings about this castle, who at the beginning named it Huberts folle.

Amongst other also that were taken prisoners by the Welshmen, whilst the king thus vainele spent his time about the building of that fort, William de Breuse a right valiant man of warre was one, who being taken by Leolin prince of Wales, was by him cruelle put to death (as after shall appeare) for the which act, and other such iniuries received at the same Leolins hands, king Henrie at length grievously punished him. ¶ For the most part of this summer season, great thunders happened in England: the element also seemed as though it had burned with continuall flames: steeles, churches, and other hie buildings were stricken with lightning, and the harvest was sore hindered by continuall raine. Also in the middelt of the day there came a wonderful darkenesse upon the earth, that the brightnesse of the aire seemed to be covered and taken awaie.

In the thirtieth yeare of this king, Stephan the popes chapleine and his Nuncio came over unto king Henrie, requiring to haue towards the maintenance of the popes warres against the emperor Frederike, a tenth part of all the mouerable goods within the realmes & countreies of England, Wales, and Ireland, as well of spirituall persons as temporal. Whereupon, a parlement or assemblie of the lords was called at Westminster, on the second sundae after Easter, which was the 29 of Aprill. At which parlement, when the popes buls were read, and the matter therein contained plainlie opened and examined, to the end it might appeare upon what necessarie causes the pope was constrained to pursue the said wars, and to aske reliefe of faithful christian people, being members of the holie church: the king, because he had by his procurators at Rome aforehand promised & bound himselfe to such payment of tenths, sate still, and answered not to the contrarie selues to rest doubtfull (not without great grudging and murmuring in the meane time, for the space of three or foure daies togither) at length, for feare of exin such sort, as they had escaped for a farre moze reasonable summe, if Stephan Segraue one of the kings counsell had not by compact (as was thought) made with the Nuncio, wrought so in the matter, that the tenths were finally granted, to the great impouerishment and inestimable damage of the church and realme of England. After this, the Nuncio shewed the procuratozie letters, whereby he was authorized to gather those tenths, and that not after a common manner, but by a verie straight and hard valuation.

And for the moze sure waie of proceeding herein, he had letters of authoritie from the pope, to excommunicate all such as should withstand him or his deputies in proceeding with those affaires. He shewed himselfe mozeouer verie extream in collecting of this monie, and namelie towards the prelates of the church, inasmuch that appointing him a certeine day in the which vnder paine of excommunication they should make paiment, diuers for want of readie mo-nie, were compelled to make shift with the chalices, and other vessels and ornaments belonging to their churches, and other were glad to take by monie by on interest, and for that shift there were come ouer with the Nuncio diuerse wicked blurers vnder the name of merchants, which when they saw those that stood in need like to be excommunicate for want of readie monie, they would offer themselves to lend vnto any that would borrow, after the rate of one noble for the loan of twentie by the moneth, so bringing the needie into their snares, to their irrecoverable losses and vndoing. Whereby the land was filled with bitter cursings (though in secret) by those that withed such vnrasonable exactors neuer to see god end of the vse of that monie.

Math. Paris.

From that day forward there wanted not in England certeine blurers called Caurini, which sought nothing else but the wealth of such persons as they might get into their snares, namelie those whome the church of Rome both ber and put to trouble with hir exactions and paiments. The earle of Chester onlie stood manfullie against the paiment of those tenths, inasmuch that he would not suffer his lands to be brought vnder bondage, neither wold he permit the religious men and preests that held of his fee to pay the same, although the rest of England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland were compelled to be contributozie thereto, hauing onlie this comfort, that not they alone, but also other forren regions were vnto to do the like. Thus did the locusts of Rome from time to time sucke the sweetnesse of the land, and all to mainteine the pompe and pride of the same, wherein what other practises did they vse, than

But to let this passe: king Henrie purposing to saile

Portsmouth about Michaelmasse, with such an armie assembled out of England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, as the like for number of people had not bene knowne to haue passed ouer with any of his ancestors: howbeit when he shuld come to the verie point of imbarcking his people, with vittels, armor, and other prouision, there were not ships sufficient to passe ouer the one halfe of the armie: wherefore when the king saw this default, he was sore offended, but chafelie with Hubert the earle of Kent, lord chiefe iustice, inasmuch that he openlie called him old traitor, and laid to his charge how he had thus bled the matter of purpose, onlie to pleasure the queene of France, of whome (as he said) he had receiued five thousand marks to hinder his proceedings. In this heat if the earle of Chester and other had not bene at hand, he had suerlie slaine the chiefe iustice euen there with his owne sword, who was glad to auoid

In the meane time there arrived Henrie earle of Britaine on the ninth of October, which shuld haue conducted the king into his countrie. But sith winter was come vpon them, he aduised him to stay till the next spring, and so he did. When euerie man was licenced to depart home, and the earle of Kent reconciled againe into fauour. The earle of Britaine in like maner did homage to the king for Britaine, and the king restored him to all his rights in England, and further giuing him five thousand marks to defend his countrie against the enmities, sent him home againe in most courteous and louing maner. In this yeere of our Lord 1230 king Henrie held his Christ-masse at Poike, togither with the king of Scots, whome he had desired to come thither at that time, that they might make merrie: and so for the space of three daies togither, there was great banketting and sport betwene them. On the fourth day they toke leaue either of other, the king of Scots with rich gifts returning towards his countrie, and the king of England towards London.

Upon the five and twentieth day of Januarie also, while the bishop of London was at high masse within the church of S. Paule in London, a sudden dark-nesse ouershadowed the quire, and therewith such a tempest of thunder and lightning, that the people there assembled thought verelie the church and steeple had come downe vpon their heads. There came mozeouer such a filthy fauour and stinke withall, that partlie for feare, and partlie for that they might not abide the fauour, they voided the church, falling on heapes one vpon another, as they sought to get out of the same. The vicars and canons for toke their deskes, so that the bishop remained there onlie with one deacon that serued him at masse. Afterward, when the aire began to cleare vp, the people returned into the church, and the bishop went forward and finished the masse.

In the meane time the king leuied a great summe of monie of the prelates of his land towards his iour-nie into France: he had also a great relese of the citizens of London. And the Jewes were constrained to giue to him the third part of all their mouea-ble goods. In the moneth of Aprill, Leolin prince of Wales caused William de Beuse, whom he had taken prisoner long before (as aboue is mentioned) to be hanged on a paire of gallowes, for that he was taken (as was reported) in adulterie with the wiife of the said prince. And on the last day of Aprill, the king with a puissant armie toke the sea at Portsmouth, and landed at saint Palos in Britaine on the third day of May, where he was right iustlie receiued of Henrie earle of that countrie. After he was thus arriued in Britaine, he entered into the French dominions, with the said earle, and the earle of March his father in law, doing much hurt within the same.

were beaten downe on all parts, and utterlie banquished, with losse of 20 thousand men (as it was credibly reported.) The king of Connagh was also taken and committed to prison.

In the meane time king Henrie hauing spent a great deale of treasure in his iourne made into France, there was granted vnto him a sixteenth of the temporaltie, with a disme and a halfe of the spiritualtie, towards the furnishing out of a new powder of men to be sent into Spaine against the Saracens, which made fore warres vpon the christians in that countrie, whereupon king Henrie being required of the K. of Aragon to aid him with some number of souldiers, he sent a great power thither with all speed, and so likewise did the French king. By means whereof the Spaniards, being joined with Englishmen and Frenchmen, obtained a noble victorie, in banquishing those their enemies. Thus saith Polydor. But other write that the king on the seauen and twentieth of Iannuarie, holding a parlement at Westminster (where the Nobles both spirituall and temporall were assembled) demanded escheuage of all those that held any baronies of him, that is to saie, forren knights six, fortye shillings, or thre marks.

Moreover, the archbishop of Canturburie (as they say) stood against the king in this demand, maintaining that the cleargie ought not to be subiect vnto the iudgement of laie men, sith this escheuage was granted in the parts beyond the seas without their consent. Whereupon the matter as touching the bishops was deferred till the quindene of Easter, albeit that all the laitie, and other of the spiritualtie consented to the kings will. ¶ About this time also there chanced to rise a great strife and contention betwixt Richard the archbishop of Canturburie, and Hubert the earle of Kent, who as garbrian to the young erle of Gloucester had got into his hands the castell of Tunbridge, with the towne, and certeine other possessions which belonged to the archbishops see, and therefore did the archbishop complaine to the king of the iniurie which he sustained.

Now when he perceived no hope likelie to come for any redresse at the kings hands, he took an other way: and first by his pontificall authoritie, accursed all those that withheld the same possessions, and all their maintainers (the king excepted) and therewith appealing to the pope, he went to prosecute his appeale at Rome; whither the king and the earle sent also their procurators, and made the pope their arbitrator to iudge of the matter. In the end pope Gregorie hauing heard the whole proceesse of the controuersie, iudged the right to remaine with the archbishop, who hauing then obtained his desire, hastened toward England: but as he was returning homeward, he died by the way, not farre from Rome, whereby the popes iudgement took no place: for whilst the see was void, there was none that would follow the suit: and such was the end of this controuersie for this time.

After the decesse of this archbishop Richard, the monks elected Ralfe Penill bishop of Chichester the kings chancellor, an upright man, and of iust dealing in all his doings. In whome also it is to be noted, he would not giue one halfepeece to the monks towards the bearing of their charges in their iourne to Rome, which they should take vpon them from thence to fetch his confirmation, according to the manner, least he should burthen his conscience with the crime of simonie which he greatlie abhorred, although some imputed this to proceed rather of a cloaked spice of couetousnesse. Which practise of his marked greatlie to the confounding of the indirect means now vsed to aspire vnto promotions, for the obteinement whereof no remedie is forborne; no, though the same be repugnant to reason, and utterlie against conscience and honestie. But this is the temptation of auarice and ambition, which poison the minds of men in such sort, that rather than they will want their wished aduancement, they will vse these meanes that may further them most, namely, friendship, monie, and mightie mens countenance; which one noteth verie well in a distichon of neat deulfe, saieing, Artu, honestatis recti, praecepta, decem, vim,

Conculcat, superant, spernunt, fauor, ara, potentes,

But to the purpose from whence we are digressed: When the monks came to the popes presence, vpon inquirie made, and chafelie by report of Simon Langton, who (as some thinke) gaped for the dignitie, he vnderstand that the said Ralfe Penill should be a man vnlearned, a courtier, haustie and hoist of iuggs, and that which most displeased the pope, it was to be feared, that if he should be preferred to that roine, he would go about to deliuer the realme of England from the thraldome of the pope, and the court of Rome (into the which being made tributorie by king John it had latelie bene brought) that (as he should alledge) it might serue God and holie church in the old accustomed libertie.

To bring this to passe (hauing the king thereto greatlie inclined, and all the realme readie to assist him in the same) he would not sticke to put his life in ieopardie, namely vpon confidence of the right and appeales of Stephen the late archbishop of Canturburie, made in soleinne wise, before the altar of S. Paule in the cathedrall church of London, when king John resigning his crowne into the hands of, the legat, made that writing obligatorie most execrable to the whole world.

When the pope had heard this tale told, he streit disanulled the election and request of the confirmation of the said Ralfe Penill, granting libertie to the monks to chuse some other which might proue a wholesome shepheard for the soule of man, profitable to the church of England; and a faithfull sonne to the see of Rome, and so the monks returning home, made relation to the couent how they had sped. After this, the monks elected the prior of their house named John to be their archbishop, who going to Rome for his confirmation, was perswaded in the end to renounce his election: so that at length one Edmund that was treasurer of the college of Salisburie, was elected, confirmed, and consecrated, a man of great zeale, being the fourth & sixtith archbishop that had governed that see.

This yeare the kings brother the earle of Cornewall married the countesse of Gloucester, widow to the late earle Gilbert, and sister to William Marshall earle of Denbroke, the which erle of Denbroke shortly after the same marriage departed this life, and was buried on the sixteenth day of Aprill, in the new temple at London, nere vnto his father. Moreover, Leolin prince of Wales about this season enterprising to invade the English confines, burned and wasted the countrie in most cruell wise. Whereof the king being aduertised, hastened south by great iournies, with purpose to reuenge such iniuries. But the enemies hearing of his coming (according to the custome of their countrie) withdrew into the mountains, bogs, and marishes. Wherefore the king (seeing that he could not haue them at his pleasure, and least he should be thought to spend time in vaine) came backe, and left behind him a small trope of souldiers to resist their attempts, if they should happen to rise by any more.

The Welshmen hauing intelligence that the king was returned home, brake forth againe as before in to the English marshes, and not onelie toke prizes and booties, but went about to despoile with fire and sword all that stood in their way. Whobett in their returne, and as they ranged abroad somewhat unadui-seble, they were intrapped by the foultiers which the king had left there for the defense of the countrie, and put to flight nere the castell of Mountgomerie, with great slaughter & losse of their people. But Leolin nothing dissuaded therewith, assembled a greater power than he had before, and began forthwith to rob and spoil within the English marshes with paganish crueltie. Which thing when it came to the understanding of the king, he was verie sore displeased, that to meane a man as Leolin was, should put him to so much trouble, therefore he raised a farre greater armie than he had done at anie time before, and with the same came to the cite of Hereford.

In the meane time Leolin comming nere unto the said castell of Mountgomerie, by the praecise of a traitorous monke, trained forth the English souldiers which late in garrison there, and counterfeiting to flee, till he had laid them by in bogs and mires with their horses, so as they could not helpe themselves, he fell upon them, and so slew and toke a great number of them even as he could haue wished. The king advertised hereof, hastned the faster forward, and comming into those parts, as he passed by an abbete of the Cisterciens order of which house the monke was that had betrayed the Englishmen of Mountgomerie, he burned a grange that belonged to the same abbete, and further spoiling the same abbete it selfe, he had set it on a light fire also, if the abbat therof had not redeemed it with the summe of thre hundred marks of silver. After this, he caused Spawds castell to be repaired and fortified, which the Welshmen in times past had overthrowne, and when the worke was finished, he left there a strong garrison of souldiers to keepe backe the Welshmen from making their accustomed incursions.

Whilest the king was thus occupied in Wales, there was some busines in France, for in the moneth of June, the French king with an armie came to inuade the countrie of Britaine, but earle Henrie with the earle of Chester and the other English captains found means to take and despoile all the cariages and wagons which came with vittels and other provision to serue the French armie. When the French men perceived they could not haue their purpose, by mediation of the archbishop of Reims, and the earle of Bolognie on the French part, and by consent of the earles of Britaine and Chester on the English part, a peace was concluded, or rather a truce to in-dure for thre yeares betwixt the two kings of England and France. This agreement was made the first daie of Iulie, and then the earles of Britaine and Chester, with Richard Sparshall, came ouer into England, and rode to the king, whom they found at Spawds castell, where he remained till the worke was finished, and then in the moneth of October returned into England.

In this meane time no small grudge arose among the people, by reason that their churches were occupied by incumbents that were strangers, promoted by the popes and their legats, who neither instructed the people, nor could well speake anie moze English than that which serued for the collection of their tithes, in so much that for the insolencie of such incumbents as well the noble men and those of good reputation, as other of the meaner sort, by an vndiscreet presumption attempted a disorderlie redresse, confederating themselves together, and taking vpon them to write and direct their letters vnto bishops and chapters, commanding them by waie of inhibition, not to suerne to interrupt those that should seise vpon the beneficed strangers, or vpon their reuenues.

They also toke vpon them to write vnto such religious men and others, which were farmers vnto anie of those strangers, forbidding them to stand accountable vnto the said strangers, but to retaine the rents and profits in their hands to answer the same vnto such as they should appoint for the receipt ther-of. The superscription of their letters was this. Te-li episcopo, & tali capitulo, universis eorum, qui magis volunt mori quam a Romanis confundi, salutem. That is to say, To such a bishop and chapter, all those which had rather die than be confounded by the Romans, send greeting. In the seale therewith the said letters were sealed, were two swords ingrauen.

This matter went so farre forth, that there were sundry persons armed and disguised like mummers, which enterprised not onelie to take diuerse of those strangers that were beneficed men, but also came to their barnes, thysed by their graine, and either made sale therof, or gaue it away for God his sake, showing counterfeited letters vnder the kings seale, which they had procured for their warrant, as they did pretend. At length the pope vpon complaint made vnto him of such violent doings, wrote to king Henrie, blaming him not a little for suffering such disorders to be committed within his realme, commanding him vpon paine of excommunication to cause a diligent inquirie to be had of the offendours, and to see them tharpe punished, to the example of others.

Whereupon he sent letters to the bishop of Winchester, and to the abbat of saint Edmundsburie, to make the like inquisition, and to accorde all those that should be found culpable within the south parts of England, as he did to the archbishop of Yorke, to the bishop of Durham, and to an Italian named John a canon of Yorke, to doe the like in the north parts, so that the offendours should remaine accursed, till they came to Rome, there to fetch their absolution. Hereupon therefore a generall inquisition was taken, as well by the king as by the bishops, and manie found guiltie, some in fact, and some in consent: amongst which number there were both bishops and chapeins to the king, with archdeacons and deanes, knights, and manie of the laitie.

There were some christies and bailiffes also, which by the kings commandement were arrested and put in prison, and diuerse of all sorts did keepe themselves out of the waie, and would not as yet be found. In like maner, Hubert earle of Bent, lord chiefe iustice, was accused to be chiefe transgressor in this matter, as he that had giuen forth the kings letters patents to those disguised and masking thythers, who had taken vpon them so to sequester other mens goods, whereto they had no right. There came also to the king one sir Robert de Twing, a knight of the north parts (which named himselfe William Welthefse, and had led about a companie of the foresaid maskers) professing that he had done it vpon iust cause to be reuenged vpon the Romans, which went about by sentence of the pope, and manifest fraud to spoil him of the parsonage of a certeine church which he held, and therefore he said he had rather stand accused without iust cause for a time, than to lose his benefice without due iudgement. Whobett the king and the other commissioners counseled him in the end to go to Rome to purchase his absolution, although he was fallen in danger of excommunication, and there to sue for his pardon in the popes consistorie. And to in-courage him the better so to doe, the king wrote also in his fauour to the pope, testifying the right which he claimed to the church, wherby at length he obtained his suit (as after ye shall heare.)

wherein declaring that charges he had bene at divers waies, he required to have a subsidie granted him, for the relese of his want, which was flatly denied, the Nobles and other estates excusing the poverty amongst all degrees of men, by manie evident reasons. Whereupon the bishop of Winchester being a verie eloquent and faire-spoken man, openly counsell'd the king to favour his people, whom he had already made poore and bare with continuall tributes and exactions. And if it were so that he stood in such need as was alledged, that then he should take into his hands againe such possessions and things, which during the time of his yong yeeres he had bestowed upon his servants, without any good advised consideration, for lacke of ripe iudgement and discretion, and againe to take from certeine covetous persons, who now were become houseleeches and caterpillers in the commonwealth, all such offices as they held, and had verie much abused, causing them to preld by their accounts, and to vse them after the manner of sponges, so that where he had in times past made them full of moisture, he might now wring them drie, following herein the example of Aepasian. And by this means it was not to be doubted but he should have inough of his owne, with out doing iniurie to any man.

The king gaue verie good eare to the bishops words, and following his counsell, caused his receivers, treasurers, and other such as had medled with any of his receipts to come to a reckoning. And understanding by the auditors appointed to take their accounts, that the most part of them had received much more and by other means than they had entered into their reckoning, he compelled them to restore it out of hand with interest. Also he caused the magistrats to be called to a reckoning, and manie of them being convicted of fraud, were condemned to make restitution. And among other Kanalfe Britton treasurer of his chamber was put beside his office, and fined at a thousand marks, in whose place was set Peter de Rualles, or after some copies de Rualles, a Boldouin, nephew or rather sonne to the bishop of Winchester, by whose aduice the king took a more strait account of his officers, and often removed such as he iudged guiltie.

At the same time also, Hubert earle of Kent was deposed from the office of high iustice, and Stephan Segraue appointed in his rowe. The said Hubert (because he refused to answer a certeine dutie which was demanded of him to the kings vse) ran so farre into his displeasure, that he durst not abide his sight, but for safegard of himselfe got him to the abbeye of Sperton, and there took sanctuarie. The king hearing of this his demeanour, was so highlye offended withall, that he sent to the Londoners, willing them to go thither and fetch him to his presence. The Londoners, which in no wise loved him, because of the death of their citizen Constantine, were verie ready to accomplish this commandement, inasmuch that where the maiour overnight late declared to them the effect of the kings commission, there were twentie thousand of them in armour gotten forward earlie in the morning towards Sperton, in full hope now to be reuenged of him, for the small good-will that he had borne unto their citie heretofore.

But the king being informed by the earle of Chester and others, that if the Londoners being thus in armour, and in so great a number, should commit any other outrage by the way, the matter might grow to some such inconvenience as would not easilie be staied, he sent to them a countermand to returne backe to the citie againe, which they did, though soe in their hearts that they might not go through with their desired enterpryse. Furthermore (see here the mutabilitie of fortune and his inconstancie, whereof complaint hath bene made by our forefathers time out of mind, saying,

Pasibus ambiguus fortuna volubilis errat,

Et manet in nullo certa tenax loco;

Sed modo lata manet, vultus modo sumit acerbo,

Et tantum constans in levitate sua est.)

now that the earle of Kent was thus out of the kings fauour, there were few or none of those whom he had before bene beneficiall unto, that shewed themselves as friends and louers unto him, but all forsooke & were ready to take the worst of him, the archbishop of Dublin excepted, who yet obtined of the king respite for him to make answer unto such things as should lawfullie be objected against him, both for the debt which should be due to the king, and also upon points of treason, which were now laid to his charge. Wherein we may see that hath bene the course of the world in former ages touching friends, who in the spring of a mans felicitie like swallows will flie about him; but when the winter of aduersitie nipeth, like snailles they keepe within their shels: whereunto the poet verie well alluding, saith, —diffugiunt cado

Cum face siccatis amici,

Ferre ingem pariter dolosi.

After this, as the said Hubert would haue gone to S. Edmundsburie in Suffolke, where his wife as then remained, he was apprehended at Burntwood in Essex, within a chappell there (as saith Fabian.) But (as Matthew Paris saith) sir Robert de Crane-combe, with three hundred armed men was sent to apprehend him by the kings commandement, and so he was taken in a village belonging to the bishop of Norwich in Essex, and by the kings commandement cast into prison, but yet afterwards he was reconciled to the kings fauour, when he had lien foure moneths in prison, and thirtene moneths banished the court.

In this yeare, on the exaltation of the crosse, at Lambeth, in the assemblee of the states there, a subsidie was granted to the R. of the fourth part of euerie mans goods towards the discharge of his debts which he owght to the earle of Britaine. Also in the beginning of the thiententh yeare of his reigne, Kanalfe earle of Chester and Lincoln departed this life the six and twentieth day of October, whose bodie was buried at Chester, and his bowels at Wallingford where he died. This earle Kanalfe was thrice married, first to Constance daughter and heire to Conan earle of Britaine and Richmond, and so in right of hir was intituled earle of those two places: which Constance had bene first married unto Geoffrey the third sonne of king Henrie the second, by whom she had issue Arthur (as before ye haue heard.) But by earle Kanalfe she had no issue at all, but was from him diuorced, and afterwards married unto Guy vicount de Towars. Then after earle Kanalfe was so diuorced from the said Constance, he married a ladie named Clemence, and after hir deceasse, he married the third time the ladie Margaret, daughter to Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford and Essex, constable of England.

Howbeit he neuer had issue by any of those his wiues, so that John Scot his nephew by his sister Matild succeeded him in the earldome of Chester, and William Walbenie earle of Arundell, nephew to him by his sister Mabel, had the manour of Warroba, and other lands that belonged to the said Kanalfe, of the yerelie value of five hundred pounds. Robert Quin, cle, he that married his sister Hauise, had the earle, dome of Lincoln, and so of a baron became an earle who had issue by his wife, Margerie countesse of Lincoln, that was married to Edmund Aacie earle of of Lincoln. William earle Ferrers and of Warble, that had married Agnes, sister to the said Ranulfe, had the castell and manour of Chartley, together with other lands for his pourpart.

Here is also to be remembred, that the afore mentioned earle Ranulfe (or Randulfe whether ye list to call him) atchived manie high enterprises in his time, as partlie in this booke ye haue already heard: he held fore warres against the Welshmen, till at length an agreement was concluded betwixt him and Leolin prince of Wales. I remember I haue read in an old record, that vpon a time as this earle passed into Wales with an armie, his chance was to be ouerset by the Welshmen, so that he was obliged to retire into a castell, wherein the Welshmen did bessege him. And as it fortunied at that time, Roger Lacie the constable of Chester was not then with him, but left behind at Chester to see the citie kept in order (for as it should seeme, their solempne plaies which commonlie are vsed at Whitluntide were then in hand, or else their faire which is kept at Spidsummer.)

This Roger Lacie is surnamed Helie.

Therefore the earle sent a messenger in all possible hast vnto his constable, praiering him with speed to come to his succour in that extreame point of necessitie. Lacie made no delaie, but assembling all the foreiners, plaiers, musicians, and others which he could find within that citie fit to weare armes, went forth with them, and in most speedie manner marched toward the castell, where the Welshmen kept the earle besieged, who now perceiuing such a multitude of men comming towards them, incontinentlie left the siege and fled awaie. The earle then being thus deliuered out of that present danger, came forth of the castell, returned with his constable vnto Chester, and in recompense of that seruice, gaue vnto his said constable Roger Lacie, the rule, order, and authoritie ouer all the foreiners, plaiers, musicians, and other strangers resorting to Chester at the time, when such publicke plaies (or else faire) should be kept & holden.

John Lacie the sonne of the said Roger married Alice the daughter of Gilbert de Aquila, and after his deceasse, he married the ladie Margaret, the daughter of Robert Quincie earle of Lincoln, of whom he begat Edmund Lacie constable of Chester, which Edmund after the deceasse of his father, married Alice the daughter of the marquesse of Saluces in Italie, which ladie was surnamed the quene, of whom he begat Henrie Lacie earle of Lincoln, which Henrie married the ladie Margaret, daughter to William Long espere earle of Salisbury, by whom he had two sons, Edmund and John, and two daughters, Alice and Joan, which Alice Thomas earle of Lancaster married, who claimed and had the same rights and priuiledges which ancientlie belonged to the said Roger Lacie, and other the constables of Chester, concerning the fines of foreiners and others. This haue I the more willingly declared, that it may appeare in what estimation and credit the Lacies constables of Chester by inheritance liued in their time, of whose high valiancie, and likewise of other of that familie, highlie commended for their noble chualrie in martiall enterprises ye may read in sundrie histories at large.

But now to retorne and speake of other doings, which chanced about the time in which the said Ranulfe earle of Chester departed this life. The king in the meane while seized into his hands a great portion of the treasure which Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent had committed to the keeping of the templers. But whereas there were that travelled to haue had him put to death, the king in respect of the seruice which he had done to him and to his predecessours king Richard and king John, granted him life, with those lands which he had either by purchase, or by gift of king John, but neuertheless he caused him to be kept in strait prison at the castell of the Isles, under the custodie of foure knights belonging to the earles of Cornewall, Warren, Penbroke, and Ferrers, which foure earles were become suerties for him.

This yeare also about the same time, to wit, the morow after S. Martins daie, chanced great thunder and lightning, which continued for the space of 15 daies together, to the great terrour and feare of the people, and namelie of the Londoners, which haue that kind of weather so familiar to them, that if the re be arie abroad in the land, they haue their part thereof. Howouer on the 23 of March, was heard an other great and terrible tempest of thunder, and after followed a marvellous wet summer with manie floods. Also on the 8 daie of April, in the parts about Hereford and Worcester, there appeared foure sunnes in the element, beside the naturall sunne, of red colour, and a great circle of chrysaline colour, the which compassed with his largenesse as it had bene the whole circuit almost of the whole realme of England, from the sides whereof went forth certeine halfe circles, in whose sections appeared the said foure sunnes. The naturall sunne was at the same time in the east part of the firmament, for it was about the first houre of the daie, or betwixt six and seven in the morning, the aire being the same time verie bright and cleare. The bishop of Hereford, and sir John Spynmouth knight, and manie others beheld this wonderfull sight, and testified the same to be most true. And after this there followed the same yeare in those parts cruell warre, slaughter, terrible bloodshed, & a generall trouble through England, Wales, and Ireland. About the same time, to wit, in June, in the south parts of England nere to the sea coast, two huge dragons appeared fighting in the aire, and after a long fight the one ouercame the other, and followed him, flaying into the depth of the sea, & so they were seene no more.

Howouer in this yeare great variance and strife rose betwixt the king and his barons, for the king took great displeasure against all other his officers, & so much the more mistrusted them, for that he found himselfe deceived in the earle of Kent, to whom he had committed a further credit than to anie other, and had made him high iustice of England, onelie for the god will that he alwaies bare to him. Therefore perceiuing this, he was doubtfull whom he should trust, discharging the most part of those Englishmen that bare any office about him, and in their romes placed strangers, as Poitounians and Britains, of the which there came ouer vnto him manie knights and other, to the number of 2000, which he placed in garrisons within castles of diuerse places of the land, and committed the order of all things for the most part to the bishop of Winchester, and to his nephew or sonne Peter de Rivaues.

Herewith he offended so much the minds of his nobles, that Richard Marshall erle of Penbroke (chief of that familie, & boldest to speake, now that Ranulfe of Chester was gone) as well in his owne name, as in the names of other, took vpon him openlie to reproue the kings doings herein, as pernicious and dangerous to the state of the realme. Herevnto the bishop of Winchester (whose counsell as it seemed he followed) made answer, that the king had done nothing in that behalfe vnadvisedlie, but vpon god and deepe consideration: for sith he might perceiue how the English nobilitie had first pursued his father with malicious hatred & open war, and now that he found diuerse of them whom he had brought by and aduanced to high honours, vnfaithfull in the administration of their offices, he did not without iust cause re-ceine into his fauour strangers, and preferre them befoze those of his owne nation, which were not so faithfull in his seruice and obedience as they.

This answer of the bishop so picked and wounded the minds of the English Nobilitie, that manie of them (amongst whome the said earle of Penbroke was the chiefe) began an open rebellion, some of them resorting to one place, and some to an other, to gather people for their purpose. The names of such barons as stirred upon this occasion were these; Richard Sparthall earle of Penbroke afore named, Gilbert Basset and his bzethren, men of great honoz and right hardie capteins: also Richard Sward a warlike personage, trained vp in feats of armes from his youth, with Walter Cliffozd a worthy knight, and manie others. The king hauing knowledge of their doings proclaimed them all traitozs, confiscated their goods, and sent for a great power of men out of Flanders to serue him in his warres.

Whilste king Henrie thus provided himselfe of an armie, the lords with their capteine Richard Sparthall joined themselves to Leolin prince of Wales, & doubting the coming of the king, spoiled all the marches next adioining to England, leauing no bitels nor cattell any where about in those parts wher by the kings armie might haue relaeve, and further made all things readie for their owne defense so well as they could deuise. The earle of Kent about the same time, by helpe of two peomen that attended upon him, escaped out of the castell of Wex, and toke sanctuary in the next church: but when those that had the charge of him and the castell in keeping, missest him, and heard where he was, they fetcht both him, and the two peomen that holpe him to make the escape out of the church, and bringing them backe to the castell, imprisoned the earle.

And though the bishop of Salisburie came thither and threatened to accuse them, if they would not deliuer the earle, and restore him to sanctuary againe: they made answer, that they had rather the earle should hang for himselfe, than they for him. And so because they would not deliuer him, the bishop did excommunicate them, and after riding to the court, and taking with him the bishop of London, and other bishops, persuaded so much by complaint exhibited to the k., that the earle was restored to the church againe the eighteenth day of October: but so, as the shiriffe of the shire had commandement to compasse the church about with men, to watch that no relaeve came vnto him, whereby he might be constrained through familiarity to submit himselfe. Notwithstanding, shortly after there came a power of armed men, and fetcht the said earle from thence (setting him on horsebacke in faire complet armour) and so conueied him into Wales, where he joined with other of the kings enemies, the thirtieth day of October.

Within a few daies after came the king with his armie, and entring into Wales, for want of vittels was constrained to retire backe to the marches, betwixt Worcestershire & Salopshire, where staying certene daies together in those parts, his souldiers strayed abroad in the countrey vnadvisedlie, and keeping no watch nor ward about their campe, were surprised in the night by their enemies, and slaine on euerie side. The slaughter had bene greater, but that the residue which laie in campe, brake forth about midnight, and in a plume together fled into a castell which was nere at hand, called Grosse-mound, in the which the king himselfe was lodged. There were slaine aboue five hundred men, and all the trusse and baggage of the campe lost. Yet Matthew Paris saith there were but two knights slaine, which cast awaie themselves by their owne wilfulnesse, that would needs stand to it and make resistance, where the residue being spoiled of all that they had with them, got awaie by flight, as the bishops of Winchester and Chichester, the lord chiefe iustice Stephan Segraue, Peter de Rivaules treasurer, Hugh Bigot earle of Posfolke, William earle of Salisburie, William lord Beauchampe, and William Dalbenie the younger, who were witnesses of this losse amongst the residue.

Hereof it came to passe, that manie of the kings armie (speciallie those which had lost their horses, armour, monie, and other furniture, with their vittels) returned into their countrey, to their great confusion. For the Welshmen and other outlaues, hauing spoiled the campe, returned with the carriages and sumpters which they had taken, into places of safe refuge. The king hauing received this losse, and oftentimes tried fortune nothing fauourable vnto him in those parts, by reason of the streits and disadvantage of the places, thought god to reserue the reuenge of his received injuries untill a more conuenient time, and thereupon returned to Glocester, and furnished diuers castles and fortresses in the borders of Wales, with garrisons of souldiers, namely Poitouins and other strangers to defend the same against William Sparthall, and the other his complices, who upon occasions daillie sought to suppress and distresse the said strangers.

And beside other encounters, in the which manie of those Poitouins and other strangers were slaine and oppressed by the said William Sparthall and his adherents, it chanced that vpon saint Katherins day, the said William Sparthall comming nere to the castell of Spornmouth to view the same, was in danger to haue remained prisoner in the enemies hands, through an issue made by sir Baldwine de Guines, capteine of that castell, with his Poitouins and Flemings. But by such rescue as came to his aid, he was deliuered out of their hands, and the Poitouins and other of the garrison discomfited. At this skirmish sir Baldwine himselfe being sore wounded, was borne out of the field into the castell, losing fiftene knights of his part, and a great sort of other which were taken prisoners, besides no small number that were slaine in the place.

The same yeare chanced a great dearth, by reason that the growth of all things was much hindered with the extreme cold weather. Also there happened about the beginning of Nouember great thunder and lightning, and therewith folowed an earthquake to the great feare of the inhabitants of the towne of Huntington and other places thereabouts. After this, came a great dearth amongst the people, being commonlie a neere companion to great famine and dearth.

Richard Sparthall erle of Penbroke in this meane time ceased not to waste the marches of England next adioining to Wales, and daillie diuerse of the English Nobilitie repaired to him, so that the king was sore troubled in his mind. It chanced at the same time, that one John of Spornmouth a right valiant capteine, who led the kings armie, received a great overthrow at the hands of Richard Sparthall. For whereas the foresaid John, hauing assembled a mightie host, made great hast towards his enemies, in hope to haue come vpon them at vnwares, and therefore marching by night, that he might be readie to assaile them somewhat afore the breake of the day, which in the summer season is the most silent time of all the night, it chanced farre otherwise than he looked it should haue done. For the earle of Penbroke, hauing knowledge by his spies of his aduersaries intent, laie himselfe with his people within a wood in ambush by the way, where the said John should passe, and and setting upon him as he approached, put his people in such feare by the sudden encounter, that they knew not what captaine or ensigne they might follow, and so immediatlie fell to running awaie. The slaughter was great on euerie side, both of Poitouins and others. Diuerse of them fleeing also into the next woods, were receiued by such as were laid there to cut them off, and so slaine or taken out of hand. Howbeit their chiefe captaine the forenamed John of Monmouth escaped, with a few other in his company. This ouerthrow chanced the morrow after Christmasse daie.

March. Paris.

The next daie Richard Sparhall hauing thus got the victorie, destroyed certeine houses and lordships there in the marches which belonged to the said John of Monmouth. About the same time also, Richard Sward with other outlatwes destroyed the possessions belonging to the earle of Cornewall beside Wye-hull, and burned a place there called Segraue, where Stephan de Segraue the lord chiefe iustice was borne, and likewise a village belonging to the bishop of Winchester, not farre from Segraue aforesaid. This was the maner of those outlatwes, that they hurt no person, but onelie those counsellors about the king by whom they were eriled, and therefore bearing stomach against them, they did not onlie execute but also execute this reuenge, which till they had obtained, they were no lesse ill appaid, than well pleased when the same was past, for Immediatlie within the octaues of the Epiphanie, the earle Sparhall and Leolin prince of Wales was slain and robbed all the marches betwixt Wales and Shrewsburie, a part of which towne they also burnt. King Henrie being hereof certified as yet sojourning at Gloucester, was soze troubled in his mind, and calling together his counsell, asked aduise what waie he might best take to redresse such iniuries. After sundrie opinions amongst them declared, they agreed all in one sentence, that it should be most expedient to appease the minds of the rebels with gentle offers, to grant them pardon of their offenses, wisely to winne them to tractableness, and not roughly afflicting them to exasperate their fiercenesse, with

Also to banish from his court diuerse that bare great rule, and namelie Peter the bishop of Winchester, and his sonne or nephew Peter de Riuales, by the counsell of which two persons all things had bene changed in the kings house. Moreover, to put from him such strangers as bare offices, and to reuoke Englishmen againe to the same.

March. Paris.

The king allowing this aduise to be good, followed it accordingly, and first of all discharging the bishop of Winchester of all publike administration of things, he commanded him to repaire home to his diocese, and to see to the gouernement thereof, as to his dutie appertained. He also banished from his presence Peter de Riuales, Stephan Segraue, Robert Passelew, and diuerse others of his chiefe counsellors, by whose means he had procured the euill will of his nobilitie. Then receiued he againe his old servants & officers, & finally sent the archb. of Canturburie, the bishops of Chester & Rochester unto the barons in Wales, to offer them peace & pardon of all iniuries past, if they would returne to his obedience. Thus in the end there was a truce taken betwixt the king and the rebels, to begin at Candlemasse, and to indure untill Easter next ensuing, in which meane time, Richard the earle of Penbroke, hearing that Sparth Fitz Gerald, with Walter Lacie, Richard Burgh and others wasted his lands and possessions in Ireland, according to such commission as they had receiued of late from king Henrie and his counsell) passed ouer thither, and there encountering with his enemies, was soze wounded and taken prisoner, having entered the battell verie rashlie, and with a small companie of his people about him, onlie by the traitorous perswasion of Geoffrey Sparth, who with other fled at the first hunt, and left him in maner alone, to stand to all the danger. Those that thus took him, brought him into his owne castell, the which the lord chiefe iustice Sparth Fitz Gerald had latelye wone. This encounter, in which Richard Sparthall was thus taken, chanced on a saturdaye, being the first of Aprill; and on the 16 of the same moneth, by reason of the wound which he had receiued, he departed this life.

The death of the earle of Penbroke.

The king also that the bishop of Winchester, and his sonne (or kinsman as some haue called him) Peter de Riuales had procured the king to send commission vnder his seale unto the foresaid noble men in Ireland, that if the said Richard Sparthall earle of Penbroke chanced to come thither, they should do their best to take him, and in reward of their paines, they should inioy all his lands and possessions which he held in that countrie. But after his death, and when the king had remoued those his counsellors from him, he confessed he had put his seale to a writing, but that he understood what were the contents thereof he vtterlie denied. Finally, this was the end of the worthy earle of Penbroke Richard Sparthall, a man worthy to be highlie renowned for his approued valiance. His death suerlie was greatlie bewailed of king Henrie, openlie protesting that he had lost the worthiest captaine that then liued.

After this, the lords that had remained in Wales, by safe conduct came to the king, and through the diligent trauell of the archbishop of Canturburie, he receiued them into fauour. Amongst them were these men of name, Gilbert Sparthall the brother of the foresaid Richard Sparthall, Hubert earle of Kent, Gilbert Basset, and Richard Sward, besides diuerse others. Unto Gilbert Sparthall he deliuered his brothers inheritance, and upon Whitsondaie made him knight, giuing vnto him the rod of the office of Sparthall of his court, according to the maner, to vse and exercise as his ancessors had done before him. And herewith the earle of Kent Gilbert Basset and Richard Sward were receiued againe into the court, and admitted to be of the kings priuite counsell.

Officers led to accounts.

Some after this, Peter de Riuales, Stephan Segraue, & Robert Passelew were called to accounts, that it might appeare how the kings treasure was spent, and how they had vsed themselves with the kings seale. The two last remembred kept themselves out of the waie, and could not be found. Stephan Segraue shewing himselfe in secret within the abbey of Leicester, and Robert Passelew feigning himselfe sicke, kept within the new temple at London. Peter de Riuales also, with his father the bishop of Winchester, took sanctuary at Winchester, for they were afraid lest their bodies should not be in safetie if they came abroad, because they understood that their manours and grange places were spoiled and burnt by those that bare them displeasure. Howbeit at length, vnder the protection of the archbishop of Canturburie, they came to their answer, & were soze charged for their vniust dealing, traitorous practise, and great falshood vsed in time of their bearing office, and (as it appeareth by writers) they could not sozlie cleare themselves in those matters wherewith they were charged: but yet by reason of their protection they were restored to the places from whence they came, or else otherwise shifted off the matter for the time, so that we read not of any great bodilie punishment which they should receiue as then. In the end they were pardoned & reconciled to the the kings fauor, upon payment of such fines as were assessed upon them.

This yeare, because the truce ended betwixt the kings of England and France, king Henrie sent over to aid the earle of Britaine, thre score knights, and two thousand Welshmen, the which when the French king came with his armie to enter and invade Britaine, did cut off and take his cariage laden with vittels, armor, and other provision, ouerthrowing also no small number of the Frenchmen, and taking from them their hostles, they returned backe in safetie, without any great damage receiued. notwithstanding this, the French king, enforcing againe his power, waxed too strong for the earle of Britaine, so that he was constrained to take a truce to endure till the feast of all saints, that he might in the meane time vnderstand if the king of England would come ouer with some puissant armie to his aid or no: but because it was perceined in the end that the said earle of Britaine sought nothing else but how to get monie out of king Henries coffers, and to do him no pleasure for it, because he was in manner at an other agreement already with the king of France, king Henrie refused to satisfie his requests at such time as he came ouer vnto him (after the taking of that truce) for more monie. Where with also the said earle being offended, got him backe into his owne countrie, and shortly after apparantlie submitted himselfe to the French king, which (as the report went) he had done before in secret.

These things being thus brought to passe, and all troubles quieted, the king as then being at London, there was brought before him by one Tolie, a complaint exhibited against the Jewes of Norwich, which had stolen a yong child, being not past a twelue moneths old, and secretlie kept him an whole yeare together, to the end that he might (when Easter came) crucifie him in despite of our sauour Iesus Christ, and the christian religion. The matter as it happened fell out well for the lad: for within a few daies before that those curst murderers purposed to haue shed this innocents blood, they were accused, conuicted and punished, whereby he escaped their cruell hands. About the same tyme, to wit the seauenth of Februarie died Hugh de Wels bishop of Lincoln, a great enimie to monks and religious men. Robert Grosset was then preferred to his see, a man of great learning, and trained vp in scholes euen from his infancie.

The same yeare, the emperor Frederike the second, married the ladie Isabell the kings sister. This Isabell was a most beautifull ladie, of comelie personage, and of age about one and twentie years. She was affianced by procuracie, about the seauen and twentieth of Februarie. And after Easter, the archbishop of Cullen, and the duke of Louane came over from the emperor, to haue the conuenance of hir vnto the emperors presence. There was such a feast holden, so sumptuous seruice, so rich furniture, and so all banquetting kept the day before hir departure from London towards the sea side, that more could not be imagined. The same feast was kept at Westminster on the fift day of May, and the day following the did set forward, and by easie iournies came to Sandwich, the king bringing hir thither with thre thousand hostles. Finally, she took the sea the eleuenth of May, the king taking leaue of hir not without teares, when they thus departed the one from the other. And so with prosperous wind and weather she arrived at Antwerpe, and from thence passed forward, till she came to hir husband the emperor, by whom she was receiued with great ioy and comfort at Worms, where the marriage was consummate upon a Sunday, being the two and twentieth day of Julie, or (as Matthew Westminster saith) the seauen and twentieth of May, being Whitsunday.

This yeare the bishop of London pronounced the sentence of excommunication against certaine blurers called Caorsins. But because, the same blurers shadowed themselves vnder the pretext of the popes merchants (as they named themselves) they preuailed so much by the fauour of the court of Rome, that the said bishop being sicke and feeble, was cited peremptorie in the parts beyond the seas, before iudges chosen forth by the same blurers, to make answer for such high intaric as he had here done to the popes factors. The bishop willing by the example of them, rather to couer his fathers shame, than to reueale it to the whole world, did quietlie put by the matter: and with commendable patience receiued the proffered wrong, hauing learned this lesson, that

Gaudet patientia durus, and to pacifie the trouble, suffered their wickednesse, commending in the meane while the cause vnto his patron S. Paule. And when he preached of the force of faith, he uttered this saying: If an angell preach contrarie doctrine to vs in these things, let him be accused.

In the twentieth yeare of king Henries reigne, in the Advent time, the noble baron the lord Robert Fitz Water departed this life, and so likewise did a noble yong man descended of most noble parentage, one Roger de Somerie. On the fourteenth day of Januarie ensuing, the king married the ladie Elianor, daughter to the earle of Poynce named Matmon. This marriage was solemnized at Canturburie, and in the octaues of S. Hilarie next ensuing being Sunday, she was crowned queene of England at Westminster. At the solemnitie of this feast and coronation of the queene, all the high peeres of the realme, both spirituall and tempozall, were present there to exercise their offices as to them appertained.

The citizens of London were there in great array, bearing afore hir in solemn wise, thre hundred and thre score cups of gold and siluer, in token that they ought to wait vpon hir cup. The archbishop of Canturburie (according to his dutie) crowned hir, the bishop of London assisting him as his deacon. The earle of Chester bare the sword of saint Edward before the king, in token that he was earle of the palace, and had authoritie to correct the king, if he should see him to swaue from the limits of iustice, his constable of Chester attended vpon him, and removed where the presse was thicke, with his rod of warder. The earle of Penbroke high Marshall bare the rod before the king, and made roime before him, both in the church and in the hall, placing euerie man, and ordering the seruice at the table. The wardens of the cinque ports bare a canopie over the king, supported with foure speeres.

The earle of Leicester held the balon when they washed. The earle of Warren, in the place of the earle of Arundell, because he was vnder age, attended on the kings cup. Sir Michaele Bellet was Butler by office. The earle of Hereford exercised the roime of high Marshall in the kings house. The lord William de Beauchampe was almoner. The chiefe iustice of the foze rests on the right hand of the king removed the dishes on the table, though at the first he was staied by some allegation made to the contrarie. The citizens of London serued out wine to euerie one in great plentie. The citizens of Winchester had ouersight of the kitchen and larderie. And so euerie person (according to his dutie) exercised his roime: and because no trouble should arise, manie things were reformed. The chancelor and all other ordinarie officers ficers kept their place. The feast was plentiful, so that nothing wanted that could be wished. Moreover, in Tutill fields roiall iokes were holden by the space of eight daies together. And some after the king called a parliament at London, where manie things were enacted for the good government of the realme, and therewith the king demanded a subsidie.

¶ About the same time wonderfull strange sights were seene. In the north parts of England, not farre from the abbie of Rosh or Ruspie, there appeared coming forth of the earth companies of armed men on horsebacke, with speare, shield, sword, and banners displayed, in sundrie formes and shapes, rising in order of battell, and incountering together: and this sight was seene sundrie daies ech after other. Sometime they seemed to iourne as it had bene in battell, and fought sore; and sometime they appeared to iust and breake haues, as it had bene at some triumphant iests of torneie. The people of the countrie beheld them a farre off, with great wonder: for the thing shewed so liuelie, that now and then they might see them come with their emptie hollies sore wounded and hurt: and then men likewise mangled and bleeding, that pitie it was to see them. And that which seemed more strange and to be most inauelued at, the prints of their feet appeared in the ground, and the grasse troden downe in places where they had bene seene. The like sight was also seene more apparentlie in Ireland, and in the parts thereabout.

Immediatlie followed, or rather preceded passing great tempests of raine, which filled the earth full of water, and caused monstrous floods: for this raine continued all the space of the moneths of Ianuarie, Februarie, and a great part of March; and for eight daies it rained (as some write) in maner without ceassing: and vpon the tenth of Februarie, immediatlie after the change of the mone, the Thames rose with such an high tide, that boats might haue bene rowed vp and downe in Westminster hall. In the winter before, on the twentieth of December, there chanced a great thunder, and on the first of daie in December, which was the first of that moneth, there was a counterfet sunne seene beside the true sunne. Moreover, as in the spring preceding there happened sore and exceeding great raines, so in the summer following there chanced a great drought, continuing by the space of foure moneths or more.

This yeare was a parliament holden at Apton, a towne in Surrie, distant from London 7 miles, where was an abbie of regular canons founded by one Gilbert a lord of Normandie, that came into the realme with William conquerour. At this parliament, diuerse good & profitable lawes were made and established, which yet remaine in use, bearing the name of the place where they were first ordeined.

¶ In the beginning of the 21 yeare of king Henries reign, on the morrow after the feast of S. Martine, and certeine daies after, the sea burst out with such high tides and tempests of wind, that the marish countries nere to the same were drownded vp and ouerflown: and beside great herds and flocks of cattell that perished, there was no small number of men lost and drownded. The sea rose continuallie in flowing the space of two daies and one night, without ebbing, by reason of the mightie violence of contrarie winds. At Wilsch also, and in villages thereabouts, the people were drownded in great numbers, so that in one village there were buried an hundred corpses in one daie. Also the daie before Christmas eue, there chanced a great wind, with thunder and raine, in such extreame wise, that manie buildings were shaken and ouerthrowen.

In a parliament holden at Westminster about the octaues of the Epiphanie, the king required a subsidie of his subiects, which request was not well taken, but yet at length, vpon promise that he would be good lord vnto them, and not seke to infringe and diminish the graunts which he had made by pretence of want of the popes confirmation (as it was thought he meant to do) they agreed to giue him the thirtieth part of all mouable goods, as well of the spiritualtie as the temporalitie, to termynge yet to euerie man his reable cosage; with horse and armour, to be employed for the profit of the common wealth. In consideration of this graunt, the king being of perfect age, and in his owne rule and full gouernance, of his free and more good will, at the request, and by counsaill of the lords of his realme, etliches graunted and confirmed the liberties and customes contained in the two charters, the one called Magna charta, and the other Charta de foresta, with this addition following added in the end.

The confirmation of the charters, under the kings acknowledgement and subscription of witnesles.

Nunc autem concessimus, & hac presentia charta confirmauimus omnibus predictis de regno nostro, omnes libertates & liberas consuetudines contentas in chartis nostris, quas eis fidelibus nostris fieri fecimus cum in minor essemus aetate, scilicet in: Magna charta nostra, quam in charta de Foresta. Et volumus pro nobis, & heredibus nostris, quod prefati fideles nostri, & successores, & heredes eorum habeant, & teneant in perpetuum omnes libertates & liberas consuetudines predictas, non obstante quod predicta charta confecta fuerint cum minoris essemus aetatis, ut predictum est, hijs testibus, Edmundo Cant. archiepiscopo, & omnibus alijs in Magna charta nominatis. Dat. per manum venerabilis patris Cisteriensis episcopi, cancellarij nostri 28 die Ianuarij, Anno Regni nostri 21.

Beside the confirmation of these charters, the king further to win the fauour of his people, was contented to remoue and sequester from him diuerse of his souncellours that were thought not to be well minded towards the aduancement of the common wealth, and in their places to admit the earle of Warren, William de Ferrers, and John Fitz Geoffrey, who were sworne to giue to the king faithfull counsell, and in no wise to go out of the right waie for any respect that might otherwise moue them. ¶ About the first daie of March, there began sore raine and tempestuous weather, whereof insued great floods, as before in the beginning of the yeare passed, had chanced, though not doing so much hurt as before.

John Scot also earle of Chester and Huntington died at Weren hall the seventh daie of June, without issue, and was buried at Chester. He was poisoned by the diuelish practise of his wife daughter to Aedlin prince of Wales (as Matt. Paris saith.) He had foure sisters, of whom the first named Margaret was married to Allen of Gallowate, by whom she had issue a daughter named Deuogoll; which Deuogoll was married to John Balioll, by whom she had issue John Balioll that was afterward king of Scotland. The second named Isabell, was married to Robert le Breus. The third named Mathe, died without issue. And the fourth called Alda, was married to Henrie Hastings. But because the land pertaining to the earldome of Chester, should not go amongst rocks and distances, hauing such roiall prerogatiues gatiues belonging thereto, the king seized them into his owne hands, and in recompense assigned other lands to the forsaide sisters, as it had bene by way of exchange.

Now fifth the earles of Chester (I meane those of the line of Hugh Lupus) take end in this John Scot; I haue thought it not impertinent for the honoꝝ of so noble a linage, to set downe the descent of the same earles, beginning at the foresaid Hugh the first that gouerned after the conquest, as I haue seen the same collected out of ancient records, according to their true succession in seauen descents one after another, as here followeth.

The true genealogie of the famous and most honourable earles of Chester.

Hugh Lou or Lupus, first earle of Chester after the conquest, nephew to William Conquerour by his sister Margaret, wife to Richard Count of Auranthes, married a noble ladie named Armetruda, by whom he had issue Richard that succeeded him in the earldome, Robert abbat of saint Edmundsburie, and Oruell. He departed this life about the yeere of our Lord 1102, when he had bene earle about 40 yeeres.

2 Richard Lupus eldest son to Hugh Lupus, and second earle of Chester, married Maude the daughter of Stephan erle of Blois, Charters and Champaigne, and sister to R. Stephan. This Richard with his brother Oruell was drowned in the seas, in the yeere of our Lord 1120, as before hath bene shewed, after he had bene earle about nintene yeeres.

3 Ranulfe or Randulfe the first of that name called Bohun, and otherwise Westheins, the sonne of John de Bohun, and of Margaret, sister to Hugh Lupus, succeeded Richard, as cousin and heire to him in the earldome of Chester, and was the third earle in number after the conquest. He married Maude the daughter of Aubrie de Were earle of Giney and Orenford, by whome he had issue Ranulfe surnamed Seruous the fourth earle of Chester. He died about the yeere of our Lord 1130, after he had continued earle eight yeeres.

4 Ranulfe or Randulfe Bohun, the second of that name, and fourth erle in number after the conquest, surnamed Seruous, succeeded his father, and married Alice, daughter to Robert erle of Glocester, base sonne to king Henrie the first by whome he had issue Hugh Keuelocke, the fift earle of Chester. He deceased about the yeere of our Lord 1153, when he had bene earle 29 yeeres.

5 Hugh Bohun otherwise Keuelocke, the sonne of the said Ranulfe, was the first earle of Chester after the conquest, and second of that name. He married Beatrice, daughter to Richard Lucie lord cheefe iustice of England, by whom he had issue Ranulfe the third of that name, and foure daughters. Maude married to Dauid that was earle of Angus and Huntington and lord of Galloway, Mabel married to William Dalbegnie earle of Arundell, Agnes married to William Ferrers earle of Derby, and Hauisa joined in marriage with Robert Quincie, a baron of great honour. This Hugh died about the yeere 1181, when he had bene earle eight and twentie yeeres.

6 Ranulfe Bohun the third of that name, otherwise called Blundeuille, the sonne of Hugh Keuelocke, was the first earle of Chester after the conquest. He was also earle of Lincoln, as next couline and heire to William Romare earle of Lincoln. He had thre wiues (as before ye haue heard) but yet died without issue, about the yeere of our Lord 1232, after he had bene earle 51 yeeres.

7 John Scot, the sonne of Dauid earle of Angus & Huntington, was in the right of his mother the seventh earle of Chester after the conquest. He died without issue (as before ye haue heard) by reason whereof, the erldome came into the kings hands in the yeere 1237. Thus much may suffice (with that which is said before) touching the descent of the earles of Chester. And now to proceed.

The same yeare that John Scot died, cardinall Cardinall Dtho (by some writers named Dthobon) about the feast of S. Peter and Paule came into England from pope Gregorie. He was receiued with all honour and solempne reuerence as was decent, yea and more than was decent, the king meeting him at the sea side. His comming was not signified afore to the nobles of the realme, which caused them to mislike the matter, and to grudge against the king, seeing that he did all things contrarie to order, breaking law, faith, and promise in all things. He hath coupled himselfe (said they) in marriage with a stranger, without consent of his frends and naturall subiects, and now he bringeth in a legat secretlie, who will take vpon him to make an alteration in the whole state of the realme.

But this legat shewed himselfe a verie sober and discret person, not so couetous as his predecessors, in so much that he refused diuerse gifts which were offered vnto him, though some he receiued, and indeed commanded the other to be referued for him. He also distributed liberallie the vacant rents vnto such as he brought with him, as well persons worthie as unworthie, and pacified such controuersies as were spring betwixt the nobles and peeres of the realme, so that he made them frends. ¶ An ad memorabile to be kept in record, that the instrument and seruant of so bad a maister as he serued, namely the pope, should be the procurer of so good a worke: considering that from the see of Rome full tides and violent streames of seditions haue flowed, and verie sildome any occasion or means made to plant peace among men, which is the daughter of loue, and the worthiest thing that is, as one saith verie well in these words:

Gignit amor pacem, pax est dignissima rerum.

The bishop of Winchester, the earle of Kent, Gilbert Waller, Stephen Silward & others were by him accorded, who had borne secret grudge ech to other a long time, which hatred was at point to haue broken forth, and shewed it selfe in perilsous tosse at a tomie holden at Wile in the beginning of Lent, where the Southerne men stroue against the Northerne men, and in the end the Southerne men prevailed, and take diuerse of their aduersaries, so that it seemed not to be a triumphant iustice, but rather a sharpe challenge and incounter betwixt enemies. But amongst all others, earle Wigot bare himselfe verie stoutlie.

After that the legat had thus agreed the noblemen, he assembled a synod at London, the morrow after the octauus of S. Martin, wherein manie ordinances were newlie constituted for the state of the cleargie, but not altogether verie acceptable to diuerse young preests and scholars (as some write) in somuch that the legat afterwards comming to Oxford, and lodging in the abbie of Osney, it chanced as certeine scholars pressed to the gates thinking to come in and do their dutie (as they take the matter) unto the legat, the porter kept them backe, and gaue them ouerthwart words, whereupon they rushed in upon him, & so began a fraie betwixt them and the legats men, who would haue beaten them backe.

It fortuned in this hurle burle, that a poore Irish scholar being got in nere to the kitchin dreser, he sought the coke for Gods sake to giue him some reliefe: but the coke (as manie of that calling are cholericke fellows; in a great furie) took vp a lable full of hot broath out of a kettell wherein flesh had bene sodden, and threw it right vpon the Irishmans face, which thing when another Welch scholar that stood by beheld, he cried out; That meane we to suffer this villanie, and therewithall took an arrow, and set it in his bow, which he had caught vp in his hand at the beginning of the fraie, and drawing it vp to the head let flie at the coke, and so slue him there outright.

Herevpon againe noise and tumult rose round about the house, the legat for feare got him into the bellstair of the abbey, where he kept himselfe close till the darke of the night had staid the bypore, and then stole forth, and taking his horse escaped as secretlie as he could ouer the Thames, and rode with all speed to the court, which laie not far off at Abington, and there made his complaint to the king, in such lamentable wise, that he forthwith sent the earle Waren with a power of armed men, to fetch auaie the residue of the legats seruants which remained behind in the abbey, and to apprehend the chiefe offenders.

The earle comming thither, took thirtie scholars, with one master who a lawier, and brought them to Wallingford castell, and there committed them to prison. The legat also in reuenge of the iniurie in this wise to him done, pronounced the curse against the midowers, and handled the matter in such wise, that the regents and masters of the Uniuersitie were at length constrained to come unto London, & there to go bare-footed through Cheape-side, vnto the church of S. Dunle, in such wise to aske him forgiveness, and so with much ado they obtained absolution. This legat among other things demanded some after the tenth part of all spirituall mens yearelie reuenues, towards the maintenance of the wars against the Saracens in Asia.

Moreover, the emperor of Constantinople, named lie, Baldwin sonne to Peter earle of Auverre, being expelled out of his empire, came this yeare into England, to sue for aid: but at his first arrival at Douer, he was told, that he had not done well to come so presumptuously into the land of another prince, without his safe conduct. But when the said emperor seemed to be sorie for his offense, and to excuse his innocencie and sincere meaning, the king was pacified, & willed him to come to London, where at his comming thither, being the 22 date of April, he was honorably receiued, and at his departure with rich gifts highly honored, so that he had auaie with him to the value of about seven hundred marks as was reported. About this time also, Eliano the kings sister (that was sometime wife vnto William Marshall earle of Penbrooke) was now by the kings meanes married the second time to Simon Spontford, a man of high parentage and noble prowesse.

This Simon was indowed with such vertue, good counsell, courteous discretion, and other amiable qualities, that he was highly fauoured as was supposed, both of God and man: in somuch that he might right well, as for birth, so also for education and good demeanour be counted (as he deserved) a notable noble man, for he was so qualified as standeth with the nature of true nobilitie, according to that of the poet, non census, nec clarum nomen auitum,

Sed probitas magnos ingeniumque facit.

Notwithstanding all which noble indowments concurring in him, he was banished out of France, vpon displeasure, which Blanche the quene mother conceiued against him. But now comming into England, he was iustlie receiued of king Henrie, who not onlie gaue vnto him (as about is mentioned) his sister in mariage with the earldome of Leicester in name of a dowrie, but also aduanced him vnto offices of greatest honour within the realme of England. Howbeit, this marriage was verie displeasing vnto Edmund the archbishop of Canturburie, because that the foresaid Eliano, after the death of his first husband, had bowed perpetuall chastitie, and betaken hir (as was said) to the mantell and the ring.

As the prelat was not pleased with this match, so the king was as highly offended with the archbishop for not fauouring the cause, in somuch that the archbishop went sone after to Rome, where he not onlie complained of certeine iniuries receiued of the kings hands, but also signified the estate of this marriage, to procure a diuorce. In like manner, Richard the kings brother found great fault with the king for the same matter, but chieflie, for that he stroke it vp without making him and other of the nobles of counsell therein. So he short, it was not long yer this grudge grew so far, that ciuill war was verie likelie to haue followed therevpon. But when the king saw that all the lords leaned to his brother, he sought to pacifie the matter by courteous means, and so by mediation of the legat, the king and his brother were reconciled, to the great griefe of the lords, which had brought the matter now to that point, that the king could not haue so resisted their force, but that they were in good hope to haue deliuered the realme out of bondage from all manner of strangers, as well of those Romans that were beneficed men, as of any other.

Simon the earle of Leicester also persequing both the matter went, made this another waie to get all the monie he could in prest or otherwise (in somuch that he had of one burges of Leicester, named Simon Curlewath, five hundred marks) and leauing his wife in the castell of Belingworth, he secretlie departed out of the realme, and got him to Rome, to purchase a confirmation of his marriage, which he easily obtained, notwithstanding the archbishop of Canturburies former and verie vehement information against him, and so hauing brought his purpose about, in the latter end of this yeare, he returned into England, and was iustlie receiued, first of the king and after of his wife, whome he found at Belingworth, nere to the time of his trauell, and thortlie after deliuered of a young sonne, whom they called Simon after the name of his father.

At the same time, Frederike the emperor going into Italie, had a great number of English soldiers with him, which king Henrie furnished for his aid, under the leading of a right valiant warrior, named Henrie de Trubucille, with whome went also John Warden, whose valiance in that iournie well appeared, and William Hardell a citizen of London was treasurer and paymaster to the souldiers. Here with the pope was sore offended, and wrote his mind thereof to the king, who forthwith returned an eloquent answer, requiring him to be more favourable to the emperor, considering his cause was such as could not justlie offend his holinesse. About the same time, or rather (as by some writers it should appear) somewhat before, the kings sister Joane queene of Scotland, comming into England to see hir brother, fell into a sickness, and died.

Whereafter, the archbishop of Canturburie returned into England, who at his comming to Rome, obtained little or nothing touching the suit which he had before the pope, for (as some haue written) the legat who being his heauie friend, had so stopped the popes eares from hearing any of his complaints, that all his whole trauell did come to none effect. In like manner, Peter des Roches bishop of Winchester died this yeare in his manor at Farnham, about the ninth of June, which prelat had gouerned that see about 32 yeares. He was a man of great wisdom and dexteritie in ordering of weightie affaires touching the state of temporall regiment. He builded manie goodlie monasteries, as the abbeies of Bales, Wyke and Seleborne, with the hospitall at Portemouth. He made also a notable testament, and besides his bequests which were great, he left his bishopricke so stored and throughlie furnished, that there was not so much diminished of that which he found at his comming in value, as the cattell that serued to draw the herie ploughs.

About this time, a learned esquire, or rather a cleark of the vniuersite of Orenford, bearing some malice toward the king, fained himselfe mad, and espieng thereby the secret places of his house at Woodstoke where he then laie, vpon a night by a window he got into the kings bedchamber, and comming to the beds side, threw off the coverings, and with a dagger strake diuers times into a pillow, supposing that the king had bene there, but as God would, that night the king laie in another chamber with the queene. In the meane time, one of the queenes chambermaids named Margaret Bisset, hauing espied the traitor, made an outcrie, so that the kings seruants which came to vnderstand what the matter meant, presentlie apprehended the said cleark, who being conueied to Couentre, was there arraigned, and by laboursome proofe had of his malicious intent, was condemned, and executed as a traitor. At his death he confessed, that he was sent from William de Warrisch the sonne of Gessrie de Warrisch to murder the king by such manner of means, not caring what had become of himselfe so he might haue dispatched his purpose.

So his end in pag. 230.

These practises of treason In summo gradu, which cannot be committed without irrecoverable detriment to the whole estate (speciallie where succession is vncertaine) are of an old breeding, though they be neuer so newlie broched. And trulie, if the cursed miscreant which undertaketh an enterpryse of this qualitie, had the grace to consider how manie murders he committeth by implication in giuing the roiall person of the prince a deadlie wound; I doubt not, if he were a man and not a ranke duell, he would be loeued from that outrageous villanie. For, in wounding and killing the prince, he is guiltie of homicide, of parricide, of chisicide, nay of deicide. And therefore a thousand woes light on his hart that shall stretch out his hand, naie, that shall once conceiue in thought a murder so heinous, as both God and nature doth abhorre; speciallie if it be commensed against a christian prince, and such a one as to whome true and vndefiled religion is no lesse pretious and deere than life it selfe. Princes therefore had need to see to the safegard of their persons, sithens the safetie of manie millions dependeth thereupon. For certeine it is, that the state of a poore priuat man is lesse perillous by manie degrees than the state of a potentat, which is ment by this true allegorie following.

10 Quatuor altas sapē procellas, Aut euerit fortuna domos; Minus in paruis fortuna furit, Raras patitur fulminis ictus.
Et nimis vallis.

In the thre and twentieth yeare of his reigne, king Henrie held his Christmasse at Winchester, where a great grudge arose betwixt him and Gilbert the earle of Denbroke, by reason that the said earle with his seruants (hauing tipstauers) in their comming to the court, were not suffered to enter within the gates but were kept backe by the porters and other. Of which iniurie when he had complained, the king made him such an ouerthwart answer, that the earle perceiving him not to like verie well of his seruice, departed forthwith, and rode into the North countrie, so that from that day forth, neither he nor his brother Walter loued the king as they ought to haue done. Some after this departure of earle Gilbert, vpon Candlemas day the king gaue the earldome of Leicester vnto Simon de Mountford, and inuicted him thereinto, hauing first pacified earle Almerike that was elder brother to the same Simon. Yet about the beginning of the next August, the king was so incensed against earle Simon, that both he and his wife were glad to get them ouer into France, till the kings wrath were more pacified.

Upon the sixteenth day of June, the kings eldest sonne named Edward, and after surnamed Longshanke by the Scots in mockage, because he was a tall and slender man, was borne at Westmister, who after his fathers decease, succeeded him in the kingdom. Before the birth of this Edward, there appeared earle in the morning certeine daies together before the sunne was by, a star of a large compassse, the which with swift course was caried through a long circuit of the aire, sometimes thewing as it had borne fire with it, and sometimes leauing as it were smoke behind it, so that it was after iudged, that the great deeds which were to be achieved by the same Edward, were by this wonderfull confestall, on foretold and signified.

About the same time, by reason of an accusation made by a prisoner against Ranulfe Winton (sometime the kings chancellor, but now leading a priuat life, being a canon of the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London) the same Ranulfe (by commandement from the king sent to the maior of the citie William Joiner) was taken out of his house, had to the tower, and there imprisoned, wherupon the deane of Paules, maister G. Lucie, in absence of the bishop accused all those that had presumptuously attempted to laie hands on the said Ranulfe, and further, he put his owne church of saint Paule vnder interdiction.

To conclude, through threatening of excommunication to be pronounced against the king, and other for this fact by the legat and the bishops of the realme as namelie, Canturburie and London, the king was compelled to release and set at libertie the foresaid Ranulfe. Finally, the prisoner that had accused the said Ranulfe and other, being one of the kings pursuants, when for his wicked doings he came to suffer death, openly confessed, how he had accused those persons, onelie in hope to deferre his owne execution,

He had accused not onelie the said Bziton, but diuers of the nobilitie also to be priue and gillie of the same conspiracie. ¶ This yeare for the space of foure moneths together, fell exceeding great raine, yet at length it began to held by about Calser.

The legat beginneth to loke to his owne comortie.

In this while, the lords of the realme practised sundrie drifts likewise, as men that would saue haue bene rid of the legats companie: but the king did what he could on the other side (by sending to the pope for licence) to haue him remaine still here, who began now indeed to loke to his owne profit, as by way of procuracies and other meanes, so that he got togither great summes of monie, although in the beginning he seemed to forebare, and not to seeke for any such gain. Also, he took upon him to bestow benefices without consent of the patrones that were temporal men, whereupon complaint was made to the pope, namelie, by one sir Robert de Twing, who claimed as patron the presentation of the rectorie of Luthun in Dorsetshire, and could not be permitted to introy it, by reason of the popes prohibition, but upon the hearing of his title in the popes consistorie, he obtained letters from the pope to be ressozed, and also an inhibition, that from thenceforth no person should be promoted to any spirituall benefice or church, without consent of the patron. The king and the pères of the realme vnderstanding themselves to be touched in this wrong offered to this knight, had written in his fauour to the pope, so that his suit had the better successe.

Moreover, the Jewes in this yeare, for a murther which they had secretlie committed, were grieuoulie punished, namelie by the pürse to buy their peace, & they were glad to giue the king the third part of all their goods. The legat also assembled a synod of the clergie at London upon the last of Julie, in the which he demanded procuracies, but the bishops upon deliberation had in the matter, answered, that the impotunatnes of the Romane church had so often consumed the goods of the English church, that they could no longer suffer it, and therefore said they, Let them giue you procuracies which vnadvisedlie haue called you into the realme, if they will, for of vs you shall be sure to come by none at all, howbeit he got his demand of the abbats and other religious men.

About the feast of the assumption of our labie, Thomas earle of Flanders, vncle to the quene, arrived at Douer, and was receiued of the king with great joy and gladnesse, who rode thitherward to meet him, and so brought him to London, where the citizens came forth also, and meeting him in the waie, brought him into the citie with all honour that might be deuised. He did homage to the king (as authors write) and at his departure had in reward five hundred marks, and a pension assured him of as much yearelie out of the exchequer of the kings free gift. This earle Thomas was sonne to the earle of Sauoy, and a little before his comming into England, he had married Jone countesse of Flanders, which had first bene coupled in marriage with Ferdinand, as in the life of king John may further appeare.

Waldwin de Riuers earle of the Isle of Wight.

In the 24 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie held his Christmase at Winchester, where he made Waldwin de Riuers knight, and inuested him with the right of the earldome of the Isle of Wight, in the presence of the earle of Cornewall, who procured him this honour, because he had the wardship of him, and married him to his daughter in law the ladie Amicia, that was daughter to his wife the countesse of Gloucester by his former husband. The earle of Leicester also, meaning to go into the holie land, returned out of France, where he had remained a certeine time as an exile, but was now receiued honorable of the king and other pères of the realme, and after that he had seene the king and done his dutie as appertained, he went to his possessions to make monie for his furniture necessarie to be had in that iourne, for the which he sold at that time his woods about Leicester, unto the knights of the Hospitall, and to the canons of Leicester, receiuing of them for the same about the summe of a thousand pounds.

The countess about Leicester sold.

About the same time, to wit, the 14 of Aprill, died Leolin prince of Wales, and then followed contention betwixt his sons Griffin and David for the principalltie, which at length David obtained through king Henries support (though he were the younger brother) because he was begot in lawfull bed on the sister of king Henrie. The whole countrie of Wales was maruellouslie in trouble about their quarels. At length, a daie of meeting was appointed betwixt them, to grow by waie of talke unto some quiet end; and Griffin meaning no deceit, came in peaceable wise with Richard bishop of Bangor, and others to the place assigned, where they should haue met. But David by a traine took Griffin, and committed him to prison, whereupon afterwards, the yeare ensuing, by continuall plaint and earnest sute of the bishop of Bangor, king Henrie entred Wales with an armie, and constrained David to submit himselfe, and to deliuer the said Griffin into his hands, and further also to put in suerties to appeare at London, there to receiue such order in the kings courts, as to him by law should be orderlie awarded. Griffin ap Gad-docke and diuerse other great lords of Wales joined with the king in this iourne against David, as in the next yeare ye shall further heare.

Leolin prince of Wales departed this life.

Griffin ap Gad-docke

About the same time, there was great strife and contention still remaining betwixt the emperor Frederike and pope Innocent the fourth that succeeded Celestine the fourth, in somuch that fore and most tall warre followed. But king Henrie by the procurement of the legat Atho, aided the pope with monie, though he was somewhat loth to do it, because the said emperor had married his sister. Indeed, the emperor wrote to the king to staie his hand, but the diligence of that legat was such in furthering his masters businesse, that the monie was gone ouer per the emperours letters came. At this time also, Edmund the archbishop of Canturburie greatlie disalowed the often exactions and subsidies which the legat caused daillie to be lenied of the English clergie. Howbeit, in hope to haue his purpose the rather against the monks of Canturburie, with whom he was at variance, he first granted to the legats request made on the popes behalfe in a synod holden at Reading, for the hauing of the fifth part of spirituall mens reuenues, and so by his example others were inforced to do the like.

King Henrie aided the pope with monie against the emperor.

Furthermore he gaue eight hundred marks to the pope, but whether of his owne free will, or by constraint, I cannot saie; but now utterlie mistaking all things done by the legat contrarie to his mind, after he had done and said what he could for redresse, and when he saw no hope at hand for any reformati on either in the king or legat, who esteemed not his words, as a man not longer able to see his countrie so spoiled, he went ouer into France, and got him unto Pontney, there to remaine in voluntarie exile, after the example of his predecessor Thomas Becket, whose dowings he did follow in verie manie things. Merclie the collections of monie, which the pope in these daies by his legats gathered here in this realme, were great and sundrie, so that (as it appeareth by historiographers of this time) the cleargie and other found themselves sore grieved, and repined not a little against such couetous dealings and measureable measurable exactions, in so much that they spake to the king of it, and said; Right famous prince, whie suffer you England to be made a ppey and desolation to all the passers by, as a vineyard without an hedge, common to the waifaring man, and to be destroyed of the bores of the field, sith you haue a sufficient priuilege that no such exactions should be made in this kingdome? And suerlie he is not woorthie of a priuilege which abuseth the same being granted. The king answered those that went thus about to persuade him, that he neither would nor durst gainesate the pope in any thing: and so the people were brought into miserable despaire.

There be that write how that there were other occasions of the archbishops departure out of the realme of the which this should be one; when he saw religion not to be regarded, and that priests were had in no honor, neither that it laie in his power to reforme the matter, sith the king gaue no eare to his admonitions, he determined to absent himselfe till the king (warned by some mishap) should repent him of his errors, and amend his misdoings. Other some an other cause hereunto, which was this; whereas the king by the insample of other kings (begun by William Rufus) used to keepe bishops sees, and other such spiritual possessions in his hands, during the vacation, till a conuenient person were to the same preferred, the archbishop Edmund, for that he saw long delays made oftentimes per any could be admitted to the same of those that were deceased, or by any other means depriued, he was in hand with the king, that the archbishop of Cantuarburie might haue power onlie to provide for successors in such romes as chanced to be vacant, above the tearme of six moneths, which thing the king for a certeine summe of monie granted; but afterward perceiuing that hinderance he sustained thereby, he renoked that grant, so much to the displeasure of the archbishop, that he thought god no longer to continue in the realme.

At his coming to Pontney, he so seemed to despise all worldly pompe and honor, giuing himselfe wholly to diuine contemplation, to fasting and prayer, that the former opinion, which men had conceived of his vertues, was maruellouslie confirmed. At length being sore vexed with sicknesse, supposing that he might recouer helth by changing of aire and place, he caused himselfe to be conueied into an other house of religion, named Soisse, two daies iourne from Pontney, where finally he died the sixteenth of November, and his bodie was brought againe to Pontney, and there buried, where also through sundrie miracles shewed (as they say) at his graue, he was reputed a saint, and at length canonized by pope Innocent the fourth. He was bozne at Abingdon, beside Drenford, and thereby some named him saint Edmund of Abingdon, and some S. Edmund of Pontney, after the place where he was inshined. The see of Cantuarburie was void more than thre yeares after his decease, till at length by the kings commandement, the monks of Cantuarburie elected one Boniface of Sauoie vncke to quene Elianor, being the 45 archbishop which ruled that church.

There was this yeare a certeine person of honest conuerfation, and sober, representing in habit one of the Carthusian monks, taken at Cambridge, being accused for that he refused to come to the church to heare diuine seruice, and upon his examination, because he answered otherwise than was thought conuenient, he was committed to secret prison, and shortly after sent vp to the legat to be of him examined. This man openly protested, that Gregorie was not the true pope, nor head of the church, but that there was another head of the church, and that the church was defiled, so that no seruice ought to be said therein, except the same were newlie dedicated, and the vessels and vestments againe hallowed and consecrated; The diuell (said he) is lofed, & the pope is an heretike, for Gregorie, which nameth himselfe pope, hath polluted the church.

Hereupon (in the presence and audience of the abbat of Cuelham, maister Pic. de Fernham, and diuerse other worshipfull personages) the legat said vnto him being thus out of the waie; Is not power granted to our soueraigne lord the pope from above, both to lose and bind soules, sith he executeth the rōme of S. Peter vpon earth? How then all men looked to heare what answer he would make, beléeuing his iudgement to depend vpon the same, he said by way of interrogation, and not by way of assertion; How can I beléeue, that vnto a person spotted with simonie and vsurie, and haplie wapt in more greuous sins, such power should be granted as was granted vnto holie Peter, who immediatlie followed the lord, as same as he was made his apostle, and followed him not onelie in bodily footsteps, but in cleerenesse of vertues. At which word the legat blushed, & said to some of the standers by; A man ought not to chide with a stole, nor gape ouer an ouen.

In this season the king sent his iustices itinerants in circuit about the land, the which vnder pretext of iustice punished manie persons, and so leuied great summes of monie to the kings vse. Sir William of Poike prouost of Beuerley was assigned to visit the south parts, and sir Robert de Lexington the north parts. Also Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother, with a nauie of ships sailed into Syria, where in the warres against the Saracens, he greatlye advanced the part of the christians. There went ouer with him the earle of Salisburie William Longespée, and William Basset, John Beauchampe, Gestepe de Lucie, John Beuill, Gestepe Beauchampe, Peter de Beuse, and William Furniual. The erle of Pontford also went ouer the same time: but where the earle of Cornewall toke the sea at Sparfles, the earle of Leicester passed through Italie, and toke the water at Byzandze, and with him went these persons of name, Thomas de Furniual, with his brother Gerard de Furniual, Hugh Wake, Almerike de S. Ammond, Wilshard Ledet, Wunhard de Detwin, and William de Detwin that were brethren, Gerard Belmes, Fouke de Baugie, and Peter de Chauntenaie. Shortly after also, John earle of Albemarle, William Fortis, and Peter de Spallow a Poitouin, men for their valiance greatlye renowned, went thither, leading with them a great number of christian souldiours.

In this yeare and vpon the day of S. Remigius, was the church of S. Paule in the citie of London dedicated by Roger bishop of that citie, the king and a great number of bishops and other noble men being present, which were feasted the same day by the said bishop Roger and the canons. Moreover, there died the same yeare the countesse Isabell, wife to Richard earle of Cornewall, and two earles, William earle Warren, and John earle of Lincoln, also the lord John Fitz Robert, one of the chiefe barons in all the north parts of the realme. Also in februarye there appeared a comet or blasing starre verie deadfull to behold, for the space of thirtie daies together. Moreover, on the coast of England there was a great battell amongst the fishes of the sea, so that there were eleauen whales or thirlepoles cast on land, besides other huge and monstrous fishes, which appeared to be dead of some hurts; and one of those mightie fishes, comming into the Thames aline, was pursued by the fishers, and could scarce passe through the arches of London bridge. At length with darts and other such weapons, they slue him before the kings manour at Wortlake, whither they followed him. There was also a great sound heard this yeare in sundrie parts of England at one selfe time, as if it had bene the noise of some mightie moun-taine that had fallen into the sea. And upon the seuenth of Maie there chanced a great boisterous wind that sore troubled the skie.

This yeare the king caused the citizens of London, and the gardians of the cinque ports, and manie other to receiue an oth to be true and faithfull to his sonne prync Edward. The friers preachers and minors, and other men of the church that were biaines, absolued such as had taken on them the crosse, receiuing of them so much monie as would suffice to haue bozne their charges in that iournie, and this not without flander rebounding to the church. The same meanes to get monie was practised also by the legat Wtho, hauing authoritie thereto of the pope. The same yeare the seneshall of Aquitaine came ouer to the king, and let him know, that if tuncle prouision were not had, all those countries on the further side of the sea wold be lost. No other incident chanced the same yeare neither in warre abroad, nor in the state of gouernement of the common-wealth at home, whereof any great accompt is to be made, but that the legat Wtho got great summes of monie di-uerse waies, of religious men to the popes behose: whereupon certeine abbats made complaints to the king, but in place of comfort they receiued discomfort, & after knowledge thereof given to the legat, he was more erreame with them than he was before.

Shortlie after one of the popes familiars and kinsman named master Peter Rosso came from Rome, taking England in his waie to go into Scotland, and vsed in both such diligence in the popes cause, that he got a skienth granted here, which he spedilie gathered. About the same time one Peter de Su-pino was sent into Ireland, and there likewise he got a bintiefine, bringing from thence the summe of 115 marks, and aboue. But the collection which Peter Rosso got out of the Scottissh confines doubled that summe, as was thought. In his returne also from thence, visiting the houses of religion, and searching the consciences of religious persons, by new shifts he craftilie got yet more monie to the popes vse, causing them to sweare to keepe this myserie secret, as it were some priuie of confession for the space of one halfe yeare, whereby he turned the harts of manie men from the loue of the church of Rome, wounding them with great greafe and remorse of conscience to see this pillage.

In the 25 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie kept his Christmasse at Westminster, at which time the legat was sent for to returne vnto Rome, and after he had bene honorable scatted of the king, on the 4 daie of Christmasse he departed from London towards the sea side, after he had remained here aboue three yeares. Peter of Sauois that was uncle to the quene came into England, and was honorable re-cued and intertained of king Henrie, who had gi-uen to him the earldome of Richmond. This sonne Boniface was this yeare also elected archbishop of Canterburie, a tall gentleman and of a goodlie personage, but neither so learned nor otherwise meet for that rone. But such was the kings pleasure, who in fauour of the quene, to whom he was wolen gemane sought to aduance him, and getting the popes fauour in that behalfe, procured the monks & bishops to grant their contents, although much against their minds, if they might haue had their owne wills.

The earle of Cornewall returning out of the holie land in safetie, after he had settled things there, by concluding an abstinence of warre betwixt the Saracens and christians about the octaues of S. John Baptist, he arrived in Sicill, and hearing there in what place the emperor as then sojourned, he repaired vnto him, of whom and of his sister the emperesse he was most iustillie receiued. Within a few daies after, he went to the court of Rome, to trie if he might diue some agreement betwixt the emperor and the pope, but finding the pope too hard, and nothing conformable, except he might haue had all his owne will (which was, that the emperor should haue submitted himselfe to the popes pleasure, and stand vnto what soeuer order the church should appoint) he returned backe to the emperor without concluding any thing with the pope, declaring vnto him as he had found. After this he remained two moneths with the emperor, & then taking his leave was honoured with great gifts at his departure, and so returning towards England, at length arrived at the towne of Dover on the morrow after the feast of the Epiphanie in the yeare following.

About the same time that the earle of Cornewall was in his returne south of the holie land, new wars suddenlie arose in Wales, which happened well for king Henrie. There were diuerse of the Welshmen that could not well like of the gouernement of Da-uid, and therefore sore lamenting the captiuitie of his brother Griffen, whom before (as ye haue heard) he had by a traine taken and kept still as prisoner, began to make warre vpon the said Dauid, and those that took his part, the which on the other side sought to oppresse their aduersaries, so that there ensued much bloodshed and slaughter betwene the parties.
The wife also of the said Griffen, and such other noble men as were become enimies vnto Dauid, sent and writ vnto king Henrie, requiring his aid, that Griffen might be deliuered out of his brothers hands, promising him great helpe and furtherance, with large conditions of submission, and assurance furthermore to be at his commandement, and to receiue him for their true and soueraigne lord.

King Henrie vnderstanding all their doings and intents, thought that this contention betwene the two brethren for the title of Wales would serue he-rie well for his purpose, and therefore he hastied forth with a speedie armie of men in that countrie, purposing to reduce the same vnder his obeliance. Here with Senena or Guenhera, the wife of Griffen (and other of the Welsh Nobilitie, that took part with hir) concluded a league with king Henrie, vpon cer-teine conditions as the same are contained in an instrument or charter, the tenour whereof beginneth as followeth.

Conuenit inter dominum Henricum tertium re-gem Anglorum illustrem ex una parte, & Se-nenam uxorem Griffint, filij Leolini, quondam principis Northwallie, quem Dauid frater eius tenet carceri munitatum, cum Griffint filio suo, nomine eiusdem Griffi. ex altera.

Articles of agreement betwene Henrie the third of that name, king of England of the one parties, and Senena the wife of Griffen, the sonne of Leolin, sometimes prince of Northwales, whom Dauid his brother deteined in prison, with Owen his sonne, in the name of the said Griffen of the other partie.

In primis, the said Senena undertaketh, that the said Griffen hir husband will giue vnto the king six hundred markes, vpon condition that the king will cause the said Griffen and Owen his sonne to be deliuered from the prison wherein they are kept, and will stand to the ought to be imprisoned or no.

Item the said Griffin and his heires will stand to the iudgement of the kings court, for and concerning that portion of the inheritance of the said Leolin his father, which of right ought to apperteyne unto him.

Item the said Senena undertaketh for the said Griffin and his heires, that the said Griffin and his heires shall yeld and paie peacelie to the king for the same lands, the summe of three hundred markes. Whereof the first thirde part to be paid in monie, the second in kine, and the third in horses, by the estimation of indifferent men, and the same to be paid yearly at Michaelmas and Easter by even portions, by the hands of the shiriffe of the countie of Salop for the time being.

Item the said Senena undertaketh further for the said Griffin and his heires, that they and everie of them shall obserue the peace against the said Dauid, and suffer him quietlie to enjoy such portion of his fathers inheritance as to him shall be found to be due.

Item the said Senena doth further undertake for the said Griffin his husband and his heires, that in case anie Welshman hereafter shall happen to rebell against the king, they at their owne costs and charges shall compell the said offender to make satisfaction to the king for his disobedience.

Item for the performance of the premises, the said Senena will deliuer unto the lord the king, Dauid and Roderike his sonnes for pledges, with promise that if the said Griffin and Owen or either of them shall happen to die before their deliuerie out of the said prison, it shall be lawfull for the said Senena to haue one of his sonnes released, the other remaining with the king for pledge.

Item the said Senena hath sworn upon the holie Euangelist, that the said Griffin his husband and his heires, and everie of them shall accomplish and performe all the premises on their behalfe, and further undertaketh that the said Griffin his husband, upon his deliuerie out of prison, shall take the same oath.

Item the said Senena in the name of the said Griffin his husband, submitteth his selfe concerning the obseruation of the premises unto the jurisdiction of the reuerend fathers the bishops of Hereford and Lichfield, so that the said bishops or either of them at the kings request shall compell the said Griffin and his heires to obserue all and singular the premises on their behalfe, by sentence of excommunication upon their persons, and interdiction upon their lands.

Lastlie, the said Senena doth undertake and promise (Bona fide) to see and procure the full performance of all the premises, and that the said Griffin his husband and his heires shall allow and performe the same, and thereof shall deliuer his instrument in writing to the king in forme aforesaid. To this charter both parties put their seals, Griffin and Senena to that part which remained with the king, and the king to that part which remained with Senena.

Finalie, for the performance of the articles in this instrument or writing contained, the said ladie in name of his husband, procured diuerse noble men to become sureties or pledges, that is to saie, Ralph de Spottimer, Walter de Cliford, Roger de Pontual, seneschall of Chester, Mailgun ap Iafflun, Meredith ap Robert, Griffin ap Maddoc of Bromesfeld, Youwell and Meredith brethren, Griffin ap Menniden: which persons undertooke for the said ladie, that the covenants on his part should be performed, and therupon they also bound themselves by their writings obligatorie unto the said king, in forme following.

Omnibus hoc scriptum visuris Rogerus de monte alto senescallus Cestrie salutem. Sciatis quod ego me constitui plegium, &c.

O all and singular, to whome this writing shall come, Roger de monte alto the steward of Chester sendeth greeting. Know yee that I haue constituted my selfe pledge for Senena the wife of Griffin the sonne of Leolin, sometimes prince of Northwales, and haue undertaken for him to our souereigne lord Henrie king of England, that the said Senena shall accomplish and performe all and singular those covenants and articles, agreed vpon betwene our said souereigne lord and the said Senena, for and concerning the deliuerance of the said Griffin his husband and Owen his sonne out of the prison of Dauid his brother, and the portion of inheritance due vnto the said Griffin, which the said Dauid keepeth from him by force. In witness whereof to this present writing I haue put my seale. Dated at Salop, the mondaie before the feast of the Ascension of the blessed virgin Marie, in the 15 year of his reigne.

But now to our purpose. When Dauid understood of the kings approach with so puissant an armie, he was brought into great perplexitie, and the more in deed, not onelie because there chanced the same yeare for the space of foure moneths together a great drought, so that the marshes and bogges were dried vp and made passable for the kings people, but also for that manie of the Welsh nobilitie, as cheselie Griffin Maddoc and others, sought his destruction in fauour of his brother Griffin (whose deliuerance they earnestlie wished) and for that he stood excommunicate by the pope. All which things well considered, caused him to doubt of a further mischance to hang ouer his head: whereupon he sent to the king, signifieng that he would deliuer his brother Griffin free into his hands, but letting him withall to wit by manie good reasons, that if he did set him at libertie, he should minister manie new occasions of continuall warres.

Whereouer, this covenant Dauid required at the kings hands, that the king should reserve him so to his peace vnder the bond of fidelitie and hostages, that he should not disherit him: which when as the king courteously granted, Dauid sent vnto him his brother Griffin, to dispose of him as he should thinke requisite. The king receiuing him, sent him to London, vnder the conduct of sir John de Berinton, together with other men (whome he had receiued as hostages both of Dauid and others the nobles of Wales) appointing them to be kept in safetie within the tower there. There was also a charter or deed made by the same Dauid vnto king Henrie, containing the articles, covenants, and grants made betwixt the said prince and the foresaid Dauid, as followeth.

The charter of the articles of Dauids submission to the king.

Omnibus Christi fidelibus, ad quos presentes littere peruenierint, Dauid filius Leolini salutem. Sciatis quod concessi domino meo Henrico regi Anglie illustri, &c.

O all christen people, to whom these present letters shall come, Dauid the sonne of Leolin sendeth greeting. Know ye that I haue granted and promised to deliuer Dauid sworn to his swith end.

Dauid deliuereth his brother to the k.

liuer vnto the lord Henrie the noble king of England, Griffin my brother with his sonne and heire whom I kepe in prison, and all other prisoners, who by occasion of the said Griffin lie in durance.

Item I shall stand to the iudgement of the kings court, aswell in that case, whether the said Griffin ought to be deteyned prisoner or no, as also for and concerning the part of the inheritance of the said Lecolin my father, claimed by the said Griffin according to the customes of Wales: so that the peace be mainteyned betwene me and the said Griffin.

Item I and the said Griffin, and either of vs shall hold our portions of land, of our said souereigne the king in Capite, acknowledging him chiefe lord thereof.

Item I shall restore vnto Roger de monte alco steward of Chester, his land of Pontalt or Spould, with the appurtenances.

Item I shall likewise restore to all other barons, all such lands, lordships and castels, as were taken from them since the beginning of the warres be-twene the lord John king of England, and the said Lecolin prince of Wales my father, saving the right of all covenants and grants by writing, to be reserued vnto the iudgement and determination of the kings court.

Item I shall give and restore vnto our souereigne lord the king all his charges in this present voiage laid out.

Item I shall make satisfaction for all damages & injuries done by me, or anie of my subiects vnto the king or his, according to the consideration of the kings court, and shall deliuer such as shalbe malefac-tours in that behalfe.

Item I shall restore vnto the said lord the king all the homages, which the late king John his father had, & which the said lord the king of right ought to haue, especiallie of all the noble men of Wales: and if the king shall set at libertie anie of his captives, the possessions of that man shall remaine to the king.

Item the land of Glincer with the appurtenances shall remaine to the lord the king and his heires for euer.

Item I shall not receiue or suffer to be receiued within my countrie of Wales, any of the subiects of England, outlawed or banished by the said lord the king, or his barons of Mercia.

Item for confirmation and performance of all and singular the premises on my behalfe, I shall prouide by bonds and pledges, and by all other waies and means as the said lord the king shall award, and will accomplish the commandement of the said king, and will obrie his lawes.

In witnesse whereof to this present writing I haue put my seale: dated at Alnet by the river of Elwey, in the feast of the decollation of S. John Baptist, in the five & twentieth yere of the reigne of the said king.
For the obseruation of these 11 articles, the said prince Dauid and Edmund Glanchan were sworn.
Also the said prince Dauid submitted himselfe to the iurisdiction of the archbishop of Canturburie, and of the bishops of London, Hereford, and Couentrie, for the time being. That all, or one of them, whom the king shall appoint, may excommunicate him, and interdict his land vpon breach of anie the said articles.
And thereupon he procured the bishops of S. Wango, and S. Asaph to make their charters to the lord the king, whereby they granted to execute and denounce all sentences, aswell of excommunication as of interdiction sent from the foresaid archbishop, bishops, or anie of them.

The said Dauid also sent prauilie to the king, to desire him that he would suffer him being his nephew, and the lawfull heire of Lecolin his father, to inioy the principalltie of Wales rather than Griffin, which was but a bassard, and no kin vnto the king. Cōuing him withall to vnderstand, that in case he did set Griffin at libertie, he should be sure to haue the war renewed. Whereupon the king knowing these things to be true, and vnderstanding also that Griffin was a ballant stout man, and had manie friends and faurours of his cause, inclined rather to assent vnto Da-uids request than otherwise to be in danger of further troubles, & therefore willinglie granted the same.

Shortlie after Dauid did send his brother Griffin vnto the king, and other pledges for himselfe, for performance of the said articles, whom the king sent forthwith to the towne of London, there to be safely kept, allowing to Griffin a noble a date for his finding. And within few daies after Michaelmas, prince Dauid comming to the kings court did his homage, and swore fealtie, who for so doing, and in that he was the kings nephew, was sent home againe in peace.
When Griffin saw how all things went, and that he was not like to be set at libertie, he began to deuise waies and means to escape out of prison.

Wherefore deceiuing the watch one night, he made a long line of hangings, couerings, and sheets, and hauing gotten out at a window, let downe himselfe by the same from the top of the towre: but by reason that he was a mightie personage and full of flesh, the line brake with the twaight of his bodie, and so falling downe headlong of a great height, his necke and head was diuen into his bodie with the fall: whose miserable carcasle being found the morowe after, was a pitifull sight to the beholders. The king being certified thereof, commanded Griffins sonne to be better looked vnto, and punished the officers for their negligence.

About the same tyme there chanced a controuersie to rise betwixt the king and the bishop of Lincolne, for the bestowing of the benefice of Thame, the which John Spanfell the kings chapleine had gotten in possession by the kings fauour, through prouision granted of the pope, where the bishop alleging priuileges to the contrarie, had granted it to an other. At length the king hauing his fathers trouble before his eyes, and doubting the bishops words, threatening some evil mishap to follow, if he should stand long in the matter against the said bishop, gaue ouer his temour: and therewithall provided John Spanfell of a farre more rich benefice, that is to saie, of the personage of Spaldstone, wherinto the bishop speedilie in-uested him.

This yere manie noble men ended their liues, as well such as were gone with the earles of Cornewall and Leicester into the holie land, and others remaining still at home. Amongst which number were these: William Fitz earle of Albemarle, Walter Racie, one of the chiefest nobles in all Ireland, Stephan de Segraue, Gilbert de Basset and his sonne and heire named also Gilbert. Porreouer, John Bi-set high iustice of the forests, and Peter de Walslow, Hugh Wake, Robert Sparmin, Peter de Buns, Guischarde Laidre, Eustace Montuill, Cudo Harmon surnamed Bercham, Baldwin de Betun, John Fitz John steward in household to earle Richard, John de Beau lieu, Gerard de Furnuall. There dyed also the ladie Elianor the countesse of Britaine, wife vnto Geoffrey, that was sometime earle of Bri-taine (which countesse had bene long kept prisoner high estates, but also in other places many notable personages departed out of this transitory life. As two popes, Gregorie the ninth and his successeur Celestine the fourth, besides cardinals: amongst the which Robert Somercotean Englishman was one. About the later end of this 25 years, the first date of October, there appeared a right sore eclipse of the sunne, verie strange to the beholders. In the 26 years died the emperesse Isabell, wife unto Frederike the emperour.

In this year also began the wars againe betwixt king Henrie, and Lewis the king of France, for the quarrell of Hugh earle of March, who refused to do homage unto Alfonso the brother of king Lewis, which Alfonso had married the onelie daughter and heire of Raimund earle of Tholouse, and therefore should succeed the same earle in his estate and inheritance. His brother king Lewis had also given unto him the earldome of Poitou, with all the lands of Auergne: and because the earle of March would not do homage unto him, king Lewis made warre upon the earle of March, who therupon sought to procure king Henrie (whose mother he had married) to come over with an armie unto his aid.

King Henrie being sollicitied with letters, not onelie from his father in law, but also from diuerse other noble men of Poitou, who willinglie would haue bene vnder his gouernement, asked aduise of his counsell what he ought to do in the matter. Some were of opinion, that sith there had bene a truce taken betwixt the kings, it were not reason in anie wise to breake the same: but some other thought, that sith the Frenchmen in times past had taken from king John his lawfull heritage in Normandie and Poitou, and wrongfullie detained the same still in their possession without restitution, it could not be at anie time lawfull upon occasion giuen to recover the same out of their hands. This opinion was allowed for good, and the best that might be both of the king & also of the earle of Cornwell, who was latelie returned from his iournie which he had made into the holie land.

But now all the state rested in gathering of monie, which being earnestlie demanded in a parlement begun at Westminster the Tuesday before Candlemasse, was as stiffly denied, alledging in excuse their often payments of subsidies and relieves, which had bene gathered sith the comming of the king to his crowne, as the thirtieth, fiftieth, sixtieth and fortieth parts of all their moueable goods, besides charunge, hidge, and sundrie escuages, namelie the great escuage granted for the marriage of his sister the emperesse: and also beside the thirtieth with in four years last past, or thereabouts, granted to him, which they thought remained vnspent, because it could not be vnderstood about what necessarie affaires for the common-wealth it should be laid forth and imployed, whereas the same was lent upon condition, that it should remaine in certeine castles, and not to be expended but by the aduise of foure peeres of the realme, as the earle of Warren, and others. Moreover, they alledged, that the elcheats and amercements which had bene gathered of late were such as must needs fill the kings coffers: & so to conclude, they would not consent to grant any subsidie.

Howbeit, the king so handled the matter with the richer sort, and namelie those of the spiritualltie, that partlie by gift and partlie by borrowing, he got together a great masse of treasure, and so prepared an armie and ships to passe over into Gascoine with all convenient speed. In the meane time, because he would leaue things in more suretie at home, he sent the bishop of Durham into Scotland, by whose diligence a marriage was concluded betwixt the lord

Alexander eldest sonne to the king of Scots, and the laie Margaret daughter to king Henrie. Moreover, the marriages of England adjoining to Scotland were committed to the king of Scots as wardens of the same: here and beyond which king Henrie should abide in the parts beyond the seas. The archbishop of York in the kings absence, was also appointed gouernour of the realme.

When this possession was once readie, about the middle of Aprill, the king toke the sea, together with the queene his wife, his brother Richard earle of Cornwell, and seauen other earles, and about three hundred knights or men of armes. The Poitouins had written to him that he needed not bring over with him any great armie of men, but rather plenty of monie to reteine such as he should find there readie to serue him at his comming. Whereupon he toke with him thirtie barrells of sterling coine: and at length (but not without contrarie winds) he arrived on the coast of Gascoine, in the mouth of the river of Garon, and taking land, was so fullie receiued of the people, and namelie of Reigmo lord of Pons.

The French king aduertised that the king of England was come over into France, to the aid of the earle of March, and other his subiects against him, prepared a mightie armie, in the which were reckoned to be to the number of foure thousand men of armes, well prouided and armed at all points, besides twentie thousand esquires, gentlemen, peomen and crossebowes: and with the same immediatlie he entred the dominions of the earle of March, and toke from him diuerse townes and castles, as Fountney, wherein he toke one of the earls sonnes: also peruant with diuers other. In the meane while the king of England was advanced forward and come nere unto Tailboze, lieng with his armie in the faire medow by the river side of Charent fast by the castell of Thonap: & he had there with him in campe sixtene hundred knights, or rather men of armes, and twentie thousand footmen, with seauen hundred that bare crossebowes. He made there his two halfe brethren, the sonnes of the earle of March knights, and gave to the one of them five hundred marks, and to the other six hundred marks peece, to be paid out of his elchequer, till he had otherwise prouided for them in lands and reuenues equall to that pension.

Now the French king being aduertised that king Henrie laie thus nere to Tailboze, marched thitherwards with all his puissance latelie reenforced with new supplies, and approaching to Tailboze, had the towne deliuered unto him. This chanced about the latter end of Iulie. When after the French king had gotten possession of Tailboze, he ment to passe the water, and if by mediation of a truce politikelie procured by the earle of Cornwell (and as it were at a narrow pinch) the king of England had not found means to remoue in the night season, he had bene in great danger to haue bene taken, through want of such aid as he looked to haue had at the hands of the Poitouins and other his confederats. But yet he got a waie (though with some shame of honour) and withdrew to Raintes, whither also the French king followed, and comming nere to the towne, there was a sharpe encounter begun betwixt the French and the English, wherein the Englishmen were victors, and in which by the Frenchmens owne confession, if the English power had bene like to theirs in number, they had fullie obtayned the honour of a fough, ten field, and for a light skirmish a sound and perfect victorie.

men, as John de Burgh, Warren de Spence, Chenill, Cheincle, Hubert Fitz Wartheim, and many Fitz Nicholas did in this fight well appeared, and likewise other of the worthy nation were themselves so manfullie, that they deserved no small commendation. Amongst which also Sir John Barris the kings chaplain, and one of his privie counsell did right worthilie, taking prisoner with his owne hands one Peter Dige a gentleman in good place.
There was moreover taken on the French part Sir John de Barris a man of good account, by William de Sep, beside sundrie others. On the English part was slain Gilbert de Clare, and Henrie having taken prisoner, with other, to the number of twentie knights, or men of armes, if I may so call them.

After this encounter, by reason the French armie increased by new bands still resorting to their king, the earle of March secretly sought meanes to be reconciled unto him: and finally by the helpe of the duke of Britaine, his old acquaintance and friend at need, his peace was purchased, so that he had his lands againe to him restored, except certeine castles, which for further assurance the French king retained in his hands by the space of three yeares. The king of England, perceiuing himselfe too much deceived in that he had put such confidence in the earle of March and others of that countrie, which should haue aided him at this present, and againe aduertised, that the French king meant to besiege him within the ci-tie of Raines, departed with all speed from thence, and came to Blaie, a towne in Gascoigne, situat nere to the riuer of Garon, & distant seven leagues from Burdeaur.

Now whilst he laie here at Blaie, there came unto him the countesse of Biene (a woman monstrous big of bodie) bringing with hir to serue the king, hir sonne, and three score knights, in hope to get some of his sterling monie, whereof she knew him to haue plenty: and so couenanting for hir intertein-ment, remained still with him, and receiued euerie daie 13 pounds sterling, and yet she neuer pleased him the worth of a goat, but rather hindered him, in making him bare of monie, which she receiued, purssed by and toke a waie with hir when she departed from him. But if to hir making and stature she had bin indued with the courage of Moadicia, whom she exceeded (as it should come) in proportion, or with the prowesse of Eliscda, hir seruice had bene no lesse beneficiall to the k. than anie skilfull captaine marching vnder his banner. So that we see in this woman a desire rather to satisfie hir hydropicall humor of couetousnesse, than anie true affection to set forward the kings affaires; therefore it may well be said of hir in respect of hir greedinesse to get from the king for hir owne commodities sake, that she was *vt mare, quod dicit deaurat, nunquam abundat,

In the meane time the lords de Pons, Mirabran and Portaigne suddenly reuolted, & submitted themselves to the French king, with the vicount of Touars, and all other the lords and knights of Poitou, and the marches therabouts, that not long before had procured king Henrie to come ouer to their aid. The citie of Raines was likewise rendred to him immediatlie vpon king Henries departure from thence.
At which season the French king meant to haue followed him to Blaie, but by reason of a great death which chanced in his armie, he was constrained to alter his purpose. Surely, as authors haue recorded, what though pestilence and unwholesomesse of the aire, & great manie of Frenchmen died at that time, and daile more fell sicke. The number of them that died (as March, Paris, & March, Westminster affirme) amounted to twentie thousand persons, beside fourescore of the nobilitie that were diuersly as persons being in the hospital of the king, began to be diseased and died, so that he was constrained to reuolte the French king, and to departe home.

A day or two after, a Blackesmith the sonne of the Blacksmith of Raines, and then went to Burdeaur, where he was taken in this meane while, and brought to the king about midsummer of a young man, whom they named Beatrice after the queens mother. Now whilst king Henrie was thus occupied in Poitou, and Gascoigne, William Marischall the sonne of Counte Marischall (by commandement from the king) was put to death at London, with certeine of his complices in the reign of S.
Bartholomew the apostle. This William Marischall falling in to the kings displeasure, got him to the sea, and plaied the rouer, keeping the Ile of Lundia in the west countie, till finally he was taken and brought prisoner vnto the towne, where he was charged with sundrie articles of treason, as that he should hire that counterfeit mad man which sought to haue murdered the king at Woodstoke, as before ye haue heard.
Whoebeit when he should die, he utterly denied that euer he was priuie to anie such thing. He was first had from Westminster to the towne, & from thence drowne to the gibet, and there hanged till he was dead, and after being cut downe, had his bowels ripped out and burned, and when his head was cut off, the bodie was diuided into foure quarters, and sent vnto foure of the principall cities of the realme. His complices were also drowne through the citie of London vnto the same gibet, and there hanged.

In the time of this warre also betwixt England and France, there was much hurt done on the sea betwixt them of the cinque ports and the Frenchmen of Normandie, and other: as the Caleis men and the Britons, which did make themselves as strong as they could against the Englishmen by sea. Where-vpon diuerse encounters chanced betwixt them, but more to the losse of the Englishmen, than of the Frenchmen: in somuch that they of the ports were constrained to require aid of the archb. of Poike the lord gouernour of the realme. About which time, and after the king was withdrawen to Burdeaur, diuers noble men, as the earles of Norfolk and Winchester, with others, got licence to returne into England. Some after whose arrivall, escauge was gathered through the realme towards the bearing of the kings charges. Moreover, in this yeare of the king there died sundrie noble men of naturall infirmities, as the earle of Warwicke, Gilbert de Gaunt, Bal-win Wake, Philip de Rame, and Roger Bertham of the north, with diuerse other. Whoebeit the king himselfe returned not home, but laie all the winter time at Burdeaur, meaning to attempt manie enterprises, but he brought none to passe, fearing that in protracting the time, he spent much monie, and to little purpose.

About the beginning of the seven and twentieth yeare of his reigne, his brother the earle of Cornewall, mistaking the order of things which he saw da-lie in the king his brothers proceedings, would needs returne backe into England, but chiefe when he perceiued that his counsell & aduise could not be heard.
The king was sore offended herewith, but he could not well remedie the matter, nor perswade him to revise. And so the said earle of Cornwall, together with the earles of Penbroke and Hereford, and diuerse other noble men toke the sea, and after manie dangers escaped in their course, at length on S. Lucies daie they arrived in Cornwall, though some of the bessels that were in the companie were drowen by force of the tempestuous weather vpon other contrarie coasts, & About this season also, that is to saie, on the day of S. About the same time the king sent ouer into England to the archbishop of Poike lord gouernour of the realme, to cause prouision of graine and bakon, to be conueied ouer vnto him, which he appointed to be taken out of the possessions of the archbishop of Canterburie, and other bishopps: that were vac-cant, and out of other such places as seemed to him good to appoint. Whereupon were sent ouer to him ten thousand quarters of wheat, fise thousand quarters of otes, with as manie bakons. Also there was sent vnto him great prouision of other things, as cloth for apparell and liueries, but much of it perished in the sea by one meane or other, that little thereof came to his vse, who remained still at Burdeaur to his great cost and charges, and small gaine, sauing that he re-couered certeine townes and holds there in Gascoigne that were kept by certeine rebels. At which time, because he was inclined rather to follow the counsell of the Gascoignes and other strangers than of his owne subiects, and gaue vnto them larger entertainment, not regarding the seruite of his owne naturall people: he was maruellouslie euill spoken of here in England, and the more in deed, because his iourne had no better successe, and was yet so chargeable vnto him and all his subiects. The Noble men that remained with him, as the earles of Leicester and Salisburie, with other, were constrained to borrow no small summes of monie to beare out their charges: and so likewise the king himselfe ran greatlie in debt, by taking vp monie towards the discharging of his impossible expenses.

Truce taken by five yeares.

At length by mediation of such as were committioners a truce was concluded betwixt him and the French king for five yeares, and then he returned toward England, but he arrived not there till the ninth of October, although the truce was concluded in March upon S. Gregories day: for besides other occasions of his state, one chanced by such strife and debate as rose amongst the Gascoignes, which caused him to returne to land, that he might pacifie the same when he was already imbarked, and had hoised his saile immediatlie to set forward. He left in France for his lieutenant one Nicholas de Huesles or Spo-les, to defend those townes, which yet remained under his obedience, for he put no great confidence in the people of that countrie, the which of custome being vered with continuall warre, were constrained not by will, but by the change of times, one while to hold on the French side, and an other while on the English. In deed the townes, namelie those that had their situation vpon the sea coastes, were so destroyed and decayed in their walles and fortifications, that they could not long be any great aid to either part, and therefore being not of force to hold out, they were compelled to obey one or other, where by their willes they would haue done otherwise.

Nicholas de Huesles his lieutenant in Gascoigne.

This was the cause that the Is. of England, oftentimes vpon trust of these townes, which for the most part were readie to receiue him, was brought into some hope to recouer his losses, and cheefelie for that he was so manie times procured to attempt his fortune there, at the request of the sickle-minded Spo-touns, who whilst they did take still to purge their offences to the one king or to the other, they dailie by new treasons defamed their credit, and so by such means the king of England oftentimes with small aduantage or none at all, made warre against the French king, in trust of their aid, that could, or (vpon the least occasion conceiued) quickelie would do little to his furtherance. And so thereby king Henrie as well as his father king John, was oftentimes de-ceiued of his vaine conceiued hope.

In this seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henries reigne, diuerse noble personages departed this life, and first about the beginning of Januarie, deceased the lord Richard de Burgh, a man of great honour and estimation in Ireland, where he held manie faire possessions, by conquest of that noble gentleman his worthie father. Also that valiant warriour Hugh Lacie, who had conquered in his time a great part of Ireland. Also the same yere on the sea-uenth of Maie, Hugh de Albanie earle of Arundell departed this life, in the middell of his youthfull 20 yeares, and was buried in the priorie of Westminster ham, which his ancestors had founded. After his deceasse, that noble heritage was diuided by partition amongst foure sisters.

About the same time, to wit, on the twelth day of Maie, Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent departed this life at his manor of Banstude, and his bodie was conueied to London, and there buried in the church of the Friers preachers, vnto the which Friers he had bene verie beneficiall. Amongst other 30 things, he gaue vnto them his goodlie palace at Westminster adioining nere to the palace of the earle of Cornewall, which the archbishop of Poike afterwards purchased. The monks of the Cisterwere this yeare somewhat vered by the king, because they had refused to aid him with monie towards his iourne made into Gascoigne. Also the places of the crown were kept and holden in the towne of London. And in the night of the six and twentieth day of Iulie, starres were sene fall from the skie after a marvellous sort, not after the common manner, but 40 thirte or fortie at once, so fast one after another and glancing to and fro, that if there had fallen so manie verie starres in deed, there would none haue bene left in the firmament.

In the eight and twentieth yeare of king Henries reigne, the queenes mother the ladie Beatrice countess of Poouance arrived at Dover on the foure-teenth day of Nouember, bringing with hir the ladie Sancia hir daughter, and in the octaues of S. Martine they were receiued into London in most solemne wise, the streets being hanged with rich clothes, as the maner is at the coronations of princes.
On S. Clements day, Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother married the said ladie Sancia, which marriage was solemnized in most roiall wise, and with such sumptuous feasts and banquetings, as greater could not be deuised. Finally, the queens mother the countesse of Poouance, being a right notable and worthie ladie, was honored in euerie de-greet of hir sonne in law king Henrie in most courteous and sumptuous manner, and at hir departure out of the realme, which was after Christmasse, she was with most rich and princelie gifts honourable rewarded.

About the same time also, whereas William de Kalegh was requested to remove from the see of Rozwich vnto Winchester, and consenting therevnto, without the kings licence, obtained his confirmation of the pope: the king was highlie displeased therewith, because he ment it to another. Whereby on when the said William Kalegh was returned from Rome to be installed, the king sent commandement to the maior and citizens of Winchester, that they should not suffer him to enter the citie. Where, upon he being so kept out, accursed both the citie and cathedra church with all the monks and others that favoured the prior, which had intruded himselfe onelie by the kings authoritie, and not by lawfull election and means, as was supposed.

At length the said bishop upon græse conceived that the king should be so heauie load unto him, got into a ship at London, and staid a while into France, where he was well received of the French king, and greatly cherished. Also he found such means that the pope in fauour of his cause wrote letters both to the king and to the quene, naming him his cosen, but which waie that kindred should come about, as yet it was neuer knowne. The bishop to shew himselfe thankfull for such friendship, gaue the pope about six thousand marks, as is said, and the pope because he would not be accounted a disdainefull person, turned not backe one pennie of that which was so gently offered him. At length partlie at contemplation of the popes letters, and partlie by reason the bishop humbled himselfe in answering the articles which the king had objected against him in cause of the controuersie betwixt them, he granted him his peace, and received him into the land, restoring to him all that had bene taken and detained from him.

Moreover, in this meane while the pope trusting more than inough upon the kings simplicitie and patience, who indeed durst not in any case seme to displease him, had sent an other collector of monie into England named Martine, not adorned with power legantine, but furnished with such authorities and faculties as had not bene heard of. He was lodged in the temple, where he shewed what commission he had to gather by the popes reuenues, and to crad monie by sundrie manner of meanes, and so fell in hand therewith, using no small diligence therein, vnto the great græse and hurt of conscience of manie: he had power to staie the bestowing of benefices, till he was satisfied to the full contentation of his mind. Benefices of small value he regarded not greatly, but such as were good livings in deed felt his heauie and rauinous hands extended towards them. He had power also to excommunicate, to suspend, and to punish all such as should resist his will, although neuer so wilfullie bent, in so much that it was said, he had sundrie blankes vnder the popes bulled seale, because that upon the sudden he brought forth such as seemed best to serue for his purpose. He used this his vnmearurable authoritie to the vttermost, and therein did not forget his owne profit, but tooke paltries and other presents of religious men.

¶ But to declare all the practises of this the popes agent, as it would be too long and tedious a procelle, so it is nothing strange that these his landloping legats and Nuncios haue their manifold collusions to couen christian kingdoms of their reuenues. For if they were not furnished with forlike fraud and woulusty rauenine, they were no fit factors for him; sith it is required that like maister haue like man. And therefore he is aptlie described in the likenesse of a man, his head and face excepted, wherein he resembled a wolfe; besides that, he is set forth with a crozier staffe in his hand, at the hoke whereof hangeth his Judas purse, wherein are poked up his pilfered pater pence, and I wot not what extorted payments and pretended duties. As for his deceits and craftes, he hath more varietie of them, than the cat of the mountaine hath spots in his skin, or the peacocke hath eyes in his taile. Whereupon it is trulie said of a late poet,

Christi & pape

thore anonyimo.*

Sydera nemo potest quot sunt numerare polorum, Quot neq. vere noua gramina campus habet, Sic quoq. nemo potest vassi ludibria pape Esse & innumeros commemorare dolos:

Huius scopus immensum seducere fraudibus orbem, Huius scopus humanum ludificare genus.

But to proceed, when men saw such unreasonable courtlines and polling, by the popes procurement, some of the nobilitie of the realme, not able longer to beare it, came to the king, and exhibited to him their complaint hereof, namely so: that the popes procurator bestowed diuers rich prebends and other rooms in churches vpon strangers knowne to be infamed for blurie, simonie, and other heinous vices, which had no respect to preaching, nor to keeping of any hospitalitie, for maintenance thereof their ancestors had giuen forth their lands to the enriching of the church, not meaning to haue the same bestowed on such manner of persons. The king vnder stood that truth it was which was told him, and therefore writ to the pope in humble wise, beseeching him of his fatherlie care to take order for some reuenge therein.

About this time the king began to reuenge his indignation for the following of the warres against the French king, and therefore asked the aduise of his counsell how he might best attempt the recouerie of those lands in France which were wrongfullie detained from him. The most part of all his ancient counsellors were of this opinion, that to make warre a gaine in trust of others aid, as had bene attempted so often before without any profit, should be no wise done, and therefore he ought either to forbear, or els so to praise himselfe of power sufficient, without trusting to the support of strangers, as he might be able with his owne puissance and force to achieve his enterpryse, for otherwise his trauell should proue but vaine and to vertie small effect. The king perswaded with these sound reasons, thought not good to attempt any thing more touching the said warre vndisabled: and to the end it should not be said how he trusted in vaine vpon the aid of strangers, he caused all such possessions as the Romans held in England to be confiscated, to the intent that as well the Romans as Britons and Poitouins might well vnderstand, that he minded not from thenceforth to credit the false promises of rebels, as he that would now vse onelie the service of his owne people the Englishmen, which in respect of others painted promises he had before contemned.

The occasion that moued the king so to disherit the Romans, did cheeflie rise of the French kings dealing, who about the same time calling to him all those that had lands in England, required them either to sticke vnto him inseparably, either else to the king of England, sith no man might serue two masters. Whereupon some forsaking their lands in England, lined on those which they had in France, and other forsooke those livings which they had in France, and came over into England to line on those possessions which they had here. But in the French kings doings was no enforcing of men, either to forsake the one or the other: wherefore the proceedings of the king of England seemed somewhat more inturions, and partlie sounded to the breach of the truce. Whobett all was passed ouer without apparant trouble.

Whilist all things were thus in quiet, and the king himselfe not troubled with any outward wars, the Welshmen (who though they were subdued, yet could not rest in quiet) received againe the fornamed Dauid to their prince, the which for a policie determined himselfe to make offer to the pope to hold his land of him, yielding therefore yearelie vnto him the summe of five hundred marks (as is said) to the end that vnder the wings of the popes protection he might shadow himselfe, and be defended against all men. At length by large gifts of no small summes of monie he purchased letters of the pope in his fauour, to the prejudice of the crowne of England, as touching the right which the king of England had to the dominion of Wales, as by the tenour thereof it may appare beginning as here in sueth, Illustri viro domi- no Henrico Dei gratia regi Anglie, &c.

Thus Dauid being encouraged herewith and such other of the Welshmen as took his part, at time appointed did set upon the kings captains as they stra-gled abroad, whom at the first byunt they put to flight, and slew manie of them here and there as they took them at adventure. The Englishmen when night was come, and that the Welshmen withdrew to rest, assembled themselves againe together, and in the morning with new recovered force both of mind and bodie, came upon the Welshmen, and began with them a new battell, which continued the space of three houres together, till at length the Welshmen, which rathier had entred the fight, began to shrinke backe, and fled to their wonted places of refuge, the woods and marshes. Their chiefe captaine Dauid fled into Scotland, hauing lost in that battell the most part of all his souldiers which he had there with him. At his comming into Scotland, and whilst he there remained, he incited king Alexander against king Henrie to his uttermost powler, putting into his head how reprochfull the Englishmen did speake of the Scots, reproving them of cowardnes & lacke of sta-minth; also that they liued according to the prescript of the English nation, as subiects to the same: and manie other things he forged, which had bene able to hauemoued a most patient man into indignation and displeasure.

Finallie, either by the prouoking of this Dauid, or by some other occasion, king Alexander meant to make warres upon king Henrie indeed, and in raising an armie made a rode into England, and did some hurt by incursions, and further signified to king Henrie, as some write, that he neither ought nor would hold anie part or portion of Scotland of the king of England. King Henrie sore offended herewith, purposed in time to be reuenged, and hostlie after called a parliament at Westminister, in the which he earnestly moued the lords and other states to aid him with monie towards the furnishing of his coffers, being emptied (as they knew) by his credding charges in his last iourne into Gascoigne. He would not open his meaning which he had to make warre to the Scots, because he would haue his enterprise secretlie kept, till he should be readie to set forward.

But although the king had got the pope to write in his fauour vnto the lords both spirituall and tem-porall, to aid him in that his demand of monie, there was much adoe, and plaine deniall made at the first, to grant at that time to anie such payment as was demanded: and euen so they fell in hand with deuising new orders, and namelie to renew againe their suit for the confirmation of the ancient liberties of the realme, so as the same might be obserued, according to the grant thereof before made by the kings letters patents, without all fraud or contradiction.
They also appointed, that there should be foure lords chosen of the most puissant and discretest of all other within the realme, which should be sworn of the kings counsell, to order his businesse iustlie and trulie, and to see that euerie man had right without respect of persons. And these foure chiefe counsellors should be euer attending about the king, or at the least three or two of them: also that by the view, knowledge and witnesse of them, the kings treasure should be spent and laid forth, and that if one of them chanced to fall awaie, an other should be placed in his room by the appointment of the residue.

They would also that the lord chiefe iustice and the lord chancellour should be chosen by the generall voices of the states assembled, and because it was need-full that they should be oftentimes with the king, it was thought they might be chosen out of the number of those foure about rehearsed conseruators of iustice. And if the king at anie time chanced to take the seale from the lord chancellour, what former writing were sealed in the meane time should be of none effect. They aduised also, that there should be two iustices of the benches, two barons of the exchequer, and one iustice for the Jewes; and these for that present to be appointed by publicke voices of the states, that as they had to order all mens matters and businesse, so in their election the assents of all men might be had and giuen: and that afterwards, when upon anie occasion there should be anie elected into the rowne of anie of these iustices, the same should be appointed by one of the afore mentioned foure counsellors.

But as the Nobles were busie in these weekes space about the deuising of these ordinances and other, to haue bene decreed as statutes, the enemie of peace and sower of discord, the diuell, hindered all these things by the couetousnesse of the pope, who had sent his chapleine master Martin, with authoritie to le-ue also an aid of monie for his need to mainteine his wars withall against the emperor; and the emperor on the other part sent ambassadours to the king, to staie him and his people from granting anie such aid vnto the pope: so that there was no lesse hard-hold and difficultie shewed in refusing to contribute vnto this demand of the popes Nuncio, than vnto the kings. At length yet in another sitting, which was begun three weekes after Candlemasse, they agreed to giue the king escuage to run towards the marriage of his eldest daughter, of euerie knights fee holden of the king twentie shillings to be paid at two termes, the one halfe at Easter, and the other at Michelmasse.

After this, the king minding to inuade the Scots, caused the whole force of all such as ought to serue him in the wars to assemble, and so with a mightie host he went to new castell vpon Tine, meaning from thence to inuade the same, in reuenge of such injuries as the Scots had done vnto him and his subiects, and namelie, for that Walter Cumyn a mightie baron of Scotland and other noble men had built two castels nere to the English confines, the one in Calotwaie, and the other in Louthian, and further had receiued and succoured certeine rebels to the king of England, as Geoffrey de Harisch or Haris an Irish man, and others. The king of Scots was aduertised of king Henries appoich, and therefore in defense of himselfe and his countrie, had raised an huge armie. Whereupon certeine noble men vpon either side, soie to vnderstand that such bloodshed should chance as was like to follow (and that vpon no great apparant cause) if the two kings joined battell, toke paine in the matter to agree them, which in the end they brought to passe, so that they were made friends and wholie reconciled. There was a publicke instrument also made thereof by the king of Scots vnto king Henrie, signed with his seale, and likewise with the seales of other noble men, testifieng his allegiance which he ought to the king of England, as superior lord, in forme following.

This writing also was sent to the pope, that he might confirme the same in manner as followeth.

Our holie father in Christ I. by the grace of God, the highest bishop, Alexander by the same grace king of Scotland, earle Patrike, the earle of Stratheme, the earle of Leuenox, the earle of Angus, the earle of Mar, the earle of Athole, the

We doo signifie vnto your holiness, that we haue receiued a corporall oth before the reuerend father Otho, deacon cardinall of S. Nicholas in carcere Tulliano, legat to the see apostolike, in England, Scotland and Ireland, and haue made our charter or deed, which beginneth thus; Sciant presentes, &c. Which charter or deed indented and sealed, remaineth with the king of England, and with vs. Also another deed or writing that beginneth thus; Ad omnium vestrum notitiam volumus peruenire. Whereas therefore by the forme of our precedent deeds obligatorie, we haue submitted our selues to your iurisdiction, that you may bridle and restraine vs, and our heires by the ecclesiasticall censures, if at any time we go against the said peace.

And if it happen at any time, that any of vs all, or one of vs, shall fortune to presume rashlie and vnaduisedlie to go against it, or be about, or hereafter shall be about so to presume, and thereby may procure great perill as well to the foules of our owne selues, as of our heires, & no small danger may also be readie through the same our default to light vpon our bodies & goods, we beseech your holie fatherhood, that you will giue in commandement vnto some of the suffragans of the archbishop of Canturburie, that he doo compell vs and our heires vnto the obseruing of the same peace, accordinglie as in the instruments thereof more fullie is conteined, or else to order by your authoritie vpon the same peace, that which shall be agreeable to the canons, &c. And to the performance of this our petition, we haue to this present writing set our seales.

When all things were thoughtlie concluded, and order taken in what sort the assurances of this accord should passe, the king of Scots returned into the inner parts of his realme, and the king of England likewise returned to London. At the same time also, the Welshmen were verie buile: for hearing that the kings of England and Scotland were agreed, they doubted least all the burthen of the warre would be turned against them. Wherefore (as it were to prevent the matter) they began to waite the English confines. The king aduertised thereof, sent Hubert Fitz Pathew with three hundred knights or men of armes to defend the English marches against the

Thereupon when the Welshmen understood that the king had broken by his armie and was returned to London, they invaded their enemies, namelie the said earle of Hereford men and the Portimers, slea- ing and cutting in peeces two valiant and noble knights, and maiming the third, they slue and over- threw of the foribands about an hundred, so that all the English armie was disordered, and the Welsh- men with victorie returned to their places of refuge. Which when the foresaid Hubert Fitz Mattheu under- stood, the morrow after he made forth with his three hundred waged men of armes, in hope to hem in and take the Welshmen at advantage: but he was prevented and by them distressed, in so much that he was constrained with losse of men and horses to returne to his holds, and scarce could be suffered to remaine there in safetie. This yeare Rafe Speuill bi- shop of Cicester and chancellour of England depar- ted this life.

In the 29 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie hauing spent much treasure with the great preparation of wars which he had taken in hand against the Scots, and also because he was constrained to be at further charges for the Welsh wars, he called a parlement to begin on the third daie of Nouember, in the which he demanded a great reliefe of monie, but the same being generallie denied of all men, he exacted it in particular of the richer sort of his subiects, & amongst other he caused the citizens of London to giue unto him 15 hundred marks for a fine, because they had receiued a banished man, one Walter Bokerell into their citie, contrarie to the law and order: but this they denied, affirming that his brother had got his pardon, as by the kings owne letters patents they could proue, but they were answered, that the king was under age when these letters were purchased, and therefore were of none effect. About the same time, sir Nicholas de Holis or Hales seneschall of Gascoigne, hauing warres against the king of Na- uarre, got the victorie in battell. ¶ About the midd of Nouember, great thunder and lightning chanced, with a marvellous intemperat season for the space of 15 daies together, as a signe of some misfortune to succeed.

On S. Hughes daie died Margaret countesse of Penbroke the widow of Gilbert Barthall late earle of Penbroke, & sister to the king of Scots, and shortly after the bishop of Excester William de Beuwer likewise deceased, as yet being in his flourishing age, a man in manners, parentage, and knowledge right honorable, and highlie commended. ¶ On the daie of S. Marcellus was the queene deliuered of a man child, which at the font was named Edmund.

In Lent following nere to the castell of Mount- gomerie in Wales, three hundred Welshmen were slaine by them that lay in garrison there by a policie of the capteine, which faining a counterfeited flight, drew the Welshmen within danger of an ambush, which he had laid to surpise them into waies as it came euen to passe according to his deuise. David that took himselfe for king of Wales, coueting to be re- uenged of this displeasure, ceased not daie nor night to make incursions and to exploit enterprises to the damage of the marchers, the which valiantlie resisted the enemies, and drove them oftentimes into the mounteines, woods, bogs, and other places of refuge, and oftentimes the enemies hauing the advantage of place, did much displeasure to the Englishmen.

Upon a time as they (being got to the height of an hill, to cast downe stones and throw darts vpon the Englishmen that assailed them beneath) chanced a- mongst other to slea with a mightie stone (which they threw downe by the side of the hill) sir Hubert Fitz Mattheu a right ballant knight, and a man of great accompt for his knowledge and seruice in warres. Thus the wars continued betwene the parties, and oftentimes the Welshmen by the sudden inuasions got the better: their prince David comming to the castell of Spontault besieged it, and within a short time wan it, slaieng or taking all those whome he found within it. The owner thereof the lord Roger de Spontault by chance was not at home, which hap- pened well for him, where otherwise he had bene in great danger: but nere to the castell of Mountgo- merie, the Welshmen yet were edwards ouerthrowne and 200 of them slaine by an ambush that brake forth vpon their backs. About the middell of Lent the prelates of England were summoned to come to a generall counsell, the which pope Innocent had ap- pointed to be holden at the feast of S. John Baptist next following.

It chanced that about this time, a post comming from the pope with letters to his Nuncio maister Martin, containing instructions how he should pro- ceed for the gathering of monie, was staied at Dou- uer, by the practise of such noble men as were grie- ued to see anie such summes of monie to be conuied out of the realme in sort as was bled. He was had into the castell and his letters taken from him, where- in such secrets were contained for the getting of mo- nie, as ought not to haue bene reuealed. Maister Martin hearing that the post was thus staied and imprisoned, made a grievous complaint vnto the king, so that the post was set at libertie, had his let- ters to him restored, & so came vnto maister Martin, and deliuered them vnto him that he might under- stand the popes pleasure, which others to his grieve understood how as well as himselfe.

The king this yeare caused inquisition to be made through euerie countie within the realme, to under- stand the true valuation of all such benefices and spi- rituall promotions as were in the hands of anie in- cumbents that were strangers boine, and such as had bene preferred by the court of Rome, and the whole summe of all their reuenues was found to be sixtie thousand marks. On Whitsundaie the king made the earle of Glocester, Gilbert de Clare knight, and 40 other yong gentlemen that attended vpon him. And perceiving by the late inquisition what great reuenues the beneficed strangers had and possessed within the realme, and againe conside- ring the exceeding great summes of monie which the court of Rome had reconuered of his subiects, he be- gan to detest such couetous dealing. And hereupon a letter was deuised by the whole bodie of the realme, wherein were contained, the sundrie extorsions and manifold exactions of the popes legats, and other of his chapleines, which vnder colour of his authoritie they had used. There were appointed also to go with these letters vnto the generall counsell, certaine ho- nouable and discreet personages, as Roger Bigod earle of Northfolke, John Fitz Geoffrey, William de Cantloth, Philip Walter, and Rafe Fitz Nicho- las, with other, the which presenting the same letters vnto the said assemble, should declare the græce of the whole realme; and require some redresse and ease- ment therein.

Howeuer, it chanced that there was a great number of lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled together at Dunstable and Luton, to haue kept a martiall iusts, and triumphant toirne, but they had a countercommoement from the king, not to go forward with the same: whereupon, when they were disappointed disappointed of their purpose herein. Upon occasion of their being altogether, on the morrow after the feast of Peter & Paul, they sent from them Fouke Fitz Warren, to declare unto maister Martine the popes Nuncio, as then lodging at the temple in London, in name as it were of all the whole bodie of the realme, that he should immediatly depart out of the land. Fouke doing the message somewhat after a rough manner, maister Martine asked him what he was that gave forth the said commandement, or whether he spake it of himselfe or from some other. This commandement (saith Fouke) is sent to thee, from all those knights and men of armes which latelis were assembled together at Dunstable and Luton.

Maister Martine hearing this, got him to the court, and declaring to the king that message he had received, required to understand whether he was psonie to the matter, or that his people took it upon them so rashly without his authoritie or no? To whom the king answered, that he had not given them any authoritie so to command him out of the realme: but indeed (saith he) my barons doe scarselye so beare to rise against me, because I have mainteyned and suffered thy pilling and infamous polling within this my realme, and I have had much ado to saie them from running upon thee to pull thee in peeces. Maister Martine hearing these words, with a fearefull voice besought the king that he might for the loue of God, and reuerence of the pope, haue free passage out of the realme: to whom the king in great displeasure answered, The diuell that brought thee in carrie thee out, euen to the pit of hell for me. Wolbeist at length, when those that were about the king had pacified him, he appointed one of the marshals of his house, called Robert Joroth or Jorres, to conduct him to the sea side, and so he did, but not without great feare, lest he was afraid of euerie bush, lest men should haue risen upon him and murdered him. Whereupon, when he came to the pope, he made a greuous complaint, both against the king and others.

The church of saint Peter at Westminister was enlarged, and newlie repared by the king, speciallie all the east part of it, the old wals being pulled down, and builded up in moze comelie forme. The generall council, according to the summons giuen, was holden this yeare at Lyons, where it began about midsummer, in which the English ambassadors being arrived, presented to the pope their letters, directed from the whole bodie of the realme of England, requiring a redress in such things, therewith (as by the same letters it appeared) the realme found it selfe sore annoyed. The pope promised to take aduise therein, but with the matter was weightie, it required respit. Finally, when they were earnest in requiring a determinate answer, it was giuen them to understand, that they should not obtaine their desires, whereupon in great displeasure they came awaie, threatening and binding their words with oaths, that from thence, forth they would neuer paie, nor suffer to be paid, any tribute to the court of Rome, nor permit the revenues of those churches, whereof they were patrons, to be pulled awaie, by any prouision of the same court.

The pope hearing of these things, passed them ouer patientlie, but he procured the English bishops to set their scales unto that charter, which king John had made concerning the tribute, against the mind of the archbishop of Canturburie Stephan Langton, who at that time, when king John should seale it, spake sore against it. When king Henrie was informed herof, he was greuously offended; and swore in a great chafe, that although the bishops had done otherwise than they ought, yet would he stand in defense of the liberties of his realme, and would not so long as he had a day to liue, paie any dutie to the court of Rome, under the name of a tribute. In this meane while, the king with a puissant armie invaded the Welsh rebels, to reduce them to some quiet, whereas with their continual insurrections and other exploits, they had the barres barred, and wasted the lands of the kings subjects.

Hereupon the king being entred the countie, invaded the same, unto the confines of Snowdon, and there he began to build a strong castell at a place called Cannoke, remaining there about the space of ten weekes, during the which, the armie suffered great miserie through want of vittels and other prouisions namelie apparell, and other helps to defend themselves from cold, which sore afflicted the souldiers and men of warre, because they laie in the field, and winter as then began to approach. Moreover, they were bounden to keepe watch and ward verie strongly, for doubt to be surprised by sudden assaults of the enemies, the which watched upon occasion euer to do some mischiefe.

The morrow after the Purification of our ladie, Isabell de Boulber countesse of Drenford departed this life, and likewise the morrow after saint Valentines day died Balduino de Kluers earle of Devonshire and of the Wight. Moreover, Giffrey de March, a man sometime of great honour and possessions in Ireland, after he had remained long in exile, and suffered great miserie, ended the same by naturall death. Also Raimond earle of Rouance, father to the queenes of England and France deceased this yeare, for whom was kept in England a most solemn obsequie. Also in the weeke after Palmesundate, died a right noble baron, and warden of the north parts of England, the lord Gilbert Humfrenle, leaving behind him a yong sonne, the custodie of whom the king forthwith committed to the earle of Leicester, not without the indignation of the earle of Cornewall, who desired the same.

Finally, after that the king had liued at Cannoke about the fortifying of the castell there, the space of ten weekes, and saw the worke now fullie finished, he appointed forth such as should lie there in garrison, and therewith, on the morrow after the feast of Simon and Jude, he raised his field, and returned towards England, leaving the Welshmen in great miserie, and like to starue for want of necessarie food. For the Ile of Anglesey, which is as a nurse to the Welshmen, those Irishmen that came to the kings aid, had utterlie wasted and destroyed. Again, the king of purpose had consumed all the prouision of corne and vittels which remained in the marshes, so that in Cheshire, and other the parts adioining, there was such dearth, that the people scarce could get sufficient vittels to susteine themselves withall.

The king also gaue forth commandement, that no prouision of corne or vittels should be conueied unto the Welshmen, out of any parts, either of England or Ireland, on paine of forfeiting life, lands & goods. Moreover, he caused the hyne pits in Wales to be stopped up and destroyed. The king hauing thus ordered his businesse, returned into England, and shortly after, taking displeasure with the lord Spaurice, chiefe iustice of Ireland, because he had not made such speed as had bene conuenient in bringing the Irishmen to his aid, he discharged him of the office of chiefe iustice, and placed in his room John Fitz Giffrey. In this thirtieth yeare of king Henries reigne, Walter earle of Marshall and of Denbroke departed this life: and shortly after, to wit, three daies before Christmasse, his brother Anselme that succeeded him in the inheritance, deceased also without issue: and so all the fine sonnes of the great earle William Marshall, being departed this world with-

The king this yere held his Christmas at London, and had there with him a great number of the nobilitie of his realme, which had bene with him in Wales, that they might be partakers of pastime, mirth and pleasure, as they had bene participants with him in suffering the diseases of heat, cold, and other paines abroad in the fields and high mountaines of Wales, considering with himselfe (as the truth is) that

But that no pleasure should passe without some staine of greife, there was a rumor spread abroad, that the pope concluded fresh rankor in his stomach against the king and realme of England, for the complaints which had bene exhibited in the councill at Lion by the English orators, for the oppression done to the church of England: that thereupon, minding now to be reuenged, as was said, he earnestly moued the French king to make warre against the Englishmen and to subdue them vnder his dominion: which enterpryse the French king utterly refused, both for that he and the king of England were consens, and againe, because the king of France had no iust title or right to make claime to England.

Further, there was as then a truce betwixt England and France, and before that England could be subdued, much guiltlesse blood should be spilt. Also, the christians in the holie land were sore oppressed, and looked daile for the arrivall of the king of France, and therefore he would be loth to attempt any new enterpryse to hinder his iornie thither. But about the feast of the Epiphanie, other news came out of Prouance, that troubled the king of England worse than the other before, as thus, That the countesse Beatrice his wiues mother had deliuered up the countie of Prouance into the French kings hands, together with sixteen castles, which in right of the queene ought to haue remained vnto the king of England, for the safe keeping wherof to his vse, the said countesse Beatrice had receiued pærelie for the terme of five yeres last past, the summe of foure thousand marks of the king of England, and yet now in the deliuering of them, with the residue of the countrie vnto the French king, he neuer made any mention of his right.

Shortlie after also, Charles the French kings brother married the ladie Beatrice, yongest daughter of earle Raimond, and had with hir the same countie of Prouance, and so was intituled earle thereof, as in the French historie appeareth. Moreover, the archbishop of Canturburie procured a grant from the pope to recover for one yere the first fruits of all cures that chanced to be void within the citie, diocese, and prouance of Canturburie, by and during the tearme of leauen yeres then next following, till the summe of ten thousand marks were leuied, towards the discharge of the said archbishops debts. The collection of the which ten thousand marks was assigned by the popes bulles vnto the bishop of Hereford, who should also leaue two thousand marks of the revenues belonging to the church of Canturburie, to be conuerted to the same vse. The king at the first was sore offended herewith, but shortlie after, he was pacified and so the archbishop had his will.

After this, about the beginning of the next spring, Dauid prince of Wales departed this life, after great penitensence of mind, for the destruction and miserie into the which his countrie had bene brought through the present warres with the Englishmen.

After his deceasse, the Welshmen elected to succeed in his place, the sonne of Griffin, whom king Henrie had retained in seruice, and honourable vsed, euen of a child: but now that he heard that the Welshmen had elected him to their prince, he stole away, and fled into Wales. ¶ On the day of the purification of our ladie, a robberie was committed vpon certeine Jewes at Drenford, for the which fact, five and forty of the offenders were put in prison, but at the suit of Robert bishop of Lincoln, they were deliuered by the kings commandement, because no man impeached them of anie breach of peace, or other crime. The citizens of London also about the beginning of the spring, were compelled to paye a talage, wherewith they found themselves sore aggrieved.

About the middell of Lent, there was a parliament holden at London, wherein diuerse statutes and ordinances were deuised, as penalties for those that offended in other mens parks and warrens: but the chiefest occasion of assembling this parliament, was to take aduise in matters touching the græces wherewith the church of England seemed to be oppressed by the pope and the court of Rome. The pope indeed to quiet the English ambassadoys, and to put the king and realme in some good hope of release and deliuerance out of such oppressions, as were opened vnto him in the face of the whole councill, did not onelie promise largelie, but also caused diuerse priuileges to be made and deliuered vnto the said ambassadoys verie fanorable, in the behalfe of their request. But yet the same notwithstanding, with the breaking vp of the said generall councill, and return to the ambassadoys, manie things were done, to the increasing and continuation of the former græces, so that they stood in doubt of further oppressions to follow, rather than in hope of the promised redresse. Whereupon they concluded edicions to write vnto the pope, and to the cardinals, both in name of the king, of the bishops and prelates, of the earles, barons, and other estates of the tempoialtie, and of the abbats and priors. In the meane time, the pope for a while somewhat relented in the point of bestowing benefices here in England: for when any of his friends or kinsmen was to be preferred to any benefice, with in this realme, he would sue to the king for his grant and good will, that such a one might be admitted, and not some of himselfe to grant it without the kings consent.

The earle of Sarney in the presence of the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Hereford and others, did homage to the king of England, acknowledging to hold of him certeine fees, as those of Wuse, Auillian, S. Maurice de Chablais, and the castell of Ward, which he might well do, not preiudicing the right of the empire, sith he held nothing of the same empire, except Aignes and the passages. This yere, the office of the earle Marthall was giuen to Roger Wigod earle of Northfolke, in right of his wife the countesse, that was eldest daughter vnto the great earle William Marthall. ¶ Moreover, in this yere the king holding his Caster at London, honored Harold king of Span with the order of knight hood. About the same time, diuerse noble men of Wales submitted themselves, and were receiued vnto the kings peace. ¶ On saint Sparkes day was a great frost and snow, which nipped the leaues of trees and hearbes in such extreame wise, that for the more part they withered and faded away.

Furthermore, because the pope vnderstood, that diuerse rich beneficed men were of late dead in England intestate, as Robert Wailes the archdeacon of Lincoln, Almerike the archdeacon of Bedford, and John Botolpe archdeacon of Northampton, he ordained a decre, that all such spirituall persons sons as died intestate, their goods should remaine to the pope. The execution of which decrees, he commaunded to the friers preachers and minors: but the king would not suffer it to take place, because he sawe that it should rebound to the prejudice of him and his kingdom. Wherein the popes oppression and tyranny offered to the dead (by whose decesse their suffering friends should be benefited) and his cruell countenances extending to the verie senseles corpse doth manifestly appeare, so that it is verified of him, by waie of comparison,

Carnivorax tumidis ut gaudet hyana sepulchris, sic instat putridis ille cadaveribus.

Also, where the pope required a talage of the clergy, the king flatly forbade it by his letters inhibitorye.

In this meane while, William Botwis chapelaine, and sir Henrie de Lancere knight, which were sent with the second letters, deuisid in the late parlement (as you haue heard) to be preferred vnto the pope and cardinals, returned againe without obtaininge anye towardly answer, but rather (as they declared) they found the pope sharp and rough in speech, saying, The king of England which nowe kicketh against the church, & beginneth to plaie Frederiks part, hath his counsell, & so likewise haue I, which I intend to follow. After answer they could not obtayne. Againe, the Englishmen that were sutors in the court of Rome, were strangelye bled, and could not get anye dispatch in their businesse, but were rather put backe as schismatikes, and with rebukes reuiled. Hereupon the king called a parlement at Winchester, to haue the aduise of his lords in this matter, where howe soeuer they agreed, proclamation was immediatly set forth, and published in euery shire & countie throughout the realme, that no man should consent to the popes contribution, nor send anye monie out of the realme to his aid. When the pope heard of this, he wrote verie sharplye to the bishops, commanding them on paine of excommunication and suspension, to satisfie his Nuncio remaininge at the new temple in London, before the feast of the Assumption of our ladye. And whereas the king minded to haue stood in the matter through threats of his brother the earle of Cornewall, and of certayne prelates, namelye, the bishop of Worcester (who had authoritie as was said to interdict the land) he yielded and suffered the pope to haue his will, to the great grieve and discomfort of manie.

A foretempst of haile.

Isabell the kings mother departed this life.

Roger de Quince earle of Winchester.

John lord Beuil departed this life with diuers other.

Anno Reg. 31.

On S. Margarets daie, there fortun'd a marvellous foretempst of haile, raine, thunder and lightning, which beinge vniuersall through the realme, did much hurt, & continued the space of 15 houres together without ceasing. This yere, sundrie noble personages departed this world, as Isabell the kings mother, wife to the earle of March in Poitou. Also, the countesse of Albemarle, the daughter of Alaine of Galloway, and sister to the countesse of Winchester: whereupon, a great part of Galloway that belonged to hir (for that she died without issue) remained to Roger de Quince earle of Winchester, that married the eldest sister. Moreover, John lord Beuil died this yere, which had bene chiefe forester of England: but he was not onely put out of that office for certayne transgressions, but also out of the kings fauor before he died, where (at first) none was more esteemed in the court than he. The bishop of Salisbury, named master Robert de Argenton knight, a right noble personage, which in the holie land had shewed good proofe of his high valiantie, manhod, & prowesse: likewise sir Henrie Ballioll of the north, and diuerse other.

In the beginning of the one and thirtieth yere of king Henries reigne, the pope sent into England to haue the third part of one yeres profit of euery beneficed man that was resident, and of euery one not resident the one halfe. The bishop of London should haue sayde this aid and collection leuted, but it would not be granted. And in a parlement called this yere on the morrow after the Purification of our ladye, it was ordeined, that new letters sealed with the common seale of the citie of London should be sent by sufficient messengers, from all the estates of the realme, vnto the pope and cardinals, requirring a moderation to be had in such exactions as were intolerable for the realme to beate. Whilste this parlement yet lasted, there came ouer the lord Peter of Saxony earle of Richmond, bringinge with him certein young ladies and damels, to be bestowed in marriage on such young lords and gentlemen, as were wards to the king.

On S. Valentines euen, a great earthquake happened here in England, and namelye about London, on the Thames side, with the which manie buildings were ouerthrowen. These earthquakes, the seldomier they chance in England, the more dreadfull the same are, and thought to signifie some great alteration. A litle before this earthquake, the sea had creased from ebbing and flowing for the space of thre moneths together, by a long tract nere to the English shore, to the great maruill of many, for either it stood not at all, or else so litle that it might not be perceived. And after the earthquake, there followed such a season of foule weather, that the spring seemed to be changed into winter, for scarce was there anye daie without raine, till the feast of the translation of S. Venet.

There were at this time diuerse ordinaunces decreed and enacted by waie of prohibition, to restraints the authoritie of spirituall persons, as that no ecclesiasticall iudge should determine in causes of anye temporall man, except touching causes of matrimonie and testaments. They were also prohibited to sue anye actions touching tithes, before anye spirituall iudge, and the writ whereby they were prohibited, was called an Indicavit. Sundrie other such ordinaunces were deuised, which for breuifenesse we omit. What speed or answer to enen the messengers had that were sent to Rome with the letters deuised in the late parlement, truth it is, that the pope sent ouer into England such of his agents as gathered no small summe of monie amongst the cleergie, as one Marinus, and an other named Iohannes Anglicus a frier minor, the which were not intituled by the name of legats, to saue the priuileges which the king had, that no legat might come into the realme without his licence. The cominge ouer of these men, because it was to gather monie, contented not manie mens minds, as well appeared in a parlement called at Oxford about reformation thereof, but yet notwithstanding it was there agreed, that the pope should haue eleuen thousand marks to be leuted amongst them of the spiritualtie, exempt persons and places reserved.

About the same time, Baldwin naminge himselfe emperour of Constantinople, came againe into England, to procure some new aid of the king, towards the reconerie of his empire, out of the which he was expelled by the Grekes. Also, there arriued in England a cardinall that was bishop of Sabine, hauing first receiued an oth, that he came not for anye hurt to the king or his realme, for otherwise beinge a legat he might not be suffered to enter the land: he came this waie to passe ouer into Northwalie, whither he went to crowne and annoint Hacon king of that realme. There arriued here with him the thre halfe brethren to the king, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, & Athelmarc a prest, with their sister Alice. All these were begotten by Hugh

Hugh Ball earle of March, of quene Isabell the kings mother, and were therefore tofullie receiued of the king, with faithfull promise, that he would be to them a beneficiall god brother, which his salengs with effectuall deeds he after fullie performed. The cardinall hauing saluted the king, toke leaue of him and came to Lin, where he staied at the point of thre moneths, making such purchase amongst religious men, that what by procuraries and other shifts, he got as was thought, a foure thousand marks towards his charges, and so departed. Edmund Lacie earle of Lincoln, and Richard de Burgh, as then waites to the king, were married vnto two of those yong ladies of Honouance, which Peter de Sauoy earle of Richmond brought ouer with him, whereat manie of the English nobilitie grieved.

Also, about the thirtieth of August, the ladie Jone daughter to the lord Guarine de Bouchier, was married vnto William de Valence the kings halfe brother. The same ladie was heire to hir fathers lands, by the death of hir brother the sonne of the said lord Guarine. Sir William de Bueles knight a Norman boine, was made seneschall of Gascoigne about this season, and was sore vexed with wars by Gaston the sonne of the countesse of Biene and others, which Gaston shewed himselfe verie vnthankfull, for the king had giuen both to him and to his mother (a woman of a monstrous stature) verie large intertainment to serue him in his wars at his last being in that countrie (as before ye haue heard.) The archbishop of Cantuarburie suspended the priests of his prouince, because they would not consent (according to the grant which he had purchased of the pope) that he should haue the first fruits for one yeare, of euerie benefice that chanced to be vacant within the same prouince. The earles of Cornewall and Penbroke got much monie by waite of a collection, towards the reliefe of the warres in the holie land, hauing purchased of the pope certeine bulls of indulgence for the same. Sir Fouke de Newcastell a valiant knight, and cosen germane to the king on the mothers side died at London, during the time of the parlement.

On the thirtieth of October was a portion of the holie bloud of Christ (as it was then supposed) shewed in most reuerent wise in a solemne procession, for the king comming to the church of S. Paule in London, receiued there the same bloud contained in a chrysalline glasse, the which he bare vnder a canopie supported with foure staves, through the streets, vnto the abbey church of Westminster. His armes were also supported by two lords as aids to him all the waie as he went. The masters of the Templers and Hospitallers had sent this relike to the king. To describe the whole course and order of the procession and feast kept that daie, would require a speciall treatise. But this is not to be forgotten, that the same daie the bishop of Norwich preached before the king in commendation of that relike, pronouncing six yeares and one hundred and sixtene daies of pardon, graunted by the bishops there present, to all that came to reuerence it.

Also the same daie and in the same church, the king made his halfe brother William de Valence, and diuerse other yong bachelers, knights. Vnto the said William de Valence, for his further aduancement and maintenance, he gaue the castell of Hertford, and the hono: thereto belonging, with great treasure: & to the elder brother Guy de Lucignan, which about the same time returned into France, he gaue verie great and honorable gifts, lading his sumpters with plate and treasure of sterling monie, which in those daies in all countries was verie much esteemed. The he had faire possessions in right of his wife, was besieged of his owne tenants, within a castell wherein he lodged, and being in danger either to die through famine, or else at the discretion of the enemies, he burst forth, and making way with his sword, escaped, and comming to the king of Scots, complained of the iniurie done to him by his people, whereupon the king toke such order, that the rebels were punished, and the earle set in quiet possession of his lands againe.

Toward the latter end of Nouember, William earle Ferrers of Derby departed this life, a man of great yeares and long troubled with the gout, a tall man and a peaceable. The same moneth the countesse his wife died also, a woman of yeares vertue and fame like to hir husband: Thomas Becket the archbishop of Cantuarburie did minister the priests office at their marriage. Their eldest sonne William succeeded his father in the earledome, a good man and a discreet, but vexed with the gout verie pitifull, hauing that disease also as it were, by inheritance from his father. There died likewise other of the nobilitie, as Richard de Burgh, and William Fitz Ham. Beatrix the countesse of Honouance mother to the quene, and Thomas de Sauoy late earle of Flauers, came into England to visit the king and quene and were honorable receiued, and at their departure backe towards home, richlie rewarded. This yeare in the octaues of the Purification, a parlement was holden at London, where all the nobilitie of the realme in manner was present. There were nine bishops, as the archbishop of Yorke, with the bishops of Winchester, Lincoln, Norwich, Worcester, Chichester, Ely, Rochester and Carlisle, with the earls of Cornewall, Leicester, Winchester, Hereford, Northfolke, Oxford, Lincoln, Ferrers, and Warwike, with Peter de Sauoy earle of Richmond, besides lords and barons. The archbishop of Cantuarburie was at the court of Rome, & the bishop of Durhame was licted by sicknesse.

In this parlement king Henrie earnestlie required a subside, in reliefe of the great charges which he had diuerse waies sustained, whereupon he was freight waies by the peeres of the realme noted both of couetousnesse, vnthankfulnesse, and breach of promise, because he neuer ceased gathering of monie, without regard had to his people: and where he had promised manie things, as that he would not be burdensome vnto them, and such like; he had performed verie little of those his gale promises. Manie misdeemeanors, and wrongfull doings, to the greivance of his people were opened and laid before him, as charging and enriching of strangers, & using his prerogatives to largesse, to the great decaye & hinderance of the common wealth. The king abashed herewith, and supposing that the confession of his fault should make amends, & aswage the displeasure which his Nobles and other had conceiued at his misgouernance, to content them all with one answer, he promised that he would reforme all that was amisse, and so quietting the minds of his barons, the parlement was prorogued till the quindene of the nativite of S. John Baptist. Wherein his prudence and wisdom was to be commended, but his patience deserueth exceeding great praise, whereby he shewed himselfe princelike-minded, in that he could tolerate the exprobatation and casting of his faults in his face, euen by such as should rather haue concealed than disclosed them: whereas it had stood with his valour to haue giuen them the counterchecke, and in angrie mood to haue tamed their malapertnesse: but that he prouidentlie considered that

About the same time, by reason that the sterling monie was generallie so clipped, that the inscription was cut off for the most part euen to the inner circle, a proclamation was set forth, that no pices thereof should passe from one to an other, nor be receiued as currant and lawfull monie, except the same were of iust weight and fashion. Herewith also inquitie was made for those that had so defaced it, and sundrie Jewes bankers, and cloth-merchants of Flanders were found gilty. Also, the French king caused serch to be made within his realme for the same offenders, and such as were found gilty, were hanged, so that he was more seure in punishing those falsifiers of the king of Englands coine, than the king of England was himselfe.

The parlement began againe at the day appointed, but nothing to accompt of was then concluded, but rather a displeasure kindled betwixt the king and his barons, for that they looked for a reformation in his doings, and he for monie out of their coffers, which would not be granted, and so that parlement brake vp. The king hereupon for want of monie, was driven to so hard a shift, that he was constrained to sell his plate and Jewels (which the Londoners bought) so much to his hinderance, that diuers pices (the worth of them) was more worth than the value of the stuffe) were sold notwithstanding after the rate as they wiced.

This yeare, the king caused a faire to be kept at Westminster at saint Edwards tide, to indure for sixtene daies, and to the end that the same should be the more haunted with all manner of people, he commanded by proclamation, that all other faires, as Elie, and such like holden in that season, should not be kept, nor that any wares should be shewed within the citie of London, either in shop or without, but that such as would sell, should come for that time vnto Westminster: which was done, not without great trouble and paines to the citizens, which had not time there, but in booths and tents, to their great disquieting and disease, for want of necessarie provision, being turmoiled too pitifullie in mire and dirt, through occasion of raine that fell in that vnseasonable time of the yeare. The bishop of Elie complained fore of the wrong done to him by suspending his faire at Elie aforesaid.

Sir Richard Sward died this yeare, after he had lated a long time vexed with the palste, which sir Richard had in his daies bene a right worthie and famous knight. There died also the bishops of Bath and saint Davids. In the first day of June, the mone immediatly upon the setting of the sunne, was almost wholie eclipsed, so that little of his might appeared. The towne of Newcastle vpon Tyne was almost wholie consumed with fire, together with the bridge there. The archbishop of Canturburie remaining still with the pope by his procurator the deane of Beaufeis, denounced all them accursed which went about to impeach him of receiuing the first fruits of benefices that voided, which he had by the popes grant, the king and quene, with their children, and the kings brother the earle of Cornewall onclie excepted out of that curse.

There chanced another earthquake foure daies before Christmasse, namelie in the west countie about Bath and Welles, which shoke and ouerthrew some buildings, speciallie the tops and summets of steeples, turrets and chimnies were shaken therewith, and not the bases or lower parts. ¶ In Christmasse following, the earle of Leicester returned out of Calcoigne, where he had bene as generall against Galfon de Biene, whom he had so afflicted and put to the worse, that the same Galfon was glad to sue for an abstinence of warre, where before he had done much hurt to the kings subiects. The said earle had also with the aid of the kings subiects apprehended an other rebell, one William Berthram de Egremont who had done much hurt in the parts of Calcoigne, and in the confines there, whom he had left in prison within the castell of the Rioll.

This yeare a little before Candlemas, the bishop of Durham being a man of great yeares, by licence obtained of the pope, resigned his miter, reseruing to himselfe onelie thre manors, Houeden with the appurtenances, Stoddon and Guerington. The king hauing the last yeare receiued of his subiects a deniall of a generall subsidie to be granted him, praished this yeare to get some reliefe at their hands, in calling each of them apart: but first he got two thousand marks of the citie of London, and after sell in hand with the abbats and priors, of whom he got somewhat, though sore against their willes. By occasion of two merchant strangers of Babant, which chanced to be robbed about the parts of Winchester, whilst the king was there, upon their importunate suit and complaint, there was a great nest of theues broken, amongst the which were manie wealthie persons and freeholders, such as used to passe on life and death of their owne companions, to whom they were fauourable inough you may be sure: also, there were some of the kings seruants amongst them. About thirtie of those offenders were apprehended, and put to execution, besides those that escaped, some into sanctuarie, and some into voluntarie exile, running out of and utterlie forsaking the countie.

About Easter, the archbishop of Rone came ouer into England, and doing homage for such reuenues as belonged to his church here within this realme, had the same restored vnto him. In June there fell such abundance of raine, speciallie about Abington, that the willow trees, milles, and other houses standing nere to the water side, were boine downe and ouerturned, with one chapell also: and the coine in the field was so beaten to the ground, that bread made thereof after it was ripe, turned as it had bene made of bran.

About the same time, William de Longespée earle of Salisburie, and Robert de Wier, with other Englishmen, to the number of two hundred knights, hauing taken on them the crosse, went into the holie land, the said earle being their cheefe capteine, and had so prosperous speed in their iourne, that they arrived safe and sound in the christian armie, where (the French king being cheefe thereof) they were receiued ioyfullie. But yet (as Matthew Paris writeth) the pride and disdain of the Frenchmen was so great, that vpon spite and enuie conceiued at the Englishmens glozie, which bare themselves right worthilie, the Frenchmen vied the Englishmen nothing frendlie; namelie the earle of Acras stiked not to speake manie reprochfull words against the said William de Longespée and his people, whereat they could not but take great indignation.

Also the same season, the earle of Leicester, who had likewise receiued the crosse, deferred his iourne for a time, and sailing into Calcoigne, nightlie there subdued the kings enemies, as Galfon de Biene, also one Kuffeine, and William de Solares. This yeare died Peter de Geneure, a Breuanois borne, whom the king had preferred in marriage vnto the ladie Maud, daughter and heire of Walter Lacie a man of faire possessions in Ireland. Of which marriage there came issue a sonne and a daughter. Also about Whitsuntide died a noble baron of the north

About the same time, the countesse of Cornewall at Berkehamsted was deliuered of a sonne named Edmund. This yeare about the beginning of the spring, the kings brother the earle of Cornewall with other Noble men of the realme, as the earle of Glocester, Henrie Hastings baron, & Roger Turkebie, went ouer into France in princelie arrate and furniture to visit the pope, who held his court still at the cite of Lions. The bishop of Lincoln also and the bishop of Worcester went thither. For that cause the other went, it was not openlie knowe. But the bishop of Lincoln went thither about such businesse as he had in hand against the Templers, Hospitallers, and such other which had appealed from him to the court of Rome, where he could not bring his purpose to passe, for his aduersaries with morie had purchased the iudges fauour. parts, named the lord Roger Fitz John, whose sonne and heire being yong, was giuen in wardship to William de Valence the kings halfe brother. Also this yeare Hugh earle of March, father to the same William de Valence died in Cyprus, whilst the French armie wintered there, as then going into the holic land.

In the feast of All saints, the archbishop Bonifacius was inthronized at Canturburie, and kept a solenne feast, at the which the king and queene, with the more part of all the prelates of the land were present. About this season was a great toynie and iusts holden at Wackley, wher the earle of Glocester (contrarie to his accustomed maner) fauoured the part of the strangers, wherby they preuailed. In somuch that William de Valence handled one sir William de Windingelles verie roughlie, the same sir William being a right towzthie knight. About the same time, the countesse of Cornewall at Berkehamsted was deliuered of a sonne named Edmund. This yeare about the beginning of the spring, the kings brother the earle of Cornewall with other Noble men of the realme, as the earle of Glocester, Henrie Hastings baron, & Roger Turkebie, went ouer into France in princelie arrate and furniture to visit the pope, who held his court still at the cite of Lions. The bishop of Lincoln also and the bishop of Worcester went thither. For that cause the other went, it was not openlie knowe. But the bishop of Lincoln went thither about such businesse as he had in hand against the Templers, Hospitallers, and such other which had appealed from him to the court of Rome, where he could not bring his purpose to passe, for his aduersaries with morie had purchased the iudges fauour. And so the bishop returned, hauing spent his trauell and monie in vaine.

On the 6 of March being sundae, the king took upon him the crosse, with his brother de Valence, and a great number of other Noble men, and amongst other the abbat of Burie, to the pcurdise (as was thought) of his order. Roger de Montgomerie, a baron of great honour, meaning berlie to go in that iourne, to recover monie towarde his necessarie furniture, set and sold the most part of his liuinges. His woods and possessions, which he had about Countreie, he sold and let to fee farme vnto the count there. The like chieuanee was made by sundrie noble men, which prepared themselves to go in that iourne.

Upon the 27 day of April those that had taken on them the crosse, assembled at Bermondsey besides London, to treat of their setting forward, determining that the same should be at Midsummer next: but by the popes letters which the king procured, they were commanded to staie till the king himselfe went. Thus their iourne for that time was disapointed. There was of them and their retinues that meant thus to haue gone, five hundred knights, besides yeomen or demilances and other common soldiers in great numbers. Gaston de Biernie was so diuinen to his shifts by the high prowesse of the earle of Leicester, that in the end he was constrained to come ouer into England, and submit himselfe to the king, whom he found at Clarendon, where he gat such mercie at the kings hands, that he was pardoned and restored to his lands. But the earle of Leicester put the king in possession of the castles of Fronfacke, Egremount, and others, and banished Rastain, and William de Solares, with diuerse other subbozne and disoiall rebels, depriving them of their lands and inheritance in that countreie.

The bishop of Lincoln did excommunicat a prest within his diocese, that was accused of incontinencie. And because the same prest continued for tie daies without seeking to be reconciled, the bishop sent to the shiriffe of Rutland, within whose bailiwick the same prest dwelled, to apprehend him as a disobedient and rebellious person: but the shiriffe winked at the matter, and would not execute the bishops commandement, whereupon the bishop did also excommunicat the shiriffe: whereof the king being informed, took displeasure, and sending to the pope, procured an inhibition, that no archbishop nor bishop should compell anie officer belonging to the king, to follow anie suit afoze them, for those things that appertained to the kings iurisdiction, or giue sentence against them for the same.

The mondaie before the Rogation weeke, Richard the kings brother earle of Cornewall, returned from the court of Rome, where he had bene about certeine businesse vnknoone to most men: but whatsoeuer the same was, the pope gaue him most courteous and honorable interteinement for his welcome, and made him great cheare during his abode at Lions, where the popes court as then laie. ¶ About this season, the king to rid himselfe out of debt, wherein he was endangered to certeine merchants, lessened the charges of his household, and kept but a meane port, diminishing euen the accustomed almesse of the pope, and also the great number of tapers and lights in his chappell, so that he was noted with the blame of too much niggardie sparing and pinching: but in that he discharged his debt to the merchants, he was thought to doe wiselie and charitablie, for that he would not see them hindered to whom he was so indebted: besides the opinion that he had concerning himselfe, namelie that Profectum faciunt rariū quos debita stringunt.

About the same time also, he caused the Jewes to giue vnto him a great portion of their goods, so that they were greatlie impouerished. There was one of them named Aaron bozne in Porke, the which since the kings last retorne out of Gascoigne, had paid to the king the summe of thirtie thousand markes, ouer and besides two hundred markes which he had giuen to the queene, as the same Aaron protested to Matthew Paris, vpon his faith and truth which he bare to his law. In the Whitsuntweke was a generall chapter holden of the friers preachers at London in Holbozne, where out of sundrie parts of the world were assembled about foure hundred of them, and they had meat and drinke found them of almesse, because they possessed nothing of their owne. On the first daie the king came into their chapter, that he might be partaker of their prayers, and found them meat and drinke that day, and dined there with them, to doe them the more honour. Another day the queene likewise fed them, and afterwards the bishop of London, the abbats of Westminster, S. Albion, and Chatham, with others.

About the same season the citizens of London found themselves greued verie soze, for such liberties as the king granted to the abbat of Westminster, to the great hinderance and decaie of the franchises of their citie. The maiors and communalitie resisted all that they might against those liberties, and finally by the god helpe and fauour of the lords, as the earles of Cornewall and Leicester, they obtained their purpose. This yeare maister William de Baskenne, a sober, faithfull and learned man, was made keeper of the great seale. ¶ The same yeare vpon inquisition made by Cestrey de Langley, one of the kings counsell of transgressors in forests and chases, manie that had offended were presented, and most greuouslie punished by imprisonment, fines, and exceeding great amercements, and namelie in the north countreie.

On the nineteenth of Maie died Robert de Lexington cleark, the which hauing continued a long time time in the office of a iudge, purchased to himselfe great fame, and also most large possessions. But cer- teine yeeres before his death, because he was diseased with the pallie, he gaue ouer that office, and dyed himselfe into a quiet trade of life, so ending his daies in praiers and doing of almesdeeds. About the feast of S. Margaret died Henrie Hastings a noble baron, and one Robert de Gulchampe a man of great renowne in the north parts. Also Walter bishop of Winchester departed this life, about the feast of S. Mattheu, in whose place (through the kings earnest suit) his halfe brother Athelmarle was promoted to succeed. Moreover, in the east parts, that ballant erle of Salisbury William de Longespæ, with Robert de Cler, and others, was slaine in that unfortunate battell in the which the Saracens vanquished the christian armie, and toke Lewes the French king prisoner.

On the first day of October, the mone upon his change, appearing exceeding red and swelled, began to shew tokens of the great tempest of wind that followed, which was so huge and mightie, both by land & sea, that the like had not bene lightlie knowne, and sildome or rather neuer heard of by men then a lue. The sea forced contrarie to his naturall course, flowed twice without ebbing, yelding such a roaring noise, that the same was heard (not without great wonder) a farr distance from the shore. Moreover, the same sea appeared in the darke of the night to burne, as it had ben on fire, and the waues to strive and fight together after a maruellous sort, so that the mariners could not deuise how to saue their ships where they laie at anchor, by no cunning nor thift which they could deuise. At Hertburne thre tall ships perished without recoverie, besides other smaller vessels. At Winchelsey, besides other hurt that was done in brydges, milles, breakes and banks, there were thre hundred houses, and some churches drow- ned with the high rising of the water course. The countrie of Holland beyond the sea, and the marish land in Flanders, sustained inestimable damage, and in manie other places; by reason that riuers beate backe and repelled (by the rising of the sea) swelled so high that they ouerdrowed their chanelles, and much hurt was done in medowes, brydges, milles, and houses.

About the beginning of the fise and thirtieth yeare of king Henries reigne, the bishops of England, vnderstanding that the archbishop of Cantuarburie was about to purchase of the pope a grant to gather monie through his whole prouince of the cleargie and people for synods and p[ro]curacies, they thought to p[re]uent him, and therefore made a collection euerie one through his owne diocesse, of two pence in cuc- rie marke which any beneficed man might dispend, which monie so collected, they ment to imploye about charges in the popes court, for the staie of the archb[ishop]s suit, that the grant should not passe.

About the same time, to wit, vpon saint Lucies day, there was a great earthquake at S. Albons, and in the parts thereabouts with a noise vnder the ground, as though it had thundred. This was strange and maruellous, because the ground there is chalkie and sound, not hollow nor loose, as those places be where earthquakes for the most part happen. Doves, rakes, and other birds that sat vpon houses, and in boughes of trees fearing this strange wonder, flied vp, and flew to and fro, shewing a token of feare as if a goshauke had bene ouer their heads. The pope required by solenne messengers sent to the king of England, that he might come to the citie of Burdeaur in Gascoigne, & there for a time remaine. The king wist not well what answer to make, for loth he was to denie arie thing that the pope should require, and againe he was not willing for sundrie respects, that the pope should come so neere vnto him. Indeed, manie were in doubt, least if he came to Burdeaur, he would also come into England, and rather impaire the staie thereof than amend it by his presence, sith by such vsurers and licentious li- uers as belonged to him, the realme had already bene soe corrupted. Howsoever the matter went, there was delaie and such means deuised and made, that the pope came not there at that time.

On Christmasse day in the night, great thunder and lightning chanced in Northfolke and Suffolke past measure, in token as was thought of some euill to follow. The king kept his Christmasse at Win- cheser, but without any great port or liberalitie, for hospitalitie with him was greatlie laid aside. About this time, Guy de Lusignan the kings halfe brother came ouer into England, after his retourne out of the holie land, and was of the king iustillie receiued. To- wards the release of his expences made in that iour- nie, the king gaue him five hundred pounds which he got of the Jewes. Moreover, he gaue to his brother, Cestrey the custodie of the baron Hastings lands, and so by such liberall and bounteous gifts as he be- stowed on them and other strangers, he greatlie incurred the hatred of his naturall people the Eng- lishmen.

On the day of the Epiphanie, the earle of Leice- ster came to the king in great hast out of Gascoigne giuing him to vnderstand, that the Gascoignes were revolted in such number, that if speedie succour were not prouided, the whole countrie would fall from the English subiection. Whereupon the king furnished him with monie, and the earle himselfe got all that he could make of his owne reuenues, and likewise of the Amfrenilles lands, the heire whereof he had in custodie. He made no long abode, but with all speed returned, and reteined two hundred Ritters out of the duke of Babants countries, and with them cer- teine crossbowes. These were eger souldiers, and bloudie, but yet the Gascoignes prepared themselves to resist them all that they might: howbeit the earle put them still to the worse. Before his last retourne from thence, he had rased the castell of Fronfacke flat with the ground, and likewise left desolate the castell of Egremount.

About this season, one of the kings iustices named Henrie de Bath fell in the kings displeasure, because he was accused that he had not exercised his office vprightlie, but to his owne priuat gaine, and peruer- ted iustice through bribes, vpon occasion of a suit moued betwixt him and one Guerard de Trum- pington: he was appealed of falshood and treason by Sir Phillip Marcie knight. His wife was of kin to the Walleys and Samfords, the which procured him great friendship at the hands of the earle of Corne- wall, and of John Mansell, and other of the kings counsell. But for all that they could do, he was in great danger to haue lost his life at the parlement holden that yeare, and begun on the sixteenth day of february. For the king was so sore moued against him, that he caused proclamation to be made, that if any man had any thing to laie against the said Hen- rie de Bath, they should come forth, and their infor- mation should be heard. Whereupon diuerse came and presented their complaints, and amongst other, one of his owne fellows, that was a iustice also, decla- red that he had suffered an offendour commit, to escape unpunished, for a bribe, which he receiued to the p[re]- iudice of the king, and the danger of his associates the other iustices, whereas it is required of one pnt in trust with the administration of lawes, to be incor- rupt and sound in iudgement, according to this true position,

The king herewith rose up in a great fume, and said openlie: If any man will sea Henrie of Bath, he shall not be impeached for his death: for I do here plainlie declare him acquit and guiltlesse for the same. Wherewith diuers would haue run upon him to haue murdered him, but that John Spanfell staied their outrage, shewing them that the king might well hereafter repent the words which he speake thus in his furie, and those that should do any violence vnto the man, were not like to escape punishment: for both the bishop of London would sue lie accorde them, and other of his friends would not faile to seeke reuenge by temporall force: and thus was Henrie of Bath in the kings high displeasure for the time. Howbeit at length, through intercession of the earle of Cornewall, and the bishop of London, he was put to his fine, and pardoned.

Henrie de Bath put to his fine.

Bishp of Winchester confirmed bishop of Winchester by the pope, although he was thought scarce sufficient to haue the place, for lacke of learning and ripe yeares. About this time also, the bishops assembling at Dunstable, tooke aduise together, how to prevent the archbishop of Canturburie, that he should not visit: and in the end they concluded to send their procurator vnto the court of Rome, to trie what purchase might be made there for monie to staie the licence, and not to sticke for the disbursing of foure thousand marks, if need required. Their procurator did so much in the matter, that he found the pope sauourable vnto his cause, though no determinate answer was given of a long time, till at length, to gratifie the archbishop and his kin, as the duke of Banop and other, the pope granted him licence to visit, but not generallie: for he might not visit anie parish church, except the person required him thereto. And whereas he had libertie to visit conuentuall churches, yet might he not receive for procuracies about foure marks. For this moderation to be had, the procurator for the bishops gaue vnto the pope six thousand marks.

Six thousand marks given to the pope.

The bishop of Lincoln visited the religious houses within his diocese, to vnderstand what rule was kept amongst them, vnder the matter somewhat friuolous (as they thought): for he entred into the chambers of the monks & searched their beds. And coming to the houses of the nuns, he went to nare as to cause their byasses to be tried, that he might vnderstand of their chast linings. In Lent following he was suspended by the pope, because he would not suffer an Italian that had no skill of the English tong to inioy a prebend in his church, which the pope had given to the same Italian. In this season, Wales was brought to be subiect vnto the English lawes, and that part which ioined to Cheshire, was committed to the custodie of Alain lord Zouch, the which gaue, for hauing of the profits thereof to ferme, a hundred marks, and supplanted lord John Craie which should haue had it for five hundred. Certaine visitors and strangers borne called Caorini, had bought faire houses at London, and so remained there as inhabitants, occupieng their trade without controulment, for the prelates durst not speake against them, because they alleged themselves to be the merchants of the popes highnesse: and the citizens durst not trouble them because they were defended by certaine noble men, whose monie (as was said) they occupied, to game after the manner of the court of Rome. Howbeit at length they were called before the ciuill magistrats by the kings procurement, and grieuousely accused for their vnlawfull occupieng of vsurie, and some of them committed to prison, the residue hid themselves out of the way, till at length for a summe of monie they were licenced to be at rest, and so continued for a season. The Jewes resorted heretofore to haue fellows with them in their traffike.

In this season also there depended a controuersie betwixt the archbishop of Canturburie with the bishop of London and his canons of Paules: so that the said bishop of London & the deane of Paules, and other of the canons were excommunicated. But the bishop perceiving which way the world went, reconciled himselfe: as for the deane, he stood long in the matter, & at length went himselfe to the pope to bitter his greefe. This controuersie hanged long betwixt them, and was handled in such wise, that laie-men laughed at their doings, for now and then when the pope commanded to be absolved, their aduersaries by colour of the popes authoritie would command to be excommunicated. The first day of Julie the earle of Leicester in Gascoigne ouercame manie of the kings enemies, and took from them a fortresse called Chatellon.

On S. Dunstons day there was a marvellous sore tempest of weather, the aire being darkened on euerie side from the foure corners thereof, and withall chanced such a thunder as few the like had bene heard of. First it began as it had bene a great way off, but after it burst out with such terrible crackes as was wonderfull. But one amongst the rest crecided, and withall such lightening flashed forth, as put men in great feare and terror. The chimney of the chamber, wherein the queene and hir children then were, was beaten downe to dust, and the whole building sore shaken. This was at Windsoxe, where in the parke, oaks were rent in funder, and turned up by the roots, and much hurt done; as milles with the millers in them, thepolds with their shepheardes, and plowmen, and such as were going by the way were destroyed and beaten downe. About the same time the sea on the coasts of England arose with higher tides than the naturall course gaue, by the space of six feet.

About Michaelmasse queene Dowager of Scotland, that was daughter to Monsieur de Cousie a Frenchman, came through England to returne into France where she was borne, and was of the king honorable receiued and welcomed. This yeare the nunne of Marton not far from L. in was founded by the ladie Isabell countesse of Arundell. Also this yeare the lord William de Cantlow departed this life, in whose heritage his son also named William succeeded. Also Roger, John Cobham & Geoffrey Spenser (that was a man of great fame, and one of the kings counsell) departed this life, Cobham before Easter, and Spenser shortly after the same feast. Also in the octaues of Pentecost, Paule Pictur o: Peure departed this life, he was one of the kings chiefe counsellors, and lord steward of his house. This man at the first was not borne to anie great possessions, but by purchase attained to great reuenues. The ladie Jone his wife compounded with the king for the marriage of hir son named Paule, after his father, but the lord John Craie paid the monie, being five hundred marks, and so discharging hir of that debt, married hir some to one of his daughters at his mano: of Citon, and afterwards at London married the mother of his sonne in law, where with the king was sore displeased, for he had giuen the marriage of hir vnto a stranger, one Stephan de Salines, so that the lord Craie was glad to giue to the king the summe of fiftie marks, by way of a fine to haue his good will.

queene, and almost all the Nobilitie of England, both fpiritual and temporal. The building of that church, all charges accounted, flood the earle in ten thousand marks, as he himfelfe confefled unto Matthew Paris. ¶ About the fame time the earle of Leicester and Guie de Luffignan the kings halfe brother came into England out of France, and landed at Dover, whome the king received with great ioy and gladneffe. He gaue to his brother at his returne great rewards, as he was euer accuftomed. In the feaft of the Conception of our ladie at a iuftes holden at Rocheftre, the strangers were put to the toffe, and well beaten by the Englifh batchlers and men of armes, fo that the difhonour which they did to the Englifhmen at Bakley was now recompensed with intereft. For the strangers fleeing to the citie for fuccour, were met by the way by the Englifh knights feruants and peomen, which fell upon them, beat them fore with clubs and ftaues, and handled them verie euill. Hereof fprang a great hatred betwixt the Englifhmen and strangers, which daile grew and increafed more and more, the rather becaufe the king had them in fo good eftimation, and retained fo manie of them within the realme.

The king did celebrate the feaft of Chriftmasfe at Forke, whither came Alexander the yong king of Scots, and was there made knight by the king of England, and on faint Stephens day he married the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of England, according to the affurance before time concluded. There was a great affembly of noble perfonages at that feaft. The queene Dowager of Scotland mother to king Alexander, a French woman of the houle of Coucie, had paffed the fea, & was prefent there with a faire companie of lords and gentlemen. The number of knights that were come thither on the king of Englands part were reckoned to be at the point of one thousand. The king of Scots had with him three fcore knights, and a great fort of other gentlemen comparable to knights. The king of Scots did homage to the king of England at that time for the realme of Scotland, and all things were done with great loue and fauour, although at the beginning fome ftrife was kindled about taking bp of lodgings.

This affembly of the princes coft the archbifhop verie de relie, in feafting and banquetting them and their traines. At one dinner it was reported he fpent at the firft courfe three fcore fat oren. ¶ At request of the K. of Scots, the K. of England received Philip Lunell againe into fauour, or rather Louell (as I take it) one of his counsell, againft whome he had conceived difpleafure in the yeare laft paff, for fuch byberie as he was thought to be guiltie of for the yong fauour to the Jewes. The king of Scots when he fhould depart, took his leaue in moft courteous manner, and led with him his new married wife, on whome attended fir Robert Hoze knight marfhall of the kings houle, and fir Stephen Waulan, and alfo the ladie Walow, the widowe of the lord William Cantlow, with others. On the octaues of the Epiphanie chanced an exceeding great wind, which did much hurt in diuerfe places of the realme. The bifhop of Rocheftre returning fro the court of Rome, brought with him a bull, authorifing him to receiue to his owne ufe the fixt part of the reuenues of all the beneficed men within his diocelle.

In this meane while the earle of Leicester remained in England, the Gallognes made fore warre againft fuch as he had left behind him, and withall gaue information to the king that the earle of Leicester was a traitor, and one that had fpoyled the kings fubiects: and furthermore by his vntruff dealings had giuen to the Gallognes caufe of rebellion. The king to bould out the truth of this matter, fent firft his chapleine Henrie Wingham, and afterwards fir Nicholas de Poles de Valence, as commiffioners to inquire of the earles doing, who went and returned without finding any manifelt crime in the earles demeanour. The earle was much offended that his innocencie fhould be thus fufpected; but at length being appointed to returne into Galcoigne, he obetied and hauing a great fomme of monie, he retained a power of men of warre, as well Frenchmen as others, and meaning to be reuenged of thofe that had giuen the information againft him, he ftrengthened himfelfe with the aid of the king of Nauarre, and of the earle of Wigore and other, fo that he oppreffed his aduerfaries on eche hand, and fo abated their pride, that if conuenientlie they might, they would haue paffed themfelves to fome other prince, and vtterlie haue renounced the K. of England for euer. Whereby it fhould feeme that he was thoughtlie reuenged of them euen to their no fmall fmart, not in word and theating, but with fword and bloud-fhedding, defending his innocencie, and manfullie fhewing his warlike mind. But yet he had purchafed to himfelfe a greater portion of praife, if he had not with weapen but with wife dome made a conqueft of the enimie: according to this found counsell of a fage wyiter;

On the thirteenth day of March, the new mone was feene, whereas the yime change by naturall courfe fhould not haue bene till the firteenth day following; and for the fpace of fixtene daies that then next infued, the funne, the mone, and ftarres appeared of a red colour. And herewith the whole face of the earth feemed as it had bene fhadowed with a thicke mift or fmoke, the wind notwithstanding remaining north and northeaft. Then began a fore drought, continuing a long time, the which together with morning frofts, and northerlie winds, deftroyed the fruits and other growing things, which were blafted in fuch wife, that although at the firft it was a verie forward yeare, and great plentie towards of corne and fruit, yet by the means aforefaid, the fame was greatlie hindered and fpeciallie in the fummer feafon, when the funnes heat increafed, and the drought ftill continued.

And becaufe of the exceeding hot nights, there was fuch abundance of fleas, flies, and gnats, that people were vexed and brought in cafe to be wearie of their lues. And herewith chanced manie difeafes, as sweats, agues, and other. In the harueft time fell there a great death and murren amongst cattell, and fpeciallie in Northfolke, in the fens and other parts of the fouth. The bishop of Lincolne.

The bishop of Lincolne would have enforced all the beneficed men within his diocesse to be priests, but they purchased a licence from Rome, to remaine at the Universities for certeine yeares, without taking the order of priesthood upon them. ¶ The king meaning to go (as he pretended) into the holie land, had grant of the pope to leuie a tenth of his subjects both spirituall and temporall. The Gascoignes fore repining at the earle of Leicester his streit gouernance (who handled them more roughlie than they had bene accustomed) sent the archbishop of Burdeaur ouer into England to exhibit a complaint against him in all their names. The earle of Leicester aduertised thereof, followed him, and coming to the court, found the archbishop ready to aduouch the information which he had made against the said earle, chesellie in that he had sought the destruction of those to whom the earle of Cornewall when he was ruler there, had granted life and peace, and whom sir Henrie Trumbleuile, and Maleran the Dutchman, late stewards of Gascoigne, vnder the king, had cherished and mainteined. With manie other things the archbishop charged him, the which the earle wittilie refelied and dispmoued, so as he was allowed in his iustificacion by those that stood by, as the earle of Cornewall and others.

The earle dispmoueth the allegations of his accusers.

The bishop of Lincolne authorized to institute vicars in churches inappropriate.

The bishop of Lincolne got authoritie of the pope to institute vicarages in churches inappropriate to religious men, where no vicars were; and where such were as seemed to slenderlie provided of sufficient allowance, to augment the same as he thought expedient: which his authoritie he used more largelie than stood with the pleasure of religious persons, because he shewed great fauour to the vicars. The copie of the letters which the bishop had procured of the pope, authorizing him herein, followeth as we find the same in the chronicles of Matthew Paris.

The earle of Leicester sent shewes into Gascoigne.

The earle of Leicester was effrones sent into Gascoigne by the king, who had not cared if he had fallen into his enemies hands, as should appeare. But the earle hired souldiers in France, and comming into Gascoigne, preuailed against his enemies, though in one conflict he was in danger of losing both life and the honour of the field. But yet through his good hap, Gods fauour, and the balliance of himselfe and some of his retinue, he got the upper hand, and put his enemies to flight, taking Ruffeine, one of the chiefe ring-leaders, whom he caused to be presented to the king. At the same time had the king inuested his son Edward with the duchie of Aquitaine to the offense of the earle of Cornewall, to whom by charter he had before giuen and confirmed the same. In a iusts holden at Malben, sir Arnold de Sponteinis a right valiant knight was slaine by sir Roger de Lemboigne, for which mischance all the Nobles there assembled made great lamentation, and namelie the said sir Roger: but yet he was suspected to be in blame, because the socket of his staffe was polished, & not abated. Hereby it should appeare, that in qualitie of weapon, and not in manner of their running together, these iusts and toornies in those daies practised differed from the verie order of warre.

The 17 of September the cathedrall church of Ely was dedicated, which the bishop of that see named Hugh had builded of his owne proper costs and charges, together with the palace there. The king and a great number of the pères & nobles of the realme both spirituall and temporall were present at this solemn feast, which was kept in most plentiful manner. The 13 day of October, the king held a great feast at London, and had called the states of the realme, then and there to assemble in parlement, wherein he opened to them the popes grant, which he had obtained of the tenths due to the church, to be received by him for three yeares, towards his charges in his iournie which he meant to make into the holie land. The bishops, and namelie Lincolne, bitterlie refused to be contributarie to his grant.

Parlement.

The king to mandrich the tenths of the spirituall.

They alledged sundrie reasons for their excuse, as the pouertie of the English church being already made bare, with continuall exactions and oppressions; but chesellie they excused themselves by the absence of the archbishops of Canturburie and Poike, of whom the one was beyond the sea, and the other at home in the north parts. All the other English bishops were there, except Hereford & Chester, which Chester was sick, and therefore without the consent of those that were absent, and namelie their primate the archbishop of Canturburie, they could not conclude vpon any generall point touching the kings demand. And although the king fretted and stomed against them, yet could he not bring them to his purpose, so that the parlement for that time was dissolved. Yet before their departure from London, he communed with the bishops apart, to see if he might persuade them to giue him some portion of monte towards his charges: but they had tuned their strings all after one note, discording all from his tenor, so that not a penny could be got of them: wherefore he toke high displeasure against them, reuiling them in most reprochfull manner, and amongst other he vpbaided his halfe brother (the cleer of Winchester) of great vthankfulnesse, who also amongst the residue stood against him.

The bishops refuse to pay to the popes grant.

The king highlie offended with the bishops.

The king hauing this repulse at the bishops hands, began to fall in talke with the lords of the temporallie touching the troubles in Gascoigne, where things were in boile by the hard doings of the earle of Leicester, against whom the Gascoignes ceased not to make warre still, and of late hauing besieged him in the castell of Spountalbon, droue him to such strait, that to escape the present danger he was glad to set at libertie certeine rebels, which he had before taken captiues.

The king desired to get more of the lords temporall.

captiues. Therefore to reduce that countrie into quietnesse, the king determined to go thither himselfe, and to remove the earle of Leicester out of his office: but when he came to the pith of the matter, which was to desire their aid both of men and monie, the lords would not agree to grant him anie. And where he sought to burthen the erle of Leicester with misgoverning things against his honour, they excused the same earle, and so the lords also departed in displeasure of the king as well as the bishops. ¹⁰ Wherbet the king got of the Londoners by way of princelie praier twentie thousand marks of gold at that time. And to their further græfe for better meane to be reuenged against the bishop of Glie, he caused the said Londoners to keepe saint Edwards faue for fiftene daies together at Westmister, and in the meane time to keepe their shops shut through all the citie. Which thing (by reason of the foule weather chancing at that time) was verie grauous vnto them, albeit there was such repaire of people thither, that London had not bene fuller to the iudgement of old ancient men neuer at anie time in their daies to their remembrance.

This yere died Sir Nicholas Samford knight, a man of great reputation and ballancie. Also on the twentieth day of October, the countesse of Winchester daughter to the earle of Hereford departed this life at Grobie, a manour place belonging to hir husband the earle of Winchester, a little besides Leicester, and was buried at Wsahlie. The said earle shortly after married an other wife in hope of issue. For neither by this his last wife, neither by his first that was daughter to the lord Alane de Calowate had he any children. Also the same yere, that noble ladie Margaret countesse of Lisle surnamed Kiuers, sometime wife to Fouls de Bzent, departed out of this world, about the second day of October. In the season and thirtieth yere of king Henries reigne, one of the popes notaries called Albert came into England to offer vnto Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicill. ⁴⁰ But the earle supposing it not to stand with his honour, to depprue his nephew Henrie, sonne to the emperour Frederike the second, by his wife the emperesse Isabell that was sister to the said erle, refused to take that honour vpon him.

About the same time, that is to say, on the octaues of saint Martin, Boniface the archbishop of Canturburie arrived in England, comming from the court of Rome, where he had bene long resident. At the same time there chanced a great occasion of strife betwixt the said archbishop, and the bishop of Winchester. For where maister Eustace de Lin, officiall to the said archbishop had first excommunicated, and after for his contumacie caused to be attached a preest which by authoritie of the elect of Winchester as diocesane there, was entred into possession of an hospitall in Southwarke, as gouernour thereof, by the name of prior, without consent of the officiall: who pretended title as patrone in his maisters name. The said elect of Winchester caused a riotous sort of persons after the manner of warre to seeke reuenge hereof, the which after manie outrages done, came to Lambeth, and there by violence toke the said Eustace out of his owne house, and led him to Farnham, where he was kept as prisoner.

The archbishop thus serued at his first comming ouer, and taking the same but for a homlie welcome, was maruellously offended, and comming to London accompanied with the bishops of Chichester and Hereford, in the church of saint Marie bowe, being reuenced in portificalibus, pronounced all those accursed, which were authors or fauourers of such a rash and presumptuous deed, and further commanded all the bishops within his prouince, by vertue of their obedience, to denounce the same in their churches euerie sundaie and holie day. The bishop of Winchester on the other part, sent commandement to the deane of Southwarke, to resist the archbishop to his face, and to denounce his curse to be void, vaine, and of no force, but deuised of a craftie purpose and wicked meaning. The archbishop continuing in his conceiued displeasure, went to Drenford, and there on the morrow after saint Nicholas day, renewed the same curse in solemne wise before all the learned men, students, and scholers of the Vniuersitie.

Howbeit, at length the matter was taken by betwixt them, for the king in his brothers cause, and the queene for hir uncle the archbishop, toke some paine to agree them: and so in the octaues of the Epiphanie they were made frends, and those absolved that were excommunicated, in which number William de Valence, and John de Warren were thought to be contained, as those that should be present in blessing the force against the officiall (as before ye haue heard.) By inquirie taken about this time by the diligence of the bishop of Lincoln, it was found that the perillie profits and reuenues of spirituall promotions and livings resting in strangers hands preferred by the popes provisions, amounted to the summe of threecore and ten thousand marks, which was more by two third parts, than the kings reuenues belonging to his crowne.

The earle of Gloucester and the lord William de Valence went ouer into France in most triumphant manner, to conclude a marriage betwixt the sonne of the said earle of Gloucester, and the daughter of the lord Guic of Engolesme. Which marriage the king had motioned for: the affection which he bare towards the advancement of his linage, by the mothers side. Whereat because they were strangers, the English nobilitie somewhat repined. And whereas like lustie yong gentlemen they attempted a iustis and toznie to shew some proufe of their valiant stomachs, they were well beaten by the Frenchmen, that disdained to see yong men so presumptuous, to prouoke old accustomed warriours to the triall of such martiall enterprises. About the beginning of Lent, the new mone was seene foure daies before she ought to haue appeared by hir due and common course.

The king by a gift got of the Londoners 1000 marks. For as it happened about the same time the youthfull citizens (for an exercise and triall of their actiuitie) had set forth a game to run at the quintine, and whosoever did best, should haue a peacoeke which they had prepared for a pisse. Certene of the kings seruants, because the court laie then at Westmister, came (as it were in spite of the citizens) to the game, and giuing reprochfull names to the Londoners (which for the dignitie of the citie and ancient priuileges which they ought to haue intoted were called barons) the said Londoners not able to beare so to be misused, fell vpon the kings seruants, and beat them shrewdlie, so that vpon complaint, the king caused the citizens to fine for their rash doings. Wherein the Londoners followed the counsell of him that in a case of strife, said

Tu ne cede malis sed contra audentior ito, Audaces fortuna iuuat.

Howeuer, about the same time, the king vpon displeasure conceiued against the earle of Leicester, had caused him to resigne his office of the wardenship of Gascoigne: and because the earle had it by patent, the king not able to find any iust cause of forfeiture, agreed to paie vnto him for the resignation no small portion of monie. And whereas the Gascoignes had charged the earle with too much streit handling of them, whereby they were occasioned to raise tumults, the matter was now nothing at all amended. For after the earle had resigned, they continued still in rebellion, so that the Rioll with S. Whiloms and other places were taken by the adversaries out of the kings hands, and great slaughter of people made in those parts: wherefore the king minding to go thither, caused musters to be taken, and men put in a redincle according to the custome, that he might vnderstand what number of able men furnished for the warre were to be had. He also took order that euery man that might dispend perille fiftene pounds in lands should be made knight.

Moreover, for the better preservation of peace and quietnesse amongst his people, he appointed watch to be kept by night in cities and borough townes. And further by the aduise of the Sauoines, which were about him, he ordeined that if any man chanced to be robbed, or by any meanes damaged by any theise or robber, he to whom the keeping of that countie chafelie appertained where the robbrie was done, should competentlie restore the losse: and this was after the vsage of Sauoy, but was thought more hard to be obserued here, than in those parts, where are not so many bypaths and starting corners to shift out of the waie. ¶ The Calcoignes continued in their seditious doings, and namely Calcon de Bierne, who renouncing his dutie and obedience to the king of England iouined himselfe to the king of Spaine, through his helpe to be the stronger & more able to annoy the English subiects. The euill increasing vnto the Calcoignes which brought hither twines, in that the same were oftentimes taken from them by the kings officers, and other, without readie monie allowed for the sale, gaue occasion to them to grudge and repine against the king.

In the quindene of Easter a parlement began at London, in which all the states being assembled, the matter was moued for aiding the king with some reliefe of monie towards the iournie which he ment to make into the holie land: and so at length it was agreed that a tenth part of all the reuenues belonging to the church was granted to him for thre yeaeres space, and that escuage should be lenied for that yeaer, after thre markes of cuerie knights fee, and the king on the other part promised faithfullie to obserue and mainteine the grant of the great charter, and all the articles contained within the same. For further assurance whereof, on the third day of Maie, in the great hall at Westminster, in the presence and by the assent of the king and the earles of Norfolke, Hereford, Oxford, Warwike, and other noble men, by the archbishop of Canturburie as ppeimate, and by the bishops of London, Elic, Lincolne, Worcester, Norwiche, Hereford, Salisburie, Durham, Excester, Carlisle, Bath, Rochester, and S. Dames, reuelled and apparelled in pontificalibus, with tapers, according to the maner, the sentence of excommunication was pronounced against all transgressors of the liberties of the church, and of the ancient liberties and customes of the realme of England, and namely those which are contained in the great charter, and in the charter of foreest.

Whilest the sentence was in reading, the king held his hand vpon his breast with glad and cherefull countenance, and when in the end they thew auaite their extinct and smoking tapers, saying, So let them be extinguisht and sinke into the pit of hell which run into the dangers of this sentence; the king said, So helpe me God, as I shall obserue and keepe all these things, euen as I am a christian man, as I am a knight, and as I am a king crowned and annointed. But afterward when he through other counsell brake his promise therein, he was aduised by some to giue a portion of that monie which he got at this time, to the Pope, that he might of him be absolved.

Immediatlie after the breaking vp of the parlement, that is to saie, about the first of Iune, the king being earnestlie called vpon by messengers sent from the Calcoignes to prouide in time for the defence and safeguard of that countie, sith otherwise he stood in danger to lose it, with all speed he resolved to go thither; and thereupon caused summones to be giuen to all those that held of him by knights seruice, to prepare to be at Dorsetmouth, with horse and armour in the octaues of the Trinitie. Herewith he made great prouision of ships, the which being assembled, and the armie likewise come together, through lacke of conuenient wind he was enforced to stay a long time, to his great greife and no lesse charges.

Finallie, on the 6 of August he took the sea, lea- uing his brother the earle of Cornewall, and the queene in charge with gouernance of the realme, and of his sonne the lord Edward. There departed with him from Dorsetmouth thre hundred sailes of great ships, besides a number of other smaller vessels. And thus accompanied, he took his course to Calcoigne, & about our ladie day named hir Assumption, he arriued at Burdeaur, where he was of the citizens honorablie receiued. Immediatlie after his arriual there, he caused the towne of the Rioll to be compassed about with a strong siege, within the which a great number of rebels were inclosed, which valiantlie defended the place in hope of rescue, which Calcon de Bierne that was fled to the king of Spaine had promised to procure for them. But the king of England to prevent them in that point, sent the bishop of Bath, and his trustie chapleine sir John Spansell vnto the said king of Spaine, to conclude friendship and aliance with him, so that the lord Edward his eldest sonne might marrie the king of Spaine his daughter.

After long treatie, by the diligence of the said ambassadors, a full conclusion followed of their motion. And whereas the king of England had giuen and assigned the dominion of Calcoigne to his said sonne the lord Edward, the king of Spaine in the instrument that contained the covenants of the marriage, resigned and quite claimed all the right and title within Calcoigne which he had or might haue by the gift of king Henrie the second, and by confirmation of the kings, Richard and John. In this meane while, the townes and castles which the rebels held, were won and deliuered into the kings hands, and herewith followed a great dearth in the kings armie, so that a hen was sold for six pence sterling, a pound weight in bread was at two pence or thre pence, a gallon of wine at two shillings, a corne of foure bushels of wheat at twentie shillings, so that a knight with his esquire, and costrell with his two horses, might scarce be competentlie found for two shillings in silver. Wherefore the king to relieue his people there with him on that side the sea, sent the prior of Belesborough with other into England, to cause prouision of vittels and other necessaries to be conueied and brought vnto him into Calcoigne, and so there was a great quantitie of graine and powdered flesh taken vp and sent auaite with all conuenient speed.

The earle of Leicester came to the king, bringing with him out of France where he had remained for a time, a faire companie of souldiers and men of warre to the kings aid, and was verie courteously receiued. The Calcoignes then persequed the kings power to increase, and saw how not onelie the castles wherein they trusted to haue refuge were wonne and gotten out of their hands by the king of England, but also that their viues (wherein chafelie consisted their hope of sustentation) were burned vp and de- stroyed, stroied, they began to humble themselves, and so by little and little returned to their due obedience, after that the authours of their seditious tumults were either appehended, or chased out of the countrie.

This yeare died Richard Witt: the bishop of Chester, a man of great vertue and singular knowledge. Also that famous cleark Robert Crofted bishop of Lincoln departed this life on the day of St. Denise in the night, at his manor of Bugdon, whose learning coupled with vertue and brightness of life was to him perpetuall commendation. He was a manifest blamer of pope and king, a reprover of prelates, a corrector of monks, a director of priests, an instructor of clerkes, a sustainer of scholars, a preacher to the people, a persecutor of incontinent liuers, a diligent searcher of the scriptures, a contemner and a vertie mallet of such strangers as sought preferment in this realme by the popes provisions: in housekeeping liberall, in corporall refection plentiful, and in ministering spirituall food, deuout and godlie affected: in his bishoplike office diligent, reuerend, and neuer wearied: a singular example of a bishop, speciallie in those daies, and at whose life our reformed bishops may fetch light to abandon their darknesse, and to amend that which is amisse in them, with

Adhuc sunt exempla quam precepta, Et plenius docemur vita quam verbo.

Whereouer there died in Gascoigne, William de Elesie a baron of great fame in the north parts. Also in the spring and summer of this yeare was a great drought, and in the haruest season fell such wet, that great floods by the rising of the riuers, and ouerflowing their banks, did much hurt in sundrie places of the realme. Again in the later end of haruest about Michaelmasse, there was effsones such a drought, that men could get no grinding at the milles, but were constrained to go in some places a daies iournie off, to haue their corne ground. In the eight and thirtieth yeare of king Henries reigne, the queene was deliuered of a daughter which was called Matherin, because the same was bozne on saint Katherins daie.

On St. Lucies daie, there fell a great snowe, and withall a winters thunder, for a token of some euill to follow. The king to settle the state of the countrie of Gascoigne in better order, tarried there all the winter, and repaired certeine decayed towines and castles. The queene kept hir Christmasse at London, where she laie in child-bed, and was purified on the euen of the Epiphanie, making a roiall feast, at the which manie great lords were present, as the archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Ely, the earls of Cornewall and Gloucester, and manie other. She sent ouer at the same time to hir husband for a new yeres gift the summe of five hundred marks of hir owne reuenues, towards the maintenance of his warres.

On the euen of the Circumcision of our Lord, in the night season, whilest the aire was most cleare and bright with shining starres, the mone being eight daies old, there appeared in the element the perfect forme and likenesse of a mightie great ship, which was first seene of certeine monks of saint Albons, who remaining at saint Amphibalus, were got by to behold by the starres, if it were time for them to go to mattens; but perceiving that strange sight, they called by such of their acquaintance as lodged nere at hand, to view the same. At length it seemed as the boards and ioints thereof had gone in sunder, and so it vanished awaie. There followed a marvellous soze later end of a winter, through cold and ouerharpe weather, which continued till the feast of St. Gregorie in March next ensuing. Also there chanced the same yeare a great murren and death of shepe and deere, so that of whole flocks and heards scarce the one halfe escaped.

Whilest the king remained still in Gascoigne, he sent for his wife queene Elenor, with his eldest sonne Edward, but because he could not make an end of all his businesse that winter, he continued there the summer also. And forsomuch as he stood in need of monie, to haue some reasonable pretense to demand a subsidie, in the beginning of March, he sent to his brother Richard the earle of Cornewall (which was come ouer before that purpose) certeine instructions, to declare how there was like to follow great warre, by means of Alfonso the tenth of that name king of Castile, who manaced verie hostilie to inuade the confines of Gascoigne pertaining to the English dominion, and therefore he required of his faithful subjects some aid of monie, wherby he might be able to resist his aduersarie the said k. of Castile. Earle Richard did what he could to perswade the people to this payment, but he cast his net in vaine before the face of the feathered fowle, as the old proverbe saith, Apparens rete fugere volucris quæq.

For though he set forth the matter to the uttermost in the presence of the Nobles and other estates, yet would they not heare of anie payment to be made, as those that smelled out the feined fetch and forged tale of the kings need. For they had intelligence that there was an agreement concluded betwixt him and the king of Spaine. And for the same cause the queene and the lord Edward were gone ouer, that the king of Spaine might haue a sight of him, as he had required, when the covenants of the marriage were accorded.

The states of the realme were twice assembled at London about the grant of this payment, but all in vaine; so that they were constrained to passe it ouer with silence, and to surceasse in the matter to their great græfe, and namelie the earle of Cornewall, who had taken great paines therein. Yet for that he would not returne with empty hand, he lenied by rigorous means a great summe of the Jewes (of whom a maine multitude inhabited at that season in London) and therewith returning to his brother king Henrie, shewed him how he had sped. The king was not a little offended with them that thus had denied to helpe him with monie, inasmuch that upon euerie light occasion, he was ready to reuenge his displeasure towards them, in taking awaie such grants of priuileges and liberties as before he had made. But now to avoid suspicion of his feined pretense of war betwixt him and king Alfonso, he sent his sonne Edward into Castile vnto the same Alfonso, vnder a colour to compound with him for peace, whereas the verie occasion of his going thither, was to purchase him the ladie Elenor to wife, that was sister to the said king Alfonso.

At his comming to the court of Spaine, he was verie honorable receiued of the king, and in the end, upon conference had of his message, obtained his suit, so that king Alfonso was content to bestow by on him his daughter in marriage, with the countie of Pontieu in France, which she held in right of hir mother queene Jone, the second wife of Ferdinando the king of Castile, father vnto this king Alfonso, which Jone was the onelie daughter and heire of Simon earle of Pontieu, and had issue by hir husband the said Ferdinando two sonnes, Ferdinando and Lewis, with one daughter; to wit, the foresaid Elenor, the which by reason hir brethren died young, was heire to hir mother. The lord Edward hauing dispatched his businesse according to his desire, returned with a iollull hart to his father, and declared to him what he had done. His father most glad thereof, for an augmentation of honour, created him prince of Wales and earle of Chester, and appointed him to be his depatie and generall lieutenant both in Gaülen and in Ireland, and gave to him the townes of Baynolow, Stamford and Grantham. Hereof came it, that ruer after the kings eldest sonne was made immediate upon his birth prince of Wales and earle of Chester. He created also his other sonne named Edmund earle of Lancaster.

About this season were certeine ships driven by force of wind and weather into certeine hauens on the north coasts of England towards Barwick, which ships were of a verie strange forme and fashion, but mightie and strong. The men that were aboard the same ships were of some farre countrie, for their language was unknowne, and not understandable to any man that could be brought to talke with them. The freight and ballast of the ships was armour and weapon, as habergeons, helmets, speares, bowes, arrows, crossbowes and darts, with great store of vittells. There laie also without the hauens on the coast diuerse other ships of like forme, mold and fashion. Those that were driven into the hauens were staied for a time by the bailiffes of the ports. But finally, when it could not be knowne what they were, nor from whence they came, they were licensed to depart without losse of barrie in bodie or goods.

About Candlemasse, Gaston de Bierne, assembling together a multitude of the kings enemies, thorough the intelligence of some of the citizens of Baton that fauoured not the king, brought so, that certeine of his number entred that cite, meaning to haue herell the king of the domination thereof. But other of the citizens (namelie those of the meaner sort) which fauoured the king, made such resistance, that the enemies which were entred, were apprehended, and diuerse of them suffered punishment, as they had well deserved. After this, there chanced a mutinie in the English armie, because the kings brethren and the bishop of Hereford took upon them to punish certeine Welshmen, for that without commission they had bene abrod to spoile within the French con fines. Therefore in asmuch as the punishment seemed to exceed the degree and qualitie of the offense, and againe, for that the earle of Hereford being constable of the host by inheritance ought to haue had the order of all corrections in cases of such offenses, the Englishmen were in mind to haue slaine all the Poitouins in despite of the kings brethren, if the king had not in humble wise sought to haue appeased their furie.

The wind continuing this yeare for the space of thre moneths and od daies northerlie, did greatlie hinder the growth and increase of floures and fruits: and about the first of Iulie there fell such a storme of haile and raine, as the like had not bene seene nor heard of in those daies, breaking downe the tiles and other coverings of houses, with boughes of trees, by the violent abundance and force of the water and hailestones, which continued about the space of an houre pouring and beating downe incessantlie. After this, when the king had remained a whole yeare in Gaülen, he returned homewards through France, and comming vnto Charters, was honorable there receiued of Lewis the French king, as then latelie returned out of the holie land, and from thence he was roiallie by the same king Lewis brought vnto Paris. The countesse of Cornewall went ouer with a noble traine of lords, gentlemen, and others, to be present at the meeting of hir two sisters, the queenes of England and France, so that the roialtie of the assemble on ech part was great.

After that king Henrie had continued there for his pleasure certeine daies, he returned to England, landing at Dover in Christmasse weeke. This iour-nie into Calcoigne was verie costlie, and to small purpose (as writers haue recorded) for the kings charges amounted to the summe of 27 hundred thousand pounds and about, except lands and rents, which he gaue unabusedlie to those which little deserved, but rather sought the hinderance both of him and his realme, besides the gift of 20 thousand marks, which he bestowed vpon his halfe brethren by the mothers side, not reckoning the lands nor rents, neither yet the wards nor the hosties, nor iewels which he gaue to them besides, being of price incalculable. Thus in two iournies which he made, the one into Poitou, which countrie he lost; and the other into Calcoigne, which he hardlie preserved; he spent more treasure than a wise chapman would haue giuen for them both if they had bene set on sale (as Matthew Paris writeth) so that it might be verified in him that is meant by the old prouerbe,

Qui procul excurrit, sed nil mercatur ibidem, si via longa fuit, rediens tristatur hic idem.

Moreouer to increase the kings vaine charges, so it fell out, that pope Innocent bearing grudge towards Conrad king of Sicill, offered that kingdome (as before is partlie touched) to Richard duke of Cornewall, who refused the offer, as well for other causes, as chiefe for that the pope would not agree to such conditions as earle Richard thought necessary for his assurance. Whereupon the pope granted that kingdome vnto king Henrie, with manie goodlie promises of aid to his furtherance for attaining the possession thereof. King Henrie sofullie receiued that grant, and called his sonne Edmund openlie by the name of K. of Sicill, and to furnish the pope with monie for the maintenance of his war against Conrad, he got together all such summs as he could make, as well out of his owne coffers, and out of the exchequer, as by borrowing of his brother earle Richard, and likewise what he could scrape from the Jewes, or otherwise extort by the rapine of the iudices itinerants: all which he sent to the pope, who not content herewith (when he began elisions to want) wrote againe to the king for more.

The king through the insinuat of the duche, to answer the popes auarice, sent him letters patents obligatorie, signed with his roiall seale, by which he might take by way of lone such summes of monie, as should largelie serue his turne of the merchants Italians, willing him not to sticke at the disturbing of treasure, nor at the great quantitie of the interest rising vpon the blurie, for he would discharge all: and hereunto he bound himselfe under paine to forfeit his kingdome and other his heritages. The pope consenting hereunto, accepted this large offer. If he did well herein (saith Matthew Paris) the Lord the iudge of all iudges iudge it, to whom appertineth the care of all things. To conclude, much monie was spent, for the pope spared not the king of Englands purse, though little good was done therewith. At length Conrad died, not without suspicion of poison. The pope being aduertised of his death, reioiced greatlie, as he well uttered in plaine words, saieing; Let vs all that be the children of the Romish church reioice, for now two of our greatest enemies are dispatched out of the waie; the one a spirituall man, that is to saie, Robert bishop of Lincoln; and the other a laic-man, that is Conrad king of Sicill. But yet the pope missed of his purpose, for against the bastard sonne of the emperor Frederike the second, was shortly after proclaimed king of Sicill, and so the second error was greater than the first.

About the quindene of Easter, there was a parliament holden at London, at the which were assembled all the states of the realme in greater number than had had bene commonlie sente. This parlement was chaſelle called, to let them vnderstand the kings ne- cessitie of monie for discharging of his debts, and to require them of their aid towards the same. But whereas he requested more than was thought good with reason, they would not agree thereunto, but de- sired that he would confirme, and without all cauilla- tion sweare to obserue the liberties which by the char- ter he had promised to hold. Forcower they required, that by the common counsell of the realme they might chose to them the chafe iustice, the chancellour and treasurer, but they were answered plainlie by some of the priue counsell, that this request would at no hand be granted.

adourned.

Furthermore, the prelates complained, that they were driuen to paie the tenths which they promised conditionallic, as it were now by constraint and of dutie, to the preiudice of the liberties of the church. The Nobles also found themselves grieved for the exactions which they saw at hand, but finallie, after manie things had bene debated touching these mat- ters, the parlement was adiourned till Michaelmas next, and euerie man departed to his home, with no great trust of the kings good will towards them, noz anie hartie thanks receiued of him for their paines, as may be thought by that which writers haue recoz- ded. Two Noble men, to whom the custodie and gui- ding of the king and quene of Scots was commit- ted, that is to say, Robert de Ros, and John de Baili- oll, were accused, for misusing themselves in the trust and charge which they had taken vpon them. King Henrie was the same time at Nottingham. The information came forth by a physician, who was sent from the quene of England, vnto hir daughter the quene of Scots, to be about hir for gard of hir health, but because the same physician (whose name was Reignold of Bath) perceiued the quene of Scots to be impaired in health through anguish of mind, by reason of the misdeameanz of such as had the gouernement of hir and hir husband, he stiched not to blame and reprove them in their doings, for the which he was poisoned, as some thinke: for the truth was, he shortly after sickened and died, signifi- eng vpon his death-bed vnto the quene of England what he misliked and thought amisse in those, that had the doings about hir daughter and hir husband the Scottis king.

An eclipse.

The mone suffered a marvellous eclipse on the night following the day of S. Margaret in Julie. It began afoze midnight, and continued foure houres. The king in the behalfe of his daughter the quene of Scots raised a power, and drez northwards, sending before him the earle of Gloucester, and John Hantell that was his chapleine and one of his coun- cell. These two vsed the matter, that they came to Edinburgh, where the king and quene of Scots then laie in the castell, into the which they entred, and alitred the order of the household, so as good with the contentation of the king and quene, which were in such wise vsed before that time, that they were not suffered to lie together, noz scarce come to talke together.

Robert de Ros summoned to appeare.

Robert de Ros was summoned to appeare before the king of England, to answer to such things as might be laid to his charge. At the first he withdrew himselfe, but afterwards he came in, and submitted himselfe to the kings pleasure. Diuerse of the nobles of Scotland toke it not well, that the earle of Gloucester and John Hantell should thus come into the castell of Edinburgh, and order things in the kings house in such sort at their pleasure: whereupon they assembled a power, and besieged the castell, but at length perceiuing their owne error, they raised their siege and departed. John de Bailioll being accused of the like crime that was laid to the charge of his fellow Robert de Ros, for a pece of monie bought his peace and was pardoned, but the lands of Robert de Ros were seized into the kings hands. Finallie, the king and quene of England came to an enter- uiew with the king of Scots and the quene their daughter, and setting all things with them in such or- der as was thought conuenient, they returned to- wards the south parts.

In the meane season, the bishop of Hereford de- uised a shift to helpe the k. with monie, towards the payments of his debts, by obtaining certeine au- tenticke seales of the prelates of this land, wherewith he signed certeine instruments and writings, wherein was expessed, that he had receiued diuerse summes of monie for dispatch of busincle pertaining to them and to their churches, of this and that merchant of Florence or Siena, whereby they stood bound for re- payment thereof by the same instruments and wri- tings so made by him their agent in their names. This shift was deuised by the said bishop of Here- ford, with licence obtained thereunto of the king, and also of the pope, vnto whom for the same intent the said bishop was sent, with sir Robert Mulerane knight. The pope was the sooner persuaded to grant licence for the contriuing of such manner of shift, be- cause the monie should go to the discharging of the kings debts, into the which he was run, by bearing the charges of the warres against the king of Sci- cill.

About the feast of saint Edward, the parlement began againe at London, in which the states trea- ted of a subsidie to be granted to the king, but they could not conclude thereof, neither would Richard earle of Cornewall disburse anie monie at that sea- son to his brother the king, because he allowed not the manner of laing it out for the warres against Span- fied, being taken in hand without his consent. The same yeare, the king by the procurement of his bro- ther Richard earle of Cornewall, had seized the li- berties of the citie of London into his owne hands, vnder colour that the maior had not done his dutie in the iust punishing of bakers for breaking of the assises of their bread. Whereupon, where the maior and communalitie of the citie had by the kings grant the citie to farme, with diuerse customes and offices, at a certeine rate and stinted summe of monie; now the king set officers therein at his pleasure, which were accomptable to him for all the reuenuess and profits that grew within the citie.

But whereas the malice which the earle of Corne- wall bare to the citie, was, for that they would not exchange with him certeine grounds that belonged to their communalitie, they were glad to agree with him, and paie vnto him six hundred marks. After which agreement concluded, about the nineteenth daie of Nouember, they were shortly after restored to their liberties. This chanced before the kings com- ming ouer, who at his comming to London, lodged in the tower, and vpon new displeasure conceived a- gainst the citie for the escape of a prisoner (being a cleerke conuict) out of Newgate, which had killed a prioz, that was of aliance to the king, as couline to the quene, the king sent for the maior and the shirifs to come before him to answer the matter. The ma- ior laid the fault from him to the shiriffs, for so much as to them belonged the keeping of all the prisoners within the citie: and so the maior returned home a- gaine, but the shiriffs remained there as prisoners by the space of a whole moneth or more, and yet they excused themselves, in that the fault chafelle rested in the bishops officers: for whereas the prisoner was vnder his custodie, they at his request had granted him licence to imprison the offender within their ward

Moreouer, whereas he stood in great need of mo-nie, he required by way of a tallage eight thousand marks of the Jewes, charging them on paine of hanging, not to deferre that payment. The Jewes soze impowertised with greuous and often payments excused themselves by the popes vsurers, and reprimond plainelie the kings excessiue taking of monie, as well of his christian subiects as of them. The king on the other side, to let it be knowne that he tared not his people without iust occasion, and upon necessitie that droue him thereto, confessed openlie, that he was indebted by his bonds obligatorie, in three hundred thousand marks: and againe, the yearelie reuenues assigned to his sonne prince Edward, arose to the summe of sixtene thousand marks and aboue, where the reuenues that belonged vnto the crowne were greatlie diminished, in such wise, that without the aid of his subiects, he should neuer be able to come out of debt. To be short, when he had siced the Jewes to the quicke, he set them to farme vnto his brother earle Richard, that he might pull off skin and all; but yet considering their pouertie, he spared them, and ne-uertheless, to relieue his brothers necessitie, vpon a pawne he lent him an huge masse of monie. These thrifts did the king vie from time to time, not caring with what exactions and impositions he burthened the inhabitants of his land, whereby he procured vnto himselfe the name of an oppressor and couetous scrapor. But what wonder is it in a king, fifth Maxima pars hominum morbo iactatur eodem?

About the same time, Leues the French king sent vnto king Henrie for a present an elephant, a beast most strange and wonderfull to the English people, fifth most seldome or neuer any of that kind had bene sene in England before that time. The French quene also sent for a present vnto the king of England an ewer of pearle like to a peacoeke in forme and fashion, garnished most richlie with gold, silver, and sappires to furnish him forth in all points of fine and cunning workmanship, to the verie resemblance of a liuing peacoeke. ¶ Danie wonders chanced about this time. The sea rose with most high tides, rivers were so filled with abundance of water, by reason of the great continuall raine, that marvellous floods followed therevpon. A comet also appeared, and manie high buildings were stricken by force of tempests. The death of Walter archbishop of Yorke followed these prodigious wonders, who had governed that se the space of forty yeares. After him succeeded one Senall the 34 archbishop of that citie.

About the feast of S. Etheldred, the ladie Elizora wife of prince Edward the kings son, came to London, where she was honorablie receiued of the citizens, & conueied through the citie to S. Jones without Smithfield, and there lodged for a season, and per-long the removed to the Sauoy. It was not long after, that the king seized the libertie of the citie of London into his hands, for certeine monie which the quene claimed as due to hir of a certeine right to be paid by the citizens, so that about the feast of S. Martine in Nouember, they gaue vnto the king foure hundred marks, and then had their libertie to them againe restored, and the kings vnder-treasoror discharged, which for the time was made custos or keeper of the citie.

About the same time came another legat from the pope, namely, one Ruseand a Gascoigne borne, to whom, with the archb. of Canturbarie, and the bishop of Hereford, the pope had granted authoritie to collect and gather the tenth of the spiritualtie within England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the vse of the pope and the king, notwithstanding all priuiledges, for what cause or vnder what forme of words to cuer the same had passed. This Ruseand also absolved the king of his vow made to go into the holie land, to the end he might go against Hanfred king of Sicill.

He also preached the crosse against the same Han-fred, promising all those remission of their sins which should go to war against Hanfred, as well as if they should go into the holie land, to warre against Gods enemies there, whereat faithfull men much marvelled, that he should promise as great meed for the shedding of christian blood, as the blood of infidels.

The craftie and sic fetters which were bled in this season by this Ruseand the bishop of Hereford, and other their complices, to get monie of the prelats and gouernors of monasteries within this realme, were wonderfull, & verie greuous to those that felt themselues oppressed therewith; and namelie, for the debt which the said bishop of Hereford had charged them with, they being not priue to the receipt, nor hauing any benefit thereby. Ruseand called a counsell at London, & propounded great causes why the prelats ought to aid the pope, and so therevpon demanded great summes of monie. Amongst other summes, he demanded six hundred marks of the house of S.
Albons.

To conclude, his demands were esteemed vntreasonable, so that the bishops and abbats were in a marvellous perplexitie, perceiuing into what miserable state by reason of immoderate exactions the church of England was brought. The bishop of London stieked not to saie, that he would rather lose his head, than consent that the church should be brought to such feruitude as the legat went about to enforce. And the bishop of Worcester openlie protested, that he would sooner suffer himselfe to be hanged, than to see the church subiect to such oppression by their examples. W-ther also taking a boldnesse vnto them, affirmed, that they would follow the steps of Thomas sometime archbishop of Canturbarie, which for the libertie of the church suffered himselfe to haue his baines cut out of his head. Yet were those prelats euill troubled, for the king was against them on the one side, and the pope gaping after monie was become their vt-ter enemie on the other: neither were the noble men much moued with pitie towards the church their mother (as the terme then went) now thus in miserie.

Finallie, the prelats appealed from Ruseand, vnto the popes presence, and would not obeie the willfull and violent oppressions of the same Ruseand, so that much adoe there was, and a great complaint made to the king by Ruseand, of the stubborne disobedience of the prelats, and namelie of the bishop of London.
The king was in a great chafe with him, and threat-ned that he would cause the pope to punish him according to that he well deserved: but the bishop answered thereto; Let the pope and king (saith he) which are stronger than I am, take from me my bishop-ricke, which by law yet they cannot do: let them take awaie my miter, yet an helmet shall remaine.

This yeare after S. Lukes daie, the king assenbled a great number of the nobilitie at London, and thither came the bishop of Bologna la grille from the pope, bringing with him a ring, with the which he inuested Edmund the kings sonne king of Sicill and Naples. About the same time, the burgesse of Darbie obtained of the king for a summe of monie to haue the iustices itinerants to hold their assises at Darbie for the countie of Darbie, and likewise the shiriffes to keepe their tournies there, and not at Nottingham, as before they had bene accustomed for both the shires. But now to returne to the bi-

In the meane tyme, the bishop of Hereford and Kusland fought to set variance and discord amongst the English prelats, whereby being diuided in parts, and not consenting together, they should be lesse able to giue true information to the pope, how the verie truth rested. But finallye, because the archbishop of Canturburie was in the parts beyond the sea, and for that also the see of Poike was vacant, and diuerse bishops were absent, the counsell was propozed till the feast of S. Hilarie, and so they departed euerie man to his home in a maruellous doubt what waie were best for them to take, sith they saw themselves in great distresse, if Kusland did suspend or excommunicate any of them either iustlie or otherwise.
For sure they were, that the king as a lion lieng in wait whome he might deuoure (to get monie) after somethe daies were past, if they submitted not themselves, would spoile them of all their goods as forfeited. So that the pope and the king seemed as though the shepheard and wolfe had bene confederate together to the destruction of the poore flocke of shepe, threatning euerie mans vndowing, to their owne inriching: and not ceasing, till with fullnesse they were forced to fall from the flesh, much like bloodsucking boyllachpes, of whose nature it is notable noted, that

*Non missura prius carnem quam plena cruoris, Quando heret tenera molis hirudo cuti:
Sic ignara dolis emungitur are caterua, Imbellis populi quid nisi praeda manent?*

Thus by reason of couetous greedinesse to get mo-nie for the furnishing of the popes warres against Spanish king of Sicill, both the pope and the king of England ran in slander and hatred of the English nation, namelye, of the spiritualtie, so that such as recoyded the acts and doings of that tyme, feared not to make manifest to the world by their writings, how inturbonlie they were handled, blaming the practises of the court of Rome in plaine terms, and affirming that the pope had power in those things which worke to edification, and not to destruction.
About this season, John lord Grey, being one of the chefe counsellors to the king, a right honourable knight, and for his good demeanour and high valiancie greatly commended of all, withdrew himselfe from the court, either by reason of age that desired rest, or rather (as was thought) for that he doubted to beare blame for such errors as were dailye committed by them that bare rule about the king, which could not but bring the authours into great infamie at length, and therefore was he loth to be partaker with them of such slander as might haue redounded to him also, if he had still continued and taried amongst them.

Also, upon the two and twentieth of November, were brought vnto Westminster a hundred and two Jehes from Lincolne, that were accused for the cru-cifying of a child in the last summer, in despite of Christes religion. They were vpon their examination sent to the towne. The child which they had so crucified was named Hugh, about an eight yeeres of age. They kept him ten daies after they got him vnto their hands, sending in the meane tyme vnto di-uerse other places of the realme for other of their nation to be present at the crucifying of him. The murether came out, by the diligent search made by the mother of the child, who found his bodie in a well, on the backe side of the Jewes house, where he was crucified: for she had leaened that hir sonne was lastlie sene plaicing with certeine Jewes children of like age to him, before the doore of the same Jewes. The Jew that was owner of the house, was apprehended, and being brought before sir John de Lexington, vpon promise of pardon, confessed the whole matter. For they used peacelie (if they could come by their peeie) to crucifie one christian child or other. The king vpon knowledge had hereof, would not pardon this Jew that had so confessed the matter, but caused him to be executed at Lincolne, who coming to the place where he should die, opened more matter concerning such as were of counsell and present at the crucifi-eng of the poore innocent. Whereupon at length also eightene of them that were so brought to London, were conuined, adiudged and hanged, the other remained long in prison.

When the feast of saint Hilarie was come, the cleargie met againe at London, and fell to intreat of their former businesse, at what time one maister Leonard alias Keignold that was chosen prolocutor for all the prelats, amongst other answers made to the legat Kusland, when the same Kusland alledged that all churches were the popes; Truth it is said Leonard, to defend, and not to vse and appropriate them to serue his owne turne, as we saie, that all is the princes, meaning that all is his to defend, and not to spoile: and such was the intent of the founders.
Kusland soe offended herewith, said, he would that euerie man should speake afterwards for himselfe, that as well the pope as the king might vnderstand what euerie man said in their businesse and matters.
The prelats were stricken in a dumpe herewith, for they perceiued how the matter went: they appealed yet against the demands that were made by Kusland, who would not change a word of that he had written, in which was contained, that the prelats had acknowledged themselves to haue borrowed of the merchant strangers, no small summes of monie, and the same to be conuerted to the vse of their churches, which was most untrue as all men well vnderstood; whereupon the prelats affirmed, and not without reasonable cause, that there was a greater occasion in this cause of martyrdome, than in that of Thomas sometime archbishop of Canturburie.

Kusland at length, perceiuing their manner, became somewhat more mild, and promised that he would talke with the pope of this matter. But first there was sent to Rome the deane of Pauls in London, and certeine others, as attornies or agents for the whole cleargie of England. These sped so in their suit, that the pope took order that if the prelats paid the monie by force of the contriued writings, whereby they stood bound for them, their houses, and churches; then, to ease their burthen, they might retaine in their hands such parcell of tenths as they ought to paye to the king, for furnishing of his wars against the Saracens, amounting to the summe which they should be constrained to paye for the bonds made to the merchants, by the bishop of Hereford (as be fore is recited.)

In this season the deuotion, which manie had con-ceiued of the pope and the church of Rome, began to war cold, reputing the vertue which he shewed at his entring into the papacie, to be rather a colourable hy-pocrisie, than otherwise, sith his proceedings answered not to his good beginnings: for as it was manifest, where suitors brought their complaints into the court of Rome, such sped best as gaue most bribes, and the two priors of Winchester, the one expelled, and the other got in by intrusion, could well witnesse the same: and all the world knoweth that the piperines generation of Romanists, reckoning from the ringleader to the simplest shaueling, haue made gaine the scope of their holinesse, and as it is true, he said,

In the feast of Easter this yeare, the king adorned Magnus king of Spain, with the order of knight-hood, and bestowed upon him great gifts and honors.

The countesse of Warren Alesia or Alesia (as some booke haue) sister to the king by his mother, departed this life in his flourishing youth, unto the great griefe of his brother, but speciallie of his husband John earle of Warren that loued hir intierly.

About the midd of Maie, the Jewes that were in the towne, and in other pions for the murder of the child at Lincolne, and had bene indicted by an inquest upon the death of him that had suffered at Lincolne, were admitted and set at libertie, to the number of foure hundred of them. In Whitsuntide was holden a great feast at Wile, where the lord Edward the king, with some first began to shew proofe of his chivalrie. There were diuerse o'werthrowen and hurt, and amongst other William de Longspe was so hurt, that he neuer after recouer his former strength.

The king caused a proclamation to be set forth, that all such as might dispend foure pounds in lands, should receiue the order of knight-hood; and those that would not or could not, should paie their fines. This yeare, three daies after the feast of S. Ciricus, a marvellous soe tempest of wind, raine, haile, and thunder chaunced, that did exceeding much hurt. Mill-wheles by the violence of waters were carried away, and the wind-milles were no lesse tormented with the rage of wind. Arches of bridges, stables of hails, houses that stood by water sides, and children in cradles were borne away, that both wondrous and no lesse pitifull it was to see. At Bedford the river of Ouse bare downe six houses together, and did vnspokeable hurt thereabouts.

Alexander the third king of Scots with his wife quene Margaret, came about the beginning of August into England, and found the king at his manor of Woodstocke, where he solaced him a season, and had the lands of the earle of Huntington restored unto him, which his grandfather king William in his time lost and forfeited. Here he did homage to king Henrie. Upon the day of the decollation of S. John, the two kings with their quenes came to London, where they were honorable receiued, and so conuicted unto Westminster. On the day of S. Augustine the bishop, being the eight and twentieth of August, John Hansell the kings chapleine besought the two kings, and other states, to dine with him on the morrow following, which they granted, and so he made a marvellous great dinner. There were seuen hundred melles serued vp, but the multitude of guests was such, that scarce the same sufficed; his house was not able to receiue them all, and therefore he caused tents and booths to be set up for them. The like dinner had not bene made by any chapleine before that time. All those that came were worthilie receiued; feasted and interteined, in such sort, as euery man was satisfied.

About foure daies before the feast of S. Edward, Henrie came into the ercheper himselfe, & there demanded order for the appearance of thirffes, and bringing in of their accompts. At the same time also, there was five marks set on euery thirffes head for a fine, because they had not restrained euery person that might dispend 15 pounds land, to receiue the order of knight-hood, as was to the same thirffes commanded. The king of Scots, after he had remained a while with the king of England, returned backe into Scotland, and left his wife behind with his mother till she should be brought to bed, for she was as then great with child.

In the 41 yeare of the reigne of king Henrie, his brother Richard earle of Cornwall was elected emperor, by one part of the Conuoters: and diuerse lords of Almaine comming ouer into this land (upon the daie of the innocents in Christmasse) presented unto him letters from the archbishop of Colen, and other great lords of Almaine, testifying their consents in the choosing of him to be emperor, and withall, that it might stand with his pleasure to accept that honor. Finally, upon good deliberation had in the matter, he consented therunto: whereupon the lords that came with the message, being right glad of their answer, returned with all speed to signifye the same unto those from whom they had bene sent. The treasure of this earle Richard now elected king of Almaine, was esteemed to amount unto such a summe, that he might dispend euery day a hundred marks, for the terme of ten yeares together, not reckoning at all the reuenues which daily accreted to him of his rents in Almaine and England.

In this meane time the vnquiet Welshmen, after the death of their prince David, chose in his stead one Leolin, that was son to the same Griffin that brake his necke as he would haue escaped out of the towne of London; and herewith they began a new rebellion, either drining out such Englishmen as laie there in garlions within the castles and fortresses, or else entring into the same by some traitorous practise, they slue those which they found within them, to the great displeasure of their soveraigne lord Edward the kings eldest sonne, who couding to be reuenged of their rebellious enterprises, could not bring his purpose to passe, by reason of the vnseasonable weather and continuall raine which fell that winter, so raising the waters & setting the marshes on floods, that he could not passe with his armie.

Sporecourt, his father the king wanted monie and treasure to furnish him withall, howbeit prince Edward borrowed of his brother earle Richard foure thousand marks towards the maintenance of that war. The rebellion of the Welshmen speciallie rose by the hard dealing of sir Geoffrey de Langlie knight, the kings collector amongst them, who handled them so streightlie, that in defense of their countrie, lawes, and liberties (as they pretended) they put on armour. They toke and destroyed the lands and possessions which were great and large, of Griffin Burnet, being fled for safegard of his life unto the king of England. There were of those Welsh rebels at the point of twentie thousand men, and of them ten thousand were horsemen, the which perceiving the reason to make for their purpose, defended themselves so manfully, that they drove backe prince Edward and his armie, & so continuing the wars, did much hurt to the English marshes. Their power so increased, that at length they diuided the same in two equal parts, the better to recouer battels; and in either armie there were esteemed thirtie thousand armed men, after the manner of their countreys, of the which there were five hundred men of armes in either host, with barbed horses all covered in iron. Thus being of such puissance, they did much mischefe to the Englishmen that inhabited on the marshes, neither were the lords marchers able to resist them, although the earle of Gloucester aided the same lords all that he might.

King Henrie being hereto advertised, and with all speed Stephen Bayan, a man skilled in feats of warre, with a great number of soldiers into Wales, against the rebels, who comming into that countreie, and entring into the lands of a Welsh lord named

Parlement.

Wile Laugban, was intrapt by such ambushments as his enemies laid for him, and thereby was slaine with the more part of his armie. This ouertrowne chanced by the treason of Griffin de Brunet, who at that present revolting from the English side to his countreimen, instructed them in all things, how they might banquish their enemies. At that time, Northwales and Southwales joined in league and frendlie amitie together, which commonlie was not sene in those daies, they being for the more part at variance, the one rather seeking still how to indamage the other: but now in defense of their liberties (as they pretended) they agreed in one.

The king fore moved herewith, determined to go himselfe into Wales, that he might take woorthie punishment of those his aduersaries, that could neuer be sufficientlie chastised. Whereupon raising a great power, he passed forth, and comming into Wales, put the rebels in such feare, that they withdrew to their accustomed places of refuge, I meane the woods and marshes. The king would faine have had them forth, that he might haue punished them according to their deserts, and therefore to bring his purpose the better to passe, he sent for an armie of soldiers into Ireland, and tarried for their comming at the castell of Brecknoke, but the yeare was farre spent per his people could be gathered, so that by the aduise of his lordes he strengthened certeine castles, and so returned for that yeare into England, leaving the lord Roger Mortimer his lieutenant in Wales, to resist the rebels. But now let vs speake of other doings which chanced in the meane while that the warres thus continued and lasted betwixt England and Wales.

We shall understand, that in the Lent season, the archbishop of Spessina came as legat from the pope hither into England, with letters of procuration, to demand and receiue, and also with power, to punish such as should denie and seeme to resist, and so being here arrived with a great traine of seruants and horses, he sent forth his commandements in writing to euerie prelat, to prouide him monie by way of priuie to that of the house of S. Albons, and of the celles that belonged thereto, he had one and twentie marks, and when the monks of S. Albons came to visit him in his house, they could not be permitted to depart, but were kept as prisoners, till they had satisfied his comelous demand: for whereas they alleged that they had not brought any monie with them, he asked them whie they were such beggers, and further said, send ye then to some merchant, that will lend you monie, and so it was done: for otherwise they might not haue libertie to depart. This archbishop was of the order of the Friers preachers, in whome (saith Matthew Paris) we had hoped to haue found more abundant humilitie. About the same time, there appeared at London a new order of Friers, not known till those daies, having yet the popes autenthike bulles, which they opened shewed, so that there seemed a confusion of manie orders, as the same Matthew Paris recozde, and because they were apparelled in sackcloth, they were called sackcloth friers.

About the middell of Lent, there was a great parlement holden, to the which the maisters of the Uniuersitie of Oxford were summoned, that peace might be concluded betwixt them and the bishop of Lincoln, which had them in suit about their liberties. There came to the same parlement, the earle of Gloucester, and sir John Spanell, lately returned out of Almaine, where they had been on ambassage from Richard the elect king of Almaine. Whither came also the same elect king of Almaine, and almost all the Nobilitie of the realme, so that scarce might the citie of London receiue the number that repaired to that parlement. The king of Almaine meant to take his leaue at that time of the lordes and peres of the realme, purposing shortly after, to take his iourne towards Almaine, and to ordeine the bishop of London gouernoz of all his lands and possessions within England.

In this parlement, the lord Edmund the kings younger sonne was shewed as king of Naples and Sicill, for the obtaining of the possession of which dominions and kingdoms, his father king Henrie demanded no small subsidie and aid of monie, both of the tempozaltie and also of the spiritualtie, but namely, he required to haue the tenths of spiritual mens linings for the terme of five yeares, according to the new taxations without any deductions to be affected except necessarie expences: also, the tenths for one yeare of benefices that chanced to fall void within the said terme of five yeares. Moreover, sundrie other duties he required to haue of the spiritual men, soe to their graunce, and specially, because they knew that such tyrannie first took beginning from the pope. In the end (though les they were to consent) yet conditionallie that the king would confirme the liberties contelied in the great charter, and obserue the same throughe, now after it had bene so manie times brought out and reclaimed, they offered to giue him towards his instant necessitie two and fiftie thousand marks, to the irreuerable danger of impoverishing the church. And yet, as it is said, the king refused the gift, as that which he thought not to be sufficient.

Truelie it should seeme, that there was a great untowardlie disposition in the subjects of that time, for the helping of their king with necessarie aid of monie, towards such great charges as he had bene diuers waies occasioned to be at, since his first comming to the crowne. But because it was perceiued that he bestowed no small quantitie of his treasure to the aduancing of his kinfolke and alliance, namely strangers, and againe defraied great summes in vaine hope to obtaine the kingdoms of both the Sicils which the pope offered to him frellie inough in words, as before we haue heard, the English subjects conceived a great misliking of the whole gouernement, and namely, for that he seemed to be led and ruled by the aduise and counsell of those strangers, who being not throughe acquainted with the nature of the English people, nor fullie instructed in the lawes and customes of the realme, caused him to do manie things, that procured both to him and them much ill will, as well of the hie states as of the commons, which as occasion serued, they were readie inough to discouer, and therefore they were vertie inquisitiue, both to learne what he receiued, and also in what sort he bestowed that which he did receiue and take.

It was therefore knowne, that since he first began to waste his treasure, his charges amounted vnto the summe of 250000 marks, as the booke of accounts remaining in the hands of the clerks of his closet plainelie witnessed, and yet of all those vaine expences no great advantage was growne thereby to the king or realme, but rather disadvantage, as the most part of men then took it, and no maruell: for there was such hart-burning amongst the nobilitie, one envying an others aduancement, & repining at each others doings, that it was not possible to bring any good drift forward amongst men so far at odds together. But we will let this passe as a thing manifest inough to them that shall well consider the course of that time, and will returne to the parlement aboue mentioned.

Here is further to be noted, that there were pre-

Yorke, Dublin, Oselina, Taranto and Cullen. The archbishop of Oselina was come to the king to set him on dotage for the businesse about the conquest of Naples and Sicill. At the feast of Ester next following, the archbishop of Cullen returned into his coun-trie, and the third day after Easter, the elect king of Almaine toke his leaue, and departed toward War-into Almaine, but by reason of contrarie winds he was diuised to remaine there a long time, to his great gréfe and inestimable charges before he could he got forth to the sea, and landed at Dordrecht the

About the same time, the archbishop of Canturbuting within his prouince, that inuocating the grace of the Holie-ghost, they might forese some redresse for reléfe of the English church, now in these late yeares soe disquieted by new oppressions, more gre-counsell, or rather by the whispering of some flatterers and enuies to the realme, was so induced, that he permitted certaine euill customs, as thornie hzembles to increase in the fruitfull garden of pleasure, and to choke vp the trees that brought forth fruit in great plentie. Whereouer in this yeare, king Henrie caused the walles of the citie of London, which were soe decayed and destitute of turrets, to be repaired in more samelie wise than before they had bene, at the common charges of the citie.

There was an ordinance made at Rome by the saw to advance their temporall commodities, not much passing for other mens advantages) that eue-rie one which should be chosen an exempt abbat, should come to the court of Rome to be there confirordinance, religion was laid open to great danger, and the church depriued of temporall prosperitie (as saith Matthew Paris) for by this means (saith he) it was needfull for religious men, to chuse to their gouernour a man not religious, but rather halfe temporall, and such a one as to whome rather Iustinians lawes than Christs which conuerteth soules should be familiar. The monks of Durham, who on-lie with the canons of Gilsborne resisted the wicked proceedings of the popes exactors, and stood therefore interdicted a long time, at length, after manie alter-cations, were absolved. Wh (saith Marth. Paris) if in that their tribulation they might haue had fellows, and in their constant doings aidors, how happilie had the church of England triumphed ouer hir tormentors and oppressors!

Vpon haue heard how Richard earle of Cornewall being elected king of Almaine, sailed thither, where on the Ascension day last, he was crowned king by the archbishop of Cullen, of whom, and diuerse other great princes of Germanie he was holden for their lawfull king and gouernour (as in the Dutch histories you may find more largelie exprest) though other of them had chosen Alfonso king of Castile, the which Alfonso wzote to the king of England, as his confederate and alie, requiring aid of him against the said Richard that was his owne brother, to the which unreasonable request the king would in no wise consent.

Whereouer, in this fortie one yeare of king Henries reigne, by reason of a roll closed in gréne iwar and found in the kings Wardrobe at Windsor, containing as it were an information against the maiors and shiriffes of London, for oppression and wrongs done to the communalte of the citie, the king toke great displeasure, and caused streit inquisition to be made, as well by Fouke Shotes, as Ward Shotes, & diuerse other means. At length, the maiors and shiriffes, with the chamberlaine of the citie, were discharged by John Spanell, one of the kings iustices, afore whom and other the kings counsell, the inquisition was taken, and then was the custodie of the citie assigned vnto the constable of the towre, and in place of the shiriffes were appointed Michael Conie, and John Audrian. At length, the maiors, shiriffes and Aldermen that were accused, perceiving the kings displeasure towards them, submitted themselves wholie to his mercie, sauing to them and to all other the citizens their liberties & franchises, and so in the exchequer chamber at Westminster afore the king, there sitting in iudgement vpon the matter, they were condemned to paie their fines for their offenses committed, and further, euerie of them discharged of his ward and office. Shortly after was William Fitz Richard by the kings commandement made maior, and Thomas Fitz Thomas, and William Crapib gate shiriffes.

The archbishop of Yorke was accused by the popes commandement through all England, with booke, bell and candle, that by such terror his constancie might be weakened. But the archbishop (saith Matthew Paris) informed by the example of Thomas Becket, and by the example and doctrine of saint Comund sometime his instructor, and also taught by the faithfulnesse of blessed Robert, late bishop of Lin-colne, despised not of comfort from heauen, in bearing patientlie the popes tyrannie; neither would he bestow the wealthie revenues of his church vpon Italians, being vntowzie persons and strangers; neither would he obeie and incline to the popes will like a faint-hearted person, by leaning and setting apart the rigour of the law, least thereby he might seme to result from his pastoral office, and animate the wolfe of Rome to breake into the shepfold of the church, whose purpose was to sucke the verie blood quite and cleane out of euerie veine, yea to bite out bowels and all. Which qualitie to resist in him, wolfe experience hath taught, and the testimonie of wri-ten verities hath shewed, among which this one for the truth thereof is worthy to be reported euen to the praise of the deuiler for his partie, deuile therein burnt, waisted, and destroyed his lands, possessions, and castles, which belonged unto him in the confines of Wales, he meant to be reuenged of those iniuries, and inuading them, he slue a great number of them, so reuenging the death of those his friends, seruants and tenants, whome they before had murdered. The Welshmen were not so discouraged herewith, but that they brake vpon him out of their starting-holes and places of refuge through the marches, and slaying their enemies hostles, put them backe to their power, & ceased not to do what mischeefe they could, by spoiling, killing, and burning houses and castles where they might come vnto them, and so the realme of England was daile put to losses & hinderances. For out of Wales, England was accustomed to be furnished with horses, cattell, and other things, to the great profit of both the countries. About the same time there was an ambassage sent from the king of England to the French king by the bishop of Worcester, the elect of Winchester, the abbat of Westminster, the earle of Leicester, & Hugh Bigod earle of Marthall, with Peter de Saunoy, and Robert Walron. The effect of their message was to requite restitution of those countries, lands, cities, and townes which had bene euicted out of the hands of king John and others, apertaining by right of inheritance to the king of England. These lords did their message, but as was thought, they had no towardlie answer, but rather were put off with trifling words & scoimefull fatents, so that they returned hostlie againe all of them; the abbat of Westminster onelie excepted, who remained there behind for a fuller answer, not metie to those requests exhibited on the part of the king of England, but also on the behalfe of the king of Almaine. The marches towards Wales in this season were brought almost desert, by reason of the continuall wars with the Welshmen, for what with fire & sword, neither building nor liuing creature, nor any other thing was spared, that fire & sword might bring to ruine.

A great

March, Paris.

The greedie dealing of the Londoners to the hurt of the common-welth.

In this yeare was an exceeding great dearth, in so much that a quarter of wheat was sold at London for foure and twentie shillings, whereas within two or thre yeares before, a quarter was sold at two shillings. It had bene more deere, if great store had not come out of Almaine, for in France and in Flanders it likewise failed. But there came fiftie great ships fraught with wheat and barlie, with meale and bread out of Dutchland, by the procurement of Richard king of Almaine, which greatly relieved the poore; for proclamation was made, and order taken by the king, that none of the citizens of London should buy any of that graine to laie it vp in store, whereby it might be sold at an higher price vnto the needie. But though this prouision did much ease, yet the want was great ouer all the realme. For it was certeinlie affirmed, that in thre shires within the realme, there was not found so much graine of that yeares groweth, as came ouer in those fiftie ships. The proclamation was set forth, to refreine the Londoners from ingrossing by that graine, and not without cause: for the wealthie citizens were euill spoken of in that season, because in time of scarcitie they would either staie such ships as fraught with vittels were comming towards the cite, and send them some other way forth; or else buy the whole, that they might sell it by retaille at their pleasure to the needie. By means of this great dearth and scarcitie, the common people were constrained to liue vpon heards & roots, and a great number of the poore people died through famine, which is the most miserable calamitie that can betide mortall men, and was well marked euen of the heathen, but notable by Ouid, who making a description of famine, setteth his forth in most ouglie and irksome sort, intending thereby the dreafulnes of that heauie plague, saying:

*Quæstionque famem lapidoso vidit in antro,

This yeare after Easter a parlement was holden at London, in the which manie weightie matters were intreated of touching the kings causes, namelie, about the conquest of the realme of Naples, the pope hauing sent a messenger named Hurtred for the discharge of monie, which the pope had receiued of merchants, as it were to the kings use, and entred bonds for the paiement thereof. Also, whereas the king was sore disquieted for the warre which the Welshmen made against him, he asked aduise of the states, how he might proceed to seeke his iust reuenge of them, who by reason of their good hap were become verie stout and loftie, and had of late by the expiring of a truce which had bene accorded betwixt them, spoiled and waisted the most part of Denbroke shire, of which iniurie the earle of Denbroke, namelie William de Valence, sore complained.

But whereas the king knowing him to be rich, willed him to lay out some great portion of monie, towards the maintenance of his wars, the erle toke great displeasure therewith, as though the king had made that request by the suggestion and setting on of some of the English lords, in somuch that words passed in displeasing sort betwixt him and the earles of Gloucester and Leicester, so far forth, that the earle of Denbroke called the earle of Leicester traitor, who therewith made towards him, to haue reuenged the iniurie, and so would haue done indeed, if the king had not bene moderatoe betwixt them. Finally at this parlement the lords told the king that they might not aid him with any great summes of monie, except it should rebound to their great impouerishment: they told him also, that he had not done wiselie to enter into covenants, for the purchase of the kingdom of Naples for his sonne, without their consents.

twixt the earle

They also declared to him, what articles it should be good for him to propound vnto the pope, if he would haue him to continue in bearing the charges of the wars against Naples. But when those articles were afterwards presented to the pope, he allowed them not, & so the matter remained without any certeine assurance of the promises, which had bene and still were from time to time made to let the king on doctage. The archbishop of Yorke had his crosse taken from him by the popes commandement, but the archbishop would not yet bow his knee vnto Baill, to bestow the benefices of his church vpon aliens, and such as were vnto the persons, as it had bene to cast pearles vnto swine. & There came from the pope as his Nuncio, vnto king Henric, a frier minor named Mansuetus, furnished with great power and authoritie, in somuch that he toke vpon him to absolve men for changing their vovues, and to iustifie those that were excommunicated persons, false perjured, and such like. Whereupon, manie of euill disposition presumed to offend: for easinesse to purchase pardon byed boldnesse in manie, howbeit the wife seemed to laugh at such doings.

he had not performed the promises which he made touching the obseruing of the liberties contained in the great charter. They also complained greatly of his ingenuance, in that he so much advanced the Poitouins and other strangers, to the impoverishment of himselfe and the whole realme, and further, maintained them so far forth, that they were ready to offer wrong vnto other, vpon presumption of his fauour and bearing with them, he hauing by commandement restrained that no proccesse should passe out of the chancerie against certeine of them that were his cosins, as the earle of Denbroke and others. Finally, when the lords were in doubt which way to worke for their owne safeties, they caused the parliament to be proroged, till the feast of saint Barnabe, then to begin againe at Oxford. In the meane time the lords of the realme, as the earles of Gloucester, Leicester, Hereford and Northfolke, with other, did confederate themselves together, because they stood in feare to be intrapped by the kings subtil sleights, and by the craftie wiles of those strangers whom he retained against them.

The parliament

In the same yeare by the wind, which continuallie certeine months together kept northerlie, the flours, with other growing things, were so hindered, that scarcelie they appeared to anie purpose, till the most part of June was past, whereupon the hope of receiuing the fruits of the earth was quite taken away, & so vpon the great dearth that happened, a sore death and mortalitie followed, for want of necessarie food to susteine the pining bodies of the poore people. They died so thicke, that there were great pits made in churchyards to lay the dead bodies in one vpon another.

Seuall archb. of yorke departed this life.

Marth. Paris.

About the feast of the Ascension, Seuall the archb. shoy of yorke departed this life, who constantlie had resisted the tyrannie of the court of Rome, in defense of his church, suffering in this world manie greuous tribulations, but now was removed from thence vnto the kingdome of heauen, to be crowned with the elect for his good seruings, as was then certenlie beleued. About this time, a great number of Poitouins were come into England, by reason of their alliance and cosinage to the king, the which by the kings fauour being highlye advanced, began to war proud thereof, and to require to be restored vnto such lands and liuings as before time they had possessed: namelie the kings halfe brethren, Athelmarc & Domare, that was a priest, with William, Gestrepe and Gue, these were the sonnes of Hugh le Brun earle of March, by his wife quene Isabell, the mother of king Henrie, and being come into England, they shewed themselves verie loslie & high-minded, partlie, because of their cosinage to the king, & partlie by reason of his courteous interteining of them, insomuch that forgetting themselves, they began to despise (vpon a presumptuous pride) the English nobilitie, looking still for preferment of hono: aboue all other. And succlie Domare obtained at the first a great peece of his purpose, being made by the kings gift bishop of Winchester, and by that means bare a stout post, and greatlie holpe and mainteined his other brethren.

The kings
halfe brethren.

Infamum parliamentum.

The English barons not well able to suffer such presumption in strangers, who seemed to haue them in derision, complained to the king, in so much that at length, as well for a reformation hereof, as in other things, a parliament was called (as before you haue heard) first at London, and after returned to Oxford, there to be assembled about the feast of saint Barnabe in the moneth of June. This (of some writers) is named Infamum parlamentum, that is to say, The mad parliament; for at this parliament (to the which the lords came with great retinues of armed men, for the better safegard of their persons) manie things in the same yeare enacted contrarie to the kings pleasure, and his roiall prerogative. For the lords at the first determined to demand the confirmation of the ancient charter of liberties, which his father king John had granted, and he himselfe had so often promised to obserue and mainteine, significeng plainelie, that they meant to pursue their purpose and intent herein, not sparing either for losse of life, lands or goods, according to that they had mutuallie giuen their faiths by ioining of hands, as the manner in such cases is accustomed. Besides the grant of the great charter, they required other things necessarie for the state of the common-wealth, to be established and enacted.

The demand of the lords.

It was therefore first enacted, that all the Poitouins should auoid the land, together with other strangers, and that neither the king nor his sonne prince Edward should in anie secret manner aid them against the people. Moreover, that the king & his sonne should receiue an oth, to stand vnto the decrees and ordinances of that parliament, and withall speed to restore the ancient lawes and institutions of the realme, which they both did, rather constrained thereunto by feare, than of anie good will. Thus not onelie the king himselfe, but also his sonne prince Edward receiued an oth, to obserue the ordinances of that parliament. But John earle of Warren, and the kings halfe brethren, namelie the earle of Denbroke refused that oth; and likewise the lord Henrie, sonne to the king of Almaine, excused himselfe by his fathers absence, without whose consent he would not receiue it, vnto whome this answer was made, that if his father would not consent to the agreement of the barons, he should not possesse one furrowe of land within this realme.

Ordinances
made.

An oth recei-ued of the king

Also, whereas the earle of Leicester resigned the castles of Killingworth and Wigham into the kings hands, which he had latelie receiued by his gift, and newlie repaired, the earle of Denbroke and his other brethren swore daupelie, that they would for no mans pleasure giue ouer such castles, rents, and wardships of theirs, as they had of the kings gift. But the earle of Leicester told the earle of Denbroke flatlie and plainlie, that he should either render them vp, or else he should be sure to lose his head. This saleng was confirmed by the generall voices of all other the barons, because it was a speciall article concluded amongst other in that parliament. The kings halfe brethren, perceiuing which waie the world went, stood in doubt of themselves, and secretlie thereupon departing from Oxford, first withdrew vnto Winchester, where Domare, one of the same brethren was bishop, through whose support, and by reason of the strength of such castles as he held, they trusted to be in more safetie: but finally, perceiuing themselves not to be so out of danger, with the barons minded to pursue them, about the eighteenth daie of June they departed the realme with a great number of other of their countreimen; and amongst those, William de saint German the kings caruer was one.

Henrie Montfort, sonne to the earle of Leicester, vnderstanding of their departure out of the realme, followed; and hearing that they were arrived at Wallogne, he landed in those parts, & by such friendship as he found there amongst those that bare good will vnto his father, he got together a power, and after a manner besieged the Poitouins within Wallogne, layeng watch for them in such sort, both by sea and land, that there was no waie left for them to escape. When they saw themselves in that danger, they sent a messenger with all post hast to the French king, requiring his safe conduct, to passe scilicet through his his realme, as they trusted he would be content to grant unto such, as for refuge and safegard of life should repaire unto him for comfort. The French king courteously granted their request, and so they were in safetie permitted to passe quietly through the countrie. In the meane while one Richard Gray, chateleine of Dover castell, a right ballant man and a faithfull, suffered no man to passe that waie by searched, according to that which he had in commandment: whereupon he toke & seized into his hands a great portion of treasure, which was brought thither to be transported over to the Poitouins that were fled out of the realme. Also, there was found a great quantitie of treasure in the new temple at London, which they had gathered & hoarded by there, which also was seized to the kings use.

But now to returne unto the doings in the parlement holden at Driford. It was ordeined (as some write) that the king should chosse twelve persons of the realme, and the communalte of the land should chosse other twelve, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might take in charge the gouernance of the realme vpon them, & should from yeare to yeare prouide for the due election of iustices, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers, and see for the safe keeping of the castels which belonged to the crowne. These foure and twentie gouernours appointed as prouiders for the good gouernement of the realme, began to order all things at their pleasure, in the meane time not forgetting to vse things chiefe to their owne aduantages, as well in prouiding escheats and wards for their sonnes and kinsfolkes, as also in bestowing patronages of churches belonging to the kings gift at their pleasures, so that these prouiders seemed to prouide all for themselves, in so much that neither king nor Christ could receiue ought amongst them: and as for iustice they regarded nothing lesse, their minds were so rauished with desire of priuat wealth, which was so hunteth after, being in place of magistracie, he must needs neglect the law and courte of equitie, and therefore this counsell is good which a good writer giueth in this behalfe, saying;

Similia vult esse aliquis non vtile querat, Iusticia est multis laudata, domestica paucis.

There be that write, how there were but twelue of these gouernours chosen; whose names were as follooweth. First, the archbishop of Cantuarbie, the bishop of Worcester, Roger Bigod earle of Northfolke and marshall of England, Simon de Mountfort earle of Leicester, Richard de Clare earle of Gloucester, Humfrey Bohun earle of Hereford, the earles of Warwick and Arundell, sir John Spansell chiefe iustice of England, sir Roger lord Mortimer, sir Hugh Bigod, sir Peter de Saunoy, sir James Audley, and sir Peter de Mountfort. To these was authoritie onelie giuen to punish and correct all such as offended in breaking of any the ordinances at this parlement established.

It was not long after the finishing of this parlement, but that strife and variance began to kindle betweene the king and the earles of Leicester and Gloucester, by reason of such officers as the said earles had removed, and put others in their romes: among the which John Spansell was discharged of his office, and sir Hugh Bigod, brother to earle Marshall, admitted in his roome. Also because the foresaid gouernours had knowledge that the king minded not to performe the ordinances established at Driford, they thought to make their part as strong as was possible for them to doe, and therefore vpon the morrow after the feast of Marie Magdalene, the king as then being at Westminster, the earle Marshall, the earle of Leicester, and diuerse other came to the Guildhall of London, where the maior and aldermen, with the commons of the citie were assembled, and there the lords shewed the instrument of writing sealed with the kings seale, and with the seales of his sonne prince Edward, and of manie other lords of the land, containing the articles of those ordinances which had bene concluded at Driford, willing the maior and aldermen to set also thereon to their common seale of the citie. The maior and aldermen vpon aduise amongst them taken, required respite till they might know the kings pleasure therein, but the lords were so earnest in the matter, and made such instance, that no respite could be had; so that in the end the common seale of the citie was put to that writing, and the maior with diuerse of the citie sworne to mainteine the same, their allegiance saued to the king, with their liberties and franchises, according to the accustomed manner.

Vpon the ninth day of August, proclamation was made in diuerse places of the citie, that none of the kings takers should take any thing within the citie, without the will of the owner, except two tunnes of wine, which the king accustomed had of cuerie ship coming from Burdeaur, paying but 40 shillings for the tun. By meanes of this proclamation, nothing was taken by the kings officers within the citie and liberties of the same, except readie paiement were made in hand, which vse continued not long. Whereupon the king held a parlement at Westminster, and another at Winchester, or else proroged and removed the same thither. Also sir Hugh Bigod lord chiefe iustice, with Roger Turkeley, and other called Itinerarij, kept the terme for places at saint Sauours: for you must vnderstand, that in those daies they were kept in diuerse places of the realme, which now are holden altogether at Westminster, and iudges ordeined to keepe a circuit, as now they keepe the assises in time of vacation. The foresaid iudges sitting on that maner at saint Sauours, punished bailiffes, and other officers verie extremelie, which were conuict afore them for diuerse trespasses, and speciallie for taking of merchandises otherwise than law gaue them. After this, the same sir Hugh came vnto the Guildhall, and there sat in iudgement, and kept places without order of law; yea contrarie to the liberties of the citie, he punished bakers for lacke of true size, by the tumbrell; where before they were punished by the pillorie, & manie other things he vsed after such manner, more by will than god order of law.

There was a bruite raised (whether of truth or otherwise we leaue to the credit of the authors) that the Poitouins had practised to poison the most part of the English nobilitie. Indeed diuers of them were greivoully tormented with a certeine disease of swelling and breaking out, some died, and othersome verie hardlie escaped, of which number the earle of Gloucester was one, who laie sicke a long time at Sunning a place besides Reading. At length he recovered: but his brother William died of the same disease, and vpon his death-bed laid the fault to one Walter Scotenie, as the occasioner of his death, which afterwards cost the said Walter his life. For although he was one of the chiefe councillors, and steward also to the said earle of Gloucester, yet being had in suspicion, and thereupon apprehended and charged with that crime, when in the yeare next following in June he came to be arreigned at Winchester, and put himselfe to be tried by a iurie, the same pronounced him guiltie: and when those that were impeached vpon that iurie were asked by the iudges how they vnderstood that he should be guiltie, they answered, because that where the said Walter was neuer indebted, that they could heare of, either to William de Halence, or to any of his brethren, they were fullie certified that he had late receiued no

The harvest was verie late this peare, so that the most part of the corne rotted on the ground, and that which at length was got in, remained yet abroad till after Alhallowentide, so intemperate was the weather, with excessive wet and raine beyond all measure. Hereupon the dearth so increased, that even those which had of late releued other, were in danger to starue themselves. Finalle solempne fasts and general processions were made in diuerse places of the realme to appease Gods wrath, and (as it was thought) their praiers were heard, for the weather partlie amended, and by reason the same serued to get in some such corne as was not lost, the price thereof in the market fell halfe in halfe.
